Capital Outlay needs which for the 67 counties totaled $9,451,600 in 1953-54 and has been computed at $10,199,448 for the 1954-55 estimate. This money is spent in each county according to the needs recommended by a state conducted school building survey. With the help of these individual county surveys it was estimated as of January, 1954 that $97,000,000 will be needed to provide facilities for white children and $50,000,000 will be needed to provide facilities for Negro children. Since the activation as of the effective date January 1, 1953 of a Constitutional Amendment providing for the issuance of revenue certificates by the State Board of Education against anticipated state Capital Outlay funds for the next thirty years more than $43,000,000 in state guaranteed bonds have been issued to provide additional facilities for both races. By the fall of 1954 there will have been a total of $70,000,000 of these bonds issued and in the foreseeable future the total will be $90,000,000 to $100,000,000. At the present time 2182 classrooms are under construction as a result of the issuance of these bonds.

The growth of Florida's school population in the past five years has far exceeded all expectations and predictions. The combination of a large birth rate during the latter forties and a steadily increasing migration rate is reflected in Table 3.

It is significant that Florida was the only one of the thirteen southern states to show an increase in the age 10-14 Negro population during the last decade. While the general pattern in the South during 1940-50 was a migration of Negroes to the North and West, Florida registered a 2.5% net migration increase and a natural increase of 14.9%. The corresponding rate for the white population for this decade was a net migration increase of 40.6% and a natural increase of 16.1%. It is clear then, that Florida's Negro population, though increasing in both measures, is actually becoming a smaller and smaller minority. The per cent of non-white population decreased from 27.2% in 1940 to 21.8% in 1950. As in the other states, a wide range of concentration is found among the 67 counties of Florida. The accompanying two maps of Florida counties show the amount and per cent of non-white population in 1950 and the distribution of Negro enrollment in 1952-53, and illustrate the diversity of Florida's pattern. In only two counties of North and West Florida do the Negroes outnumber the whites. In only one county do the Negroes comprise less than 5% of the county's population. With the exception of Jacksonville, the major metropolitan areas are inhabited by a much smaller proportion of Negroes than the state average.[1]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The shifting of Negro population into the southern coastal counties and into Northeast Florida is contrasted with the out-migration of Negroes from the West Florida non-urban counties. Statewide, twenty-seven counties (or 40%) registered actual losses in Negro population from 1940 to 1950; and the heaviest losers were Dixie (82%), Gilchrist (46%), and Liberty (37%).

Achievement Test Scores

If a significant difference in preparation and achievement level exists between white and Negro students, additional academic problems can be expected in the process of desegregation. It is not inferred that these differences are explained by racial differences.

In Florida, the statutes provide 1,050 scholarships of $400 each for students desiring to train for the teaching profession. Awarding of the scholarships is done on a basis of county representation, race, and competitive test scores of psychological and scholastic aptitude. A compilation of the scores of the 740 white twelfth grade applicants in the spring of 1954 yielded an average score of 340. Compilation of the 488 Negro twelfth grade applicants yielded an average score of 237. In the previous year, 1953, 664 white applicants made a mean score of 342 while the 503 Negro applicants made an average score of 237. This difference is classified as very significant and should be interpreted as meaning that factors other than chance explain the different results between white and Negro scores.

---

1. Dietrich, T. Stanton, Statistical Atlas. Florida's Population: 1940 and 1950: Research Report No. 3. Fla. State University, June, 1954.

In addition, a comparison of the performance of white and Negro high school seniors on a uniform placement-test battery given each spring in the high schools throughout the State of Florida is shown in Table 4. The number of participants corresponds with the total twelfth grade membership during the five-year period, 1949-1953. This table shows, for example, that on all five tests 59% of the Negroes rank no higher than the lowest 10% of the whites. On the general ability scale, the fifty percentile or mid-point on the white scale corresponds with the ninety-five percentile of the Negro scale. In other words, only 5% of the Negroes are above the mid-point of the white general ability level.

Studies of grades at the University of Florida indicate that white high school seniors with placement test percentile ranks below fifty have less than a 50% likelihood of making satisfactory grades in college. While factors such as size of high school, adequacy of materials, economic level, and home environment are recognized as being contributing factors, no attempt is made here to analyze or measure the controlling factors.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Counties With No Negro High Schools

An examination of facilities provided by the sixty-seven counties reveals that no senior high schooling was offered for Negroes in eight counties in 1953. Transportation to an adjacent county high school is provided in each county. In six of these eight counties the membership available for a 7-12 grade high school is less than seventy-five.

Table 5 shows the estimated number of Negroes eligible for grades 7-12, the number and organization of white high schools, the white average daily membership, the full capacity of the high schools, and the possible space available. If the ban on Negro pupils were lifted, space would be available in six of these eight counties.

Examples of Inter-Racial Cooperation

The tradition of separate schools for Negro children has in effect separated the Negro teachers from association with white teachers. Until recent years, duplicate meetings of teachers during pre-school conferences were held in every county. When specialists and consultants were brought into the county to improve instruction, two presentations instead of one had to be made. Considering the growing demands for efficiency and effective administration that were promulgated by the 1947 Minimum Foundation Program, the administrations in several counties have found it advantageous to schedule a single program of activities during the two week pre-school conference period for instruction personnel. Collier, Monroe, Sarasota, Hardee, and Dixie are counties that have already combined the races for pre-school conferences. This action, it might be noted, has been carried out as a result of voluntary local level initiative without any directive or suggestion from the state administration.

There are other examples of inter-racial cooperation at the county level. In Dade and Duval Counties, Negro supervisory personnel have offices in the same building as their fellow professional staff members. In a number of counties, including Santa Rosa, Leon, Sarasota, Pinellas, Hillsborough, and Hernando, regular principals' meetings are held without regard to race. Negro representatives have participated in the County PTA Council in Hillsborough County. In many counties the development of a Parent Teacher Association in Negro schools has been possible as a result of the personal interest and sponsorship of white PTA leaders. Invitations to be guests and speakers at PTA meetings have not been entirely unilateral.

The State Department of Education has Negro consultants, and staff and division meetings are held at regular intervals in the Capitol with no distinction as to race.

The members of the Florida Resource Use Education Committee are appointed by the Governor and include both races. The purpose of the committee is to promote instruction in the wide use and development of the natural resources in our community, state, and nation.

The Florida Council on Elementary Education and the Florida Council on Secondary Education are each composed of professional educators in Florida and have representation from both races. Membership is by appointment of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction and the purpose of each Council is to conduct studies which will make possible the continued improvement of the school's product.

For the past two years, a week-long Negro Principal's Work Conference has taken place at Bethune-Cookman College with a participation of more than half of all Negro Principals. Speakers, consultants, and specialists were largely drawn from white educators in Florida.

The examples of normal association between the races

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

cited herewith are confined largely to professional educators and those citizens deeply concerned about public education.

TABLE 1

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES—ALL FUNDS—BOTH RACES, 1952-53

General Control	$ 2,367,825.41
Instruction	78,233,563.93
Operation of Plant	6,540,853.16
Maintenance	4,031,471.75
Auxiliary Agencies	6,585,529.70
Fixed Charges	2,810,762.18
Current Expenses (Day Schools)	100,570,006.13
Other Schools	1,527,768.39
Total Current Expenses (All Schools)	102,097,774.52
Capital Outlay	28,013,835.59
Debt Service	8,783,513.04
Total Expenditures (All Funds)	$138,895,123.15

TABLE 2

SIGNIFICANT TRENDS IN THE GROWTH OF FLORIDA SCHOOLS UNDER DUAL SYSTEM OF EDUCATION 1930 TO 1953

	1930-31	1940-41	1947-48	1952-53
Average Daily Attendance:
White	203,002	240,388	272,084	380,800
Negro	74,785	87,570	96,503	118,162
Average Annual Salary:
White	$907	$1,202	$2,770	$3,457
Negro	403	605	2,191	3,215
Teacher Preparation (Per Cent Four Years or More):
White	38.81%	61.48%	76.72%	95.62%
Negro	15.18	31.90	62.53	94.74
Current Expenses Per Pupil in ADA (All Funds):
White	$61.26	$72.40	$175.14	$209.42
Negro	17.91	28.80	110.39	176.24
Capital Outlay Per Pupil in ADA (All Funds):
White	$3.12	$7.36	$42.60	$54.92
Negro	0.35	0.57	10.65	60.09
State Aid Per Pupil in ADA:
Both Races	$15.28	$39.60	$106.70	$123.39

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

TABLE 3

ENROLLMENT
(Includes Kindergarten and Junior Colleges)

Year	White	Negro	Total
1953-54	507,276	143,009	650,285
1952-53	467,762	135,903	603,665
1951-52	428,405	129,695	558,100
1950-51	401,083	126,091	527,174
1949-50	375,295	120,368	495,663

The over-all rate of growth during the past two years has been more than 8%; (9% for white pupils; 5% for Negro pupils.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

TABLE 4

COMPARISON OF PERCENTILE RANKS FOR WHITE AND NEGRO EXAMINEES IN THE FLORIDA STATEWIDE TWELFTH-GRADE TESTING PROGRAM SPRING 1949 THROUGH SPRING 1953

White Percentile Rank	Corresponding Percentile Rank for Negroes
	Psychological (General Ability)	English	Social Studies	Natural Science	Mathematics	All Five Tests
01	31.4	18.8	15.6	11.2	09.8	17.36
05	57.4	50.4	44.8	32.4	33.0	43.60
10	70.8	67.4	60.4	50.0	46.8	59.08
20	82.8	81.6	78.4	69.8	67.2	75.96
30	88.6	88.6	86.4	80.2	79.2	84.60
40	92.6	93.0	91.4	87.8	86.2	90.20
50	95.4	95.6	94.4	92.4	90.6	93.68
60	97.2	97.0	96.4	95.0	94.4	96.00
70	98.2	98.0	97.6	97.0	96.4	97.44
80	98.75	99.0	98.6	98.4	97.25	98.40
90	99.0		99.0	98.5	98.5	98.75
95				99.0	99.0	99.0

Number of Seniors Tested: White—69,909
Negro—10,675

COPY BOUND VERTICALLY

TABLE 5

COUNTIES WITH NO NEGRO HIGH SCHOOL — 1952-53

County	NEGRO		WHITE
	Elem. ADM (1-6)	Est. 7-12 ADM Based on Ratio of .50	No. and Grade of Hi School	ADM (7-12)	Capacity	Space Available
1. Baker	288	144	3(1-12)	499	660[1]	161
2. Charlotte	70	35	1(1-12)	234	300[1]	66
3. Dixie	68	34	1(7-12)	300	330[2]	30
4. Glades	102	51	1(1-12)	119	180	61
5. Hardee	136	68	1(9-12)	803	890	87
6. Holmes	104	52	4(1-12)	1222	1080	....
7. Lafayette	42	21	1(7-12)	283	330[1]	47
8. Union Co. Hi.	230	115	1(1-12)	255	280	25

1. Allows 60 additional capacity for Homemaking, Science, Agriculture, and Physical Education facilities.
2. Allows 90 additional capacity for Agriculture, Science, Homemaking and Gymnasium facilities.

TABLE 6

STATUS OF ELEMENTARY PRINCIPALS* 1953-54

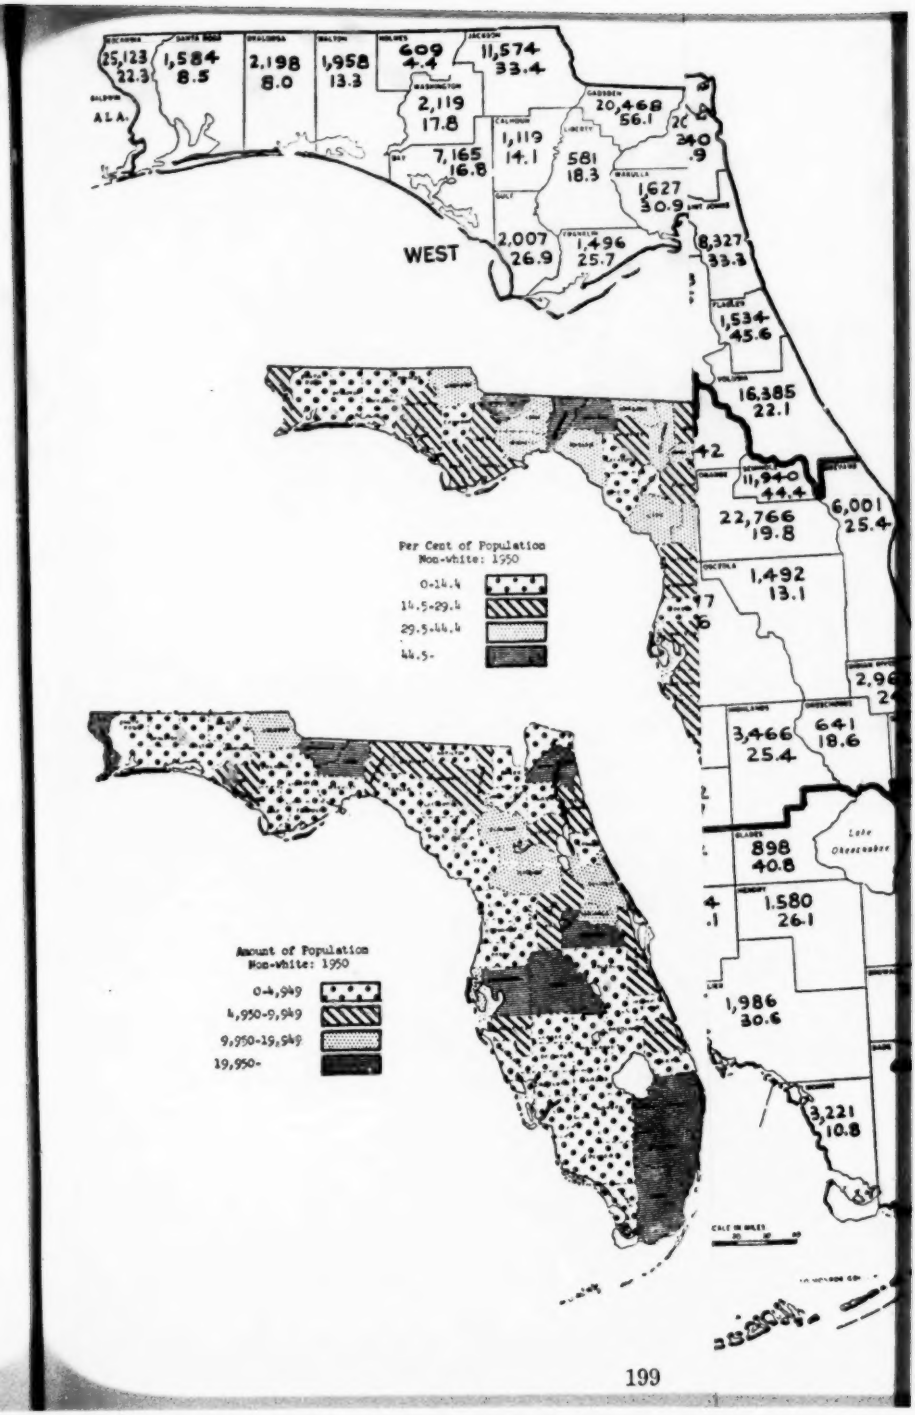
(Percentage)

	Male		Female
	W	N	W	N
Training
Rank I	9.60		6.19
Rank II	68.80	46.15	55.75	46.90
Rank III	20.00	51.30	36.28	53.12
No Information	1.60	2.60	1.76
Number	125	39	226	32
Years as Principal
0	1.60		.90
1 - 5	45.60	30.80	31.85	25.00
6 -10	17.60	33.33	22.12	21.90
11-15	12.80	15.40	16.81	18.80
16-20	8.00	15.40	8.84	15.62
21-25	4.80	2.60	8.84	3.12
26-Over	9.60	2.60	9.73	15.62
No Information			.90
Number	125	39	226	32
Salary 10 Months (Dollars)
2500-2999	1.60	2.60
3000-3499	.80	17.94	1.32
3500-3999	9.60	17.94	3.53	12.50
4000-4499	19.20	15.40	18.60	18.80
4500-4999	12.80	10.25	22.12	25.00
5000-5499	20.80	17.94	28.80	12.50
5500-5999	16.80	10.25	11.06	12.50
*Not Applicable (12 mos.)	16.80	5.12	10.61	18.80
No Information	1.60	2.60	4.00
Number	125	39	226	32

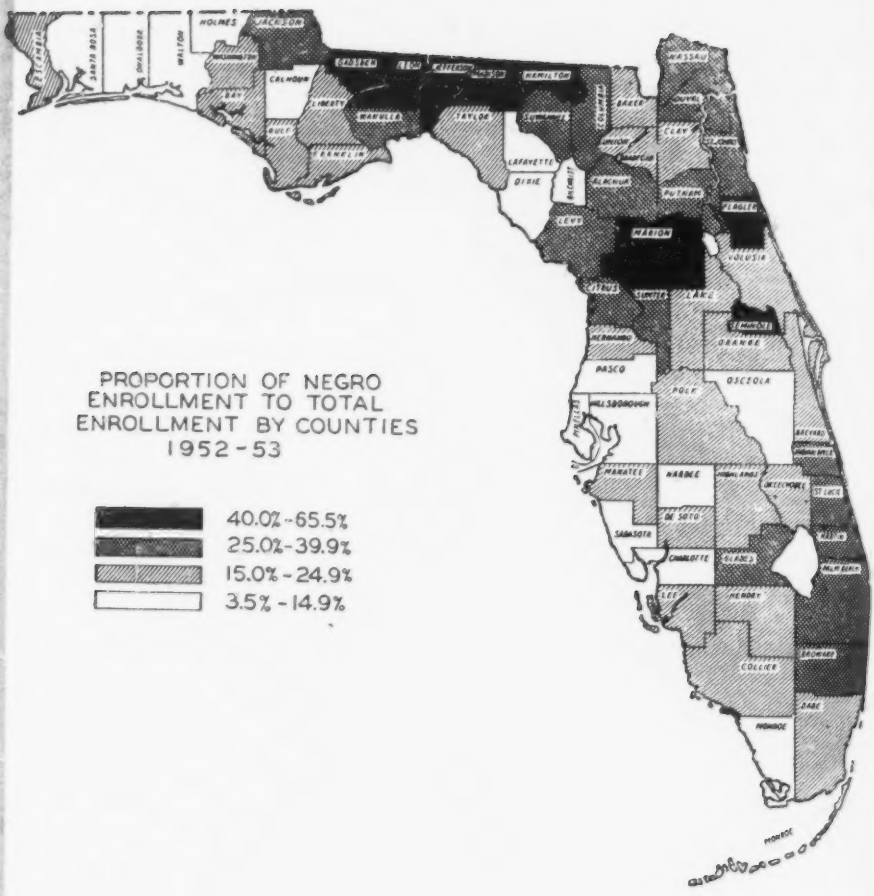
*Compiled by Sara DeKeni, School of Education, Florida State University.

BLEED THROUGH FO

BLURRED COPY



FOLLOWING FOLDOUTS TO LARGE TO BE FILMED



BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

An Intensive Study in Dade County and Nearby Agricultural Areas ...and Conclusions*

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

A majority of those polled believed that most of the white population of Dade County are opposed to the Court's decision as a matter of principle. There seems to be reason to believe, however, because of the relative lack of discussion about the decision and its attendant problems and of the calm acceptance of the decision itself that the attitude on the part of many is not a deep-seated, emotionally formed one. If the process of integration is handled gradually (after a few years of preparation) and wisely and with firm leadership, a very large majority of this group will abide by the decision. The distinct possibility remains that many of this group with loosely formed convictions can be driven into active opposition by early and abrupt transition.

Some reluctance has been noted on the part of the School Board and other public officials to plan and lead, and on the part of the newspapers to encourage the same. The problem of obtaining leadership outside official circles for the transitional steps will be made more difficult by the tendency or perhaps organized campaign of the more violent pro-segregationists to identify such leadership with the Communist Party. On the other hand, a number of ministers have indicated that they will advise their congregations to follow the Court's decision.

* Prepared by Dr. D. R. Larson, Dr. Edward Sofen, and Dr. T. J. Wood, Government Department, University of Miami.

Virtually complete agreement exists among those polled as to the most explosive area—the northwest section of the county which is low in the white socio-economic strata and which contains the greatest percentage of southern-born whites. The elected officials foresaw the next greatest amount of trouble (although not violent in nature) from those communities such as Coral Gables and Miami Shores which are high on the socio-economic scale. Community leaders, the teachers, newsmen, police and labor leaders failed to mention this in any significant numbers; this failure may be explained in part by disposition to think of difficulties only in terms of violence.

Almost all elected officials, journalists, police chiefs and labor leaders agreed that serious violence in several areas was inevitable if large-scale integration were to be attempted within the next year or two; such violence would be perpetrated by a small segment of the population and would take the form of the bombing of homes, hit-and-run shooting and individual beatings rather than lynchings and other more openly organized activities. Among the community leaders there was less unanimity, although a majority expects violence in some form in the most difficult areas.

Roughly half of the above categories of interviewees believed that some scattered violence was inevitable no matter how slowly the integration was accomplished. Only

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

33% of the teachers expect violence under such circumstances.

These same categories thought that boycotts in all parts of the County were inevitable whenever integration was undertaken but few estimates were made of their dimensions. A substantial move toward private schools among the well-to-do was agreed upon. There was a marked absence of mention of the Byrnes-Talmadge Plan of removing the state's direct connection with education; only a few of those who expressed personal opposition to the decision thought that this was a practical solution.

The consensus of the various categories of whites polled with regard to the attitude of the Negro population on the timing of integration is that a gradual approach over a period of several years is desired. Although Negro school teachers are not a representative cross-section of the Negro population, it should be noted that by an extremely large majority they wanted speedier integration and that they reported, although by a smaller majority, that their students agreed.

The small sampling of Negro leaders indicates that most of the hitherto effective Negro leaders are prepared not to demand, by means of suits or otherwise, immediate action if there is indication on the part of the state and local officials that they are planning in good faith and with reasonable promptitude the method of implementation decreed by the Supreme Court.

Although no such specific question was posed, significant numbers in all categories minimized the difficulties that might arise among the younger children; but it was recognized that violent parental attitudes might change the situation radically. At the same time the belief was widely expressed that social activities in junior and senior high schools would give rise to considerably more trouble, if not among the students, then certainly among the parents. Any consideration of a scheme to initiate integration in the first grade would be forced to take into account the fact that among the white teachers polled the first grade teachers were most resistant to the idea of integration.

The two special agricultural areas checked must be considered a problem of an entirely different order owing to the high concentration of Negroes, the Negroes' low socio-economic status, and the relative absence of whites drawn from northern metropolitan areas. The feeling against the Negro, particularly in one of these areas is more intense and more structured than that in the Greater Miami area.

Factors Indicating a Gradual Approach as the Solution to this Problem

1. Despite the fact that a majority of the white population of Dade County is opposed to the Court decision as a matter of principle, they nevertheless indicate that they will abide by the decision if integration is handled gradually, with an adequate period of preparation.

2. The present reluctance to assume positive leadership on the part of public officials and of any substantial number of groups outside official circles indicates great difficulty if an attempt is made to move too quickly.

3. A general belief exists that serious violence will occur if the decision is pushed by any minority group, white or colored.

4. A similar belief that some violence is inevitable no matter how gradual the transition, but with a firm belief that the more gradual the transition the more moderate and less frequent would be the outbreaks of violence.

5. In spite of some interracial activity among school personnel, it is a fact that Negro and white teachers have never met together in Dade County—not even for "Fellowship Day." Interracial cooperation through joint activity would seem to be a must before school integration could be put into operation.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

6. Many leaders interviewed agreed that if the NAACP, or any other organized groups, should seek to push the decision by test cases this fall immeasurable harm would be done to the entire cause of the integration of the schools.

7. With a majority of white population disagreeing with the Supreme Court's decision in principle, a state legislator was, without question, correct when he said that what is needed is a "mental change" in the community. Such changes obviously require time.

8. A small minority in the Negro community, without question, opposes integration in the schools. Others who strongly favor the decision in principle are concerned about the practical problems of the decision as it affects Negroes. A gradual solution would thus ease the tension experienced by both these groups of Negroes.

9. A sizeable percentage of the Negro leadership group checked stated that they believe a gradual approach is best. They would accept this gradual approach as long as the white community acts in good faith and with reasonable speed toward a solution.

10. Research indicates that in the two special South Florida agricultural areas checked the problems of community acceptance and general leadership make the problem of integration even more difficult than in the metropolitan area, and thus these two sections must be granted an opportunity to proceed more slowly and perhaps in an entirely different manner.

11. The greatest difficulty in integration would probably be caused at the junior and senior high school levels due to social activities and athletic and other extracurricular events. Time allowed for preparation for integration would permit the gradual use of non-social, extracurricular activities as a way of preparing students for eventual school integration.

12. Up to 60% of the white teachers polled favored a long transitional period, and another 20-30% favor at least a one or two year period of adjustment.

13. The School Board and top school administrative personnel in the school system have given little attention to the problems raised by the decision and would require time to simply handle the mechanical problems involved in the transition. It would also give these groups time to develop positive leadership which will be required for a peaceful and smooth transition.

14. The need for careful preparation in the process of integration was urged again and again by all groups polled. It is agreed that leadership and proper educational preparation will be all-important in a transition of this nature. Both require time for full development.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Acknowledgments

To complete a survey of the scope of this Study of the Problems of School Desegregation in Florida in less than three months was a task demanding the utmost effort on the part of many people. The time-table during the entire period of the research was such that a delay or a mistake in even the simplest task could prove disastrous. It is a tribute to the untiring diligence of everyone connected with the project that no such disaster occurred, and acknowledgment of their separate contributions is highly appropriate.

At all stages of the research, the members of the Research Advisory Committee, all of them busy with important duties, contributed of their time and their best thinking to make this a sound piece of research. The committee included:

Mr. Richard W. Ervin, Attorney General (Ex Officio)
Mr. Thos. D. Bailey, State Superintendent of Public Instruction (Ex Officio)
Mr. Ralph E. Odum, Assistant Attorney General
Dr. Ralph Eyman, Dean, School of Education, Florida State University
Dr. Sara Lou Hammond, School of Education, Florida State University
Mr. Robert Gates, Department of Education
Dr. Robert E. Lee, Department of Education
Mr. Ed Henderson, Executive Secretary, Florida Education Association
Dr. Gilbert Porter, Executive Secretary, Florida State Teachers Association
Dr. J. B. White, Dean, School of Education, University of Florida
Dr. Manning J. Dauer, Department of Political Science, University of Florida
Dr. Don Larson, Department of Political Science, University of Miami
Dr. George Gore, President, Florida Agricultural and Mechanical University
Mr. Angus Laird, Director, State Merit System
Dr. Richard Moore, President, Bethune-Cookman College
Dr. R. L. Johns, School of Education, University of Florida

Dr. Mode Stone, School of Education, Florida State University
Mr. D. E. Williams, Department of Education
Dr. T. J. Wood, Department of Political Science, University of Miami
Dr. Lewis M. Killian, Department of Sociology, Florida State University (Coordinator of Research)

Some members of the committee made further contributions to the study. Dr. Larson and Dr. Lee prepared reports which constitute important subsections of the study, and Dr. Dauer prepared an independent report on the experience of other states with desegregation. Dean Eyman, Dean White and President Gore, as well as President Doak S. Campbell, of The Florida State University, released much-needed members of their staffs to assist in the research at various times. Dr. Robert Gates was a constant source of advice and support to the Coordinator.

A special debt is owed to Mrs. Fay-Tyler M. Norton, who served as Assistant Coordinator and Statistical Consultant for the entire period of the research. Her contribution was far greater than the tasks called for in her contract with the Committee, and without her the study could not have been completed.

Dr. J. A. Norton and Dr. Malcolm Parsons, of the School of Public Administration, the Florida State University, conducted the study of Negro voting registration while carrying full teaching loads at the University, but with no additional compensation.

Voluntarily making a vital contribution, as a public service, were Prof. Robert McGinnis and Dr. John Haer of the Sociology Research Laboratory, the Florida State University. Under their direction the laborious task of punching both the questionnaire and the interview data on IBM cards and tabulating these data was carried out.

The field interviewers who worked in ten selected counties, all public school workers drawn away from other important duties and asked to work without personal compensation, revealed a fine sense of duty. The manner in which they carried out their important part of the study indicates that they were well chosen. These interviewers are:

Edwin G. Artest, Tampa
Henry W. Bishop, Gainesville
Mrs. Patricia Carter, Gainesville
John B. Cox, Tampa
Paul F. Davis, Bradenton
Thomas J. Hill, Gainesville
Leroy G. Hooks, Clearwater

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Elton L. Jones, Ocala
R. LeRoy Lastinger, Bartow
Mills Lord, Orlando
Julian E. Markham, Sebring
Thord Marshall, Tallahassee
William J. McEntee, Gainesville
Erby Nixon, Panama City
Willie J. Reid, Pensacola
C. C. Washington, Panama City

At a critical point in the study, a small team of workers was called upon to put forth an almost impossible effort in coding a large mass of interview data just received from the field. At great personal sacrifice, they rose to this demand, completing the task in an incredibly short time. One member of this team, Dr. C. U. Smith, of Florida A. and M. University, had already made an important contribution in helping to brief the interviewers before they went into the field. The team of analysts included, in addition to Dr. Smith, the Coordinator of Research, and Mrs. Norton, the following people:

Mr. Robert Gates, State Department of Education
Dr. Robert E. Lee, State Department of Education
Mr. James Condell, Florida A. and M. University
Dr. Henry Cobb, Florida A. and M. University
Mr. Henry Warner, Florida A. and M. University

Mrs. Lillian Walker and Miss Winifred Kitching, of the Office of the Attorney General, shouldered without complaint the additional burden of the major part of the clerical and accounting work incidental to such a comprehensive study. Their contributions were just as vital as those of any of the professional research staff.

Working far harder than they may have expected to when they accepted summer employment, the following young ladies in the Office of the Attorney General did a vast amount of detailed and often dull clerical work for which the research staff is indebted. It is entirely fitting that the youth of Florida should have played a significant part in this public service. These young ladies, all high school or college students, are:

Miss Kathleen Kirk
Miss Maribelle Garris
Miss Pat Gunn
Miss Sonya Fletcher
Miss Bessie Carol Johnson
Miss Barbara Curtis
Miss June Lasseter

A key figure in this project from the moment of its inception has been Mr. Ralph Odum, Assistant to the Attorney General. In addition to expediting the work of the professional research staff, he has contributed his sound thinking to every phase of the study.

Finally, the Committee is deeply indebted to Attorney General Ervin, Superintendent Bailey, and their colleagues of the State Cabinet for making it possible for us to apply our knowledge and skills, as educators and scientists, to the study of this momentous problem.

LEWIS M. KILLIAN Coordinator of Research

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(Appendix B)

Examples of Florida's Constitutional, Statutory and State School Board Regulatory Provisions Relating to Segregation

Article XII, Section 1:

Uniform system of public free schools.—The Legislature shall provide for a uniform system of public free schools, and shall provide for the liberal maintenance of the same.

Article XII, Section 12:

White and colored; separate schools.—White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school, but impartial provision shall be made for both.

NO PAGE NUMBER

228.09 Separate schools for white and negro children required.—The schools for white children and the schools for negro children shall be conducted separately. No individual, body of individuals, corporation, or association shall conduct within this state any school of any grade (public, private, or parochial) wherein white persons and negroes are instructed or boarded in the same building or taught in the same classes or at the same time by the same teachers.

229.07 General powers of state board.—Except as limited in the school code, the state board shall have the authority, and when necessary for the more efficient and adequate operation of the state system of public education in carrying out the purposes and objectives of the school code, the state board shall exercise the following general powers:

(1) DETERMINE POLICIES.—The state board shall determine and adopt such policies as are required by law and as in the opinion of the state board are necessary for the more efficient operation of any phase of public education.

* * * *

(3) PRESCRIBE MINIMUM STANDARDS.—Whenever the establishment of minimum standards will aid in providing adequate educational opportunities and facilities, the state board shall adopt such minimum standards for any phase of education as are considered desirable by it in carrying out the provisions of the school code.

NO PAGE NUMBER

229.08 Duties and responsibilities of state board.—It shall be the responsibility of the state board to exercise all powers and perform all duties prescribed below:

* * * *

(20) PRESCRIBE MINIMUM STANDARDS AND RULES AND REGULATIONS.—To prescribe such minimum standards and rules and regulations as are required by law or as are recommended by the state superintendent in accordance with the provisions of subsection (20), §229.17, and as it may find desirable to aid in carrying out the purposes and objectives of the school code.

* * * *

(23) OTHER RESPONSIBILITIES. — To assume such other responsibilities and to exercise such other powers and perform such other duties as may be assigned to it by law or as it may find necessary to aid in carrying out the purposes and objectives of the school code.

229.16 General powers of state superintendent.—The state superintendent shall have the authority, and when necessary for the more efficient and adequate operation of the state system of public education in carrying out the purposes and objectives of the school code, the state superintendent shall exercise the following general powers:

* * * *

(5) RECOMMEND AND PUT INTO EFFECT MINIMUM STANDARDS.—From time to time to prepare, organize by subjects, and submit to the state board for adoption such minimum standards relating to the operation of any phase of the state system of public education as, in his opinion, will aid in assuring more adequate educational opportunities for all, and to see, insofar as practicable, that such minimum standards as are adopted by the state board are put into effect and are properly observed.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

229.17 Duties and responsibilities of state superintendent.—It shall be the responsibility of the state superintendent to exercise all powers and perform all duties prescribed below; provided, that in those fields in which policies are required by law to be approved by the state board the state superintendent shall act as the advisor and executive officer of the state board.

* * * *

(20) MINIMUM STANDARDS AND RULES AND REGULATIONS.—To prepare, organize, and recommend to the state board such minimum standards and rules and regulations in the following fields as are required by law or as he may find necessary to aid in carrying out the purposes and objectives of the school code; and to execute such standards and rules and regulations as are adopted by the state board in the following fields: (1) establishment, organization, and operation of schools, agencies, services, and institutions, including the classification or accreditation of parochial, denominational, and private schools; (2) personnel; (3) child welfare; (4) courses of study and instructional aids; (5) transportation; (6) school plant; (7) finance; (8) records and reports.

* * * *

(28) OTHER RESPONSIBILITIES. — To assume such other responsibilities and to perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by law or as may be deemed by him to be necessary to aid in the more efficient operation of the state system of public education in carrying out the purposes and objectives of the school code.

230.23 Powers and duties of county board.—The county board acting as a board shall exercise all powers and perform all duties listed below:

* * * *

(6) ESTABLISHMENT, ORGANIZATION, AND OPERATION OF SCHOOLS.—Adopt and provide for the execution of plans for the establishment, organization, and operation of the schools of the county, as follows:

(a) Schools and attendance areas.—Authorize schools to be located and maintained in those communities in the county where they are needed to accommodate as far as practicable and without unnecessary expense all the youth who should be entitled to the facilities of such schools, separate schools to be provided for white and negro children; and approve the area from which children are to attend each such school, such area to be known as the attendance area for that school; provided, that only under exceptional circumstances as defined under regulations of the state board may an elementary school be located within four miles of another elementary school and a high school within ten miles of another high school in rural areas for children of the same race.

239.41 Value of general scholarships.—Each scholarship for the preparation of teachers shall have a value of four hundred ($400.00) dollars each year and shall be awarded in the following manner:

* * * *

(2) In accordance with these requirements, the principals and county superintendents of each county shall select and recommend, on the basis of merit, a number of high school graduates who are bona fide residents of the State of Florida, as defined in section 97.041, Florida Statutes, which shall be proportionate to the white or Negro population in the county and who are interested in teaching and whose work and qualifications are such as to indicate that they possess the qualities which should be possessed by a successful teacher; provided that each county shall have at least one scholarship for a Negro student.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Adopted April 27, 1954
Section 236.04 (10)

State Board Regulation
relating to

THE CALCULATION OF INSTRUCTION UNITS AND SALARY ALLOCATIONS FROM THE FOUNDATION PROGRAM

(Repealing regulation adopted June 16, 1953)

Instruction units and salary allotments from the Foundation Program will be calculated separately for white and Negro schools.

No county will receive a greater allotment for salaries for either race than the salaries actually paid the teachers of that race or the calculated amount for that race based on instruction units and training, whichever amount is smaller.

In applying the provisions of Section 236.04 (10), providing that 95% of instructional units allocated to a county must be filled, the units calculated for each race will be considered separately, and 95% of the instructional units for each race must be filled.

Adopted March 21, 1950
Section 236.04 (7)

State Board Regulation
relating to
ADMINISTRATIVE AND SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONAL SERVICE

(Adopted in accordance with the provisions of Section 236.04 (7), Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947)

1. Eleventh and Twelfth Month Personnel.

Each county superintendent shall file with the State Superintendent on or before May 15 of each year Form A for the use of its administrative and special instructional service personnel. In addition, the county superintendent shall file a plan for the 11th and 12th month program which includes for each race the title and duties assigned for each such unit. Any revision in the plan submitted must be approved by the State Department of Education.

On or before October 1, each county superintendent shall file with the State Superintendent a complete description of the program which operated during the 11th and 12th months, including for each race the title, name, certificate number, rank and duties of each person employed through the use of administrative and special instructional service units.

Ten Months Personnel.

On or before August 15 of each year the county superintendent shall file with the State Superintendent a plan for use of ten months personnel service units (Form C) which includes for each race the title and duties assigned for each such unit together with name, certificate number, and rank of the individual filling the position. Any proposed revision in plans for use of ten months personnel shall be submitted by January 15 of each year.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2. Any administrative and special instructional service units to which a county is entitled under Section 236.04 (7), Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947, which is not used in accordance with regulations prescribed by the State Board of Education shall be deducted either in the current or the succeeding fiscal year as provided in Section 236.07 (9-e), Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947.

Adopted March 21, 1950
Section 236.04 (8)

State Board Regulation
relating to

UNITS FOR SUPERVISORS OF INSTRUCTION

(Adopted in accordance with the provisions of Section 236.04 (8), Florida Statutes as amended by Section 29 of Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947)

1. Application for Instruction Units for Supervisors.

a. Each County Board shall file through the County Superintendent an application for using instruction units for supervision. This application shall be filed on forms provided by the State Superintendent on or before May 15 of each year.

b. Approval of any application for instruction units for supervision may be given by the State Superintendent when a satisfactory administrative plan for the use of such units (or desirable modification of the initial plan submitted) shall have been developed and approved jointly by the County Superintendent and the State Superintendent which will insure the most effective and economical expenditure of funds. Application for use of state funds for supervisory services must include: first, provision for general supervision over the common branches of study in all the elementary and secondary grades. Included as a part of the administrative plan for supervision prescribed above, the County Superintendent shall file brief statements outlining (1) the duties to be performed by the supervisor(s); (2) the total annual salary and number of months of employment (in case of a general supervisor(s) this must be twelve months and of special supervisor(s) at least ten months; (3) the amount to be paid for travel; (4) the qualifications of the supervisor who is to be employed.

c. Instruction units for supervisory purposes may be tentatively allocated if the administrative plan for the use of such units required in the preceding section is satisfactory, even though the nomination of the person(s) to fill the supervisory position(s) is pending.

2. Administrative Plan for Employment of Supervisory Personnel.

In arriving at a satisfactory plan for supervision in any county, the County Superintendent and the State Superintendent shall select one of the following plans which best fits the needs of the county involved:

a. Single-County Plan

(1) For General Supervision

(a) The instruction unit to which each county is entitled for the employment of a general supervisor may be used for the employment of one person who will have general supervision of white and Negro schools.

(b) The additional instruction units available for supervision, if any, may be used for the employment of separate general supervisors for white and Negro schools, or for some area or special supervisors.

(c) In counties earning fifty teacher units or less, one person may be employed to perform the functions of both supervisor of instruction and supervising principal of a school center.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Any person employed as combined general supervisor and supervising principal must be properly certificated for both positions, i.e., hold a Rank II or higher certificate covering both elementary and secondary administration and supervision.

(2) For Special Subject or Field Supervision

(a) Counties entitled to supervisory units in addition to the one reserved for general supervision may use such extra units for employment of additional supervisors, provided, one supervisor shall be employed for each of the units used and provided further that not more than one supervisor in any special subject field may be employed in a county.

b. Joint-County Plan

(1) For Counties Having Not More Than One Supervisory Unit:

Any two or three contiguous counties entitled to not more than one unit each for supervision may submit a cooperative proposal for the joint employment of a supervisor or supervisors in accordance with one or more of the following plans:

(a) Cooperative Plan for General Supervision

Such counties may employ jointly one general supervisor for work with both white and Negro schools; or may employ separate general supervisors for white and Negro schools, provided the cooperative arrangement would not result in any general supervisor's carrying a total load of over 75 teachers.

(b) Cooperative Plan for Special Subject or Field Supervision

After providing for general supervisors, counties may use the remaining supervisory units to which they may be entitled for the purpose of cooperatively employing supervisors in special area or subject fields, provided that not more than one unit from any individual county may be so used for employment of any one supervisor.

(c) Cooperative Plan for School Lunch Supervision

In counties having less than ten school lunch programs, the plan for supervision may be as follows:

Two or three counties may employ a school lunch supervisor on a joint county plan provided that no school lunch supervisor may be responsible for more than thirty school lunch programs.

(2) For Counties Having More Than One Supervisory Unit

After providing independently for general supervision, such counties may use supervisory units beyond the first unit for cooperative employment of special supervisors in accordance with section 2-b-(1)-(b) above.

3. Salaries and Travel Expense of Supervisors.

a. Supervisors shall be paid the basic salary schedule of the county for teachers based upon training, experience, and employment on either a ten or twelve months basis plus an appropriate supplement in keeping with the duties and responsibilities of the position.

b. The amount to be paid to the supervisor for travel must be adequate in terms of the territory and number of schools to be served and shall be fixed by the County Board of Public Instruction in accordance with the joint recommendation of the County Superintendent and the State Superintendent.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Adopted May 29, 1951
Section 230.23 (6)

State Board Regulation
relating to

ESTABLISHMENT, ORGANIZATION AND OPERATION OF SMALL SCHOOLS

(Repealing Regulation adopted March 21, 1950, page 24)

1. No school with an average daily attendance of less than ten pupils in the elementary, junior or senior high school grades may be continued in operation through the use of Minimum Foundation Program funds except when such school is so isolated that transportation of the pupils to another school would not be feasible because of distance, road conditions, or excessive expense, or except when pupils cannot be provided with equivalent or better educational facilities in another school. If a school is to be operated as an isolated school, an application for such operation must be filed with the State Superintendent at least one month before any Minimum Foundation Program funds may be used for the school, giving all facts which may be required as a basis for approval. Approval for the operation of an isolated school will be granted by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction only after consideration of all the facts.

Adopted July 3, 1947
Section 230.34 (8)

State Board Regulation
relating to

SCHOOL ADVISORY COMMITTEES

(Adopted in accordance with the provisions of section 230.34 (8), Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947)

If the county board of a county exercises its discretion and determines to set up School Advisory Committees, the following regulations shall apply:

1. The county may be divided into school community areas for each race in accordance with the attendance areas for each school community for each race, or the Board may divide the county into school community areas which areas encompass the schools for both races.

2. Members of the School Advisory Committee may be selected for any school community area by either of the following methods as may be determined by the county board:

a. The Board may provide for the selection of members of the School Advisory Committee at a community meeting called in each school community area at the place designated by the Board of Public Instruction; the hour, the date and place of such meeting to be advertised at least once, at least one week before the meeting in a paper published in the county or in some paper of general circulation in the county.

b. The School Advisory Committee may be appointed by the school board either from lists submitted by a community meeting or directly by the board.

3. If the Board determines that the School Advisory Committee shall be selected at a community meeting called in the school community area as prescribed above, parents or guardians of children attending school in the school community area and adult residents of such area shall be entitled to vote for members of the School Advisory Committee.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

4. Any adult residing in a school community area is eligible to be selected as a member of the School Advisory Committee.

5. If the Board determines to select School Advisory Committees by the community meeting method, the Board shall determine the time, place, and hour of the meeting but the date selected must be between September 1 and December 31 preceding the January 1 on which School Advisory Committees take office.

6. The members of the School Advisory Committee shall exercise and perform such duties as are prescribed in Section 230.34 (8) of Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947.

7. The supervising principal or principal shall serve as secretary of the School Advisory Committee.

Adopted March 21, 1950
Section 236.02 (4)

State Board Regulation
relating to

QUALIFICATIONS, DUTIES AND PROCEDURE FOR EMPLOYMENT OF SUPERVISORS OF INSTRUCTION

(Adopted in accordance with the provisions of Section 236.02 (4), Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947)

1. Types and Qualifications of Supervisors

In addition to the objective standards set forth below, all persons employed as supervisors should possess the many intangible qualifications necessary to success in supervisory work.

a. General Qualifications

(1) Age—To be eligible for initial appointment the supervisor shall be between the ages of 25 and 55 years.

(2) Physical Fitness—To be eligible for initial appointment the supervisor must have passed satisfactorily a physical examination given by a regular practicing physician and must have filed a report of such examination on the form now adopted by the State Board of Health; at the discretion of the State Superintendent the applicant may be required to take a special examination given by a physician designated by the State Board of Education.

(3) Leadership and Personal Characteristics—Each applicant for a supervisory position must file with the County Superintendent and the State Superintendent a completed application form setting forth experience, leadership activities, personal characteristics, and other items as may be included on a form prescribed and adopted by the State Board of Education.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

b. Special Qualifications* (see note)

(1) Qualifications of General Supervisors

General Supervisors shall meet the following requirements:

(a) Hold a valid teaching certificate, graduate or above, having on face thereof, "Administration and Supervision," covering both elementary and secondary levels.

Temporary approval may be given for a general supervisor who does not meet certification requirements in full, provided, a plan for securing full certification within two years is filed and carried out.

(b) Have five years successful experience including teaching and/or administrative and supervisory responsibility, at least two years of which experience shall have been completed within the five years immediately preceding appointment to a supervisory position.

(c) Beginning supervisors shall hold a certificate of Rank II or above in accordance with Section 236.07 (1), Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947.

(2) Qualifications of Supervisors at the Elementary or Secondary School Levels.

Supervisors whose duties are limited to the elementary or secondary school levels shall meet the following requirements:

(a) Hold a valid teaching certificate, graduate or above, having on the face thereof "Administration and Supervision" covering the level to be supervised.

(b) Have five years successful experience including teach-

---

* Requirements here set forth are to be considered a minimum and every effort shall be made to secure the services of persons with much higher types of qualifications and experience. When a supervisor is appointed who meets only minimum requirements he shall be required to make every effort to improve his qualifications consistent with the proper performance of the duties to which assigned.

ing and/or administrative and supervisory responsibility, at least two years of which experience shall have been completed within the five years immediately preceding appointment to a supervisory position. At least three years of the experience shall have been in the level to be supervised and the degree upon which certificate is issued shall have included the special level to be supervised as a major field of training.

(c) Beginning supervisors shall hold a certificate of Rank II, or above.

(3) Qualifications of Supervisors of Special Subjects or Special Programs.

(a) Hold a valid teaching certificate, graduate or above, or its equivalent, in the field for which responsibility is given.

(b) Five years successful experience as a teacher, administrator, or supervisor in the field for which responsibility is given, at least two years of which shall have been completed within the five years immediately preceding appointment to the supervisory position.

(c) Academic specialization shall have included the field to be supervised and the field of education including at least six semester hours in curriculum and supervision.

2. Duties of Supervisors.

a. Persons employed through the use of supervisory units shall give full time to working with teachers, principals, and other school personnel in the field of instruction. Under no circumstances will administrators or administrative assistants be certified from supervisory units.

b. In counties not employing a supervisor of Negro schools the general supervisor shall have his services equitably apportioned among the schools (white and/or Negro) in the one or more counties by whom he is employed.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

c. General supervisors shall be paid and subject to duty on a twelve months basis, and special supervisors on not less than a ten months basis. Supervisors shall attend all conferences called by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction which are related to the satisfactory performance of supervisory duties.

d. Supervisors shall make such periodic reports relative to their plans and accomplishments as may be required by the Division of Instruction of the State Department of Education.

3. Procedure for Employment of Supervisors

a. The employment of persons to fill supervisory positions in a county shall follow the procedure prescribed by law and by State Board Regulations for other instructional personnel up through the point where the County Board of Public Instruction has approved the nomination of the individual concerned. The County Superintendent shall then certify the action to the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, furnishing all information necessary to enable the State Superintendent to present the matter to the State Board of Education for approval or disapproval. The action of the State Board of Education shall then be certified by the State Superintendent to the County Superintendent. In the event the State Board concurs in the action of the County Board, the County Board may then proceed with contracting for the services of the supervisor. In the event the State Board finds the individual not qualified or for other reasons rejects the nomination of the individual concerned, the County Superintendent shall initiate action to secure the nomination of some other individual qualified for the position.

b. The dismissal of persons in supervisory positions in a county shall follow the procedure prescribed by law and by State Board Regulations for other instructional personnel with the additional requirement that approval of the State Board of Education shall be necessary before the dismissal of any supervisor may be effectuated.

Adopted July 3, 1947
Section 236.04 (1) (2)

State Board Regulation
relating to

ISOLATED SCHOOLS

(Adopted in accordance with the provisions of Section 236.04 (1) and (2), Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947)

1. Instruction units for all non-isolated schools with less than 120 pupils in average daily attendance will be calculated by dividing the average daily attendance of such schools by 27.

2. ISOLATED SCHOOLS. Any school having less than 120 pupils in average daily attendance shall be considered an isolated school for the purpose of computing instruction units when any of the following conditions are found to exist:

a. Elementary Schools

(1) School with 90 to 119 pupils inclusive in average daily attendance: If it is more than six miles by the nearest passable road from another elementary school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

(2) School with from 60 to 89 pupils inclusive in average daily attendance: If it is more than eight miles by the nearest passable road from another elementary school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(3) School with 59 pupils or less in average daily attendance: If it is more than ten miles by the nearest passable road from another elementary school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

(4) If more than 15% of the pupils to be transported would have to be on the bus for an average of more than one hour each morning or evening.

(5) Not more than one instruction unit shall be allowed for any one-teacher elementary school regardless of whether it is considered an isolated school; Provided, however, that an instruction unit will not be allotted for a school with an average daily attendance of less than nine, unless evidence is presented to the State Superintendent showing that consolidation of this school is impossible.

b. Junior High Schools

(1) School with 90 to 119 pupils inclusive in average daily attendance: If it is more than seven miles by the nearest passable road from another junior high school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

(2) School with from 60 to 89 pupils inclusive in average daily attendance: If it is more than nine miles by the nearest passable road from another junior high school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

(3) School with 59 pupils or less in average daily attendance: If it is more than eleven miles by the nearest passable road from another junior high school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

(4) If more than 25% of the pupils to be transported would have to be on the bus for an average of more than one hour each morning or evening.

(5) Unless a center has a ninth grade or is definitely organized as part of a high school it is to be considered an elementary school for purposes of computing instruction units and determining isolation.

c. Senior High Schools

(1) School with 90 to 119 pupils inclusive in average daily attendance: If it is more than eight miles by the nearest passable road from another senior high school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

(2) School with 60 to 89 pupils inclusive in average daily attendance: If it is more than ten miles by the nearest passable road from another senior high school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

(3) School with less than 59 pupils in average daily attendance: If it is more than twelve miles by the nearest passable road from another senior high school for the same race in which satisfactory facilities could be provided.

(4) If more than 25% of the pupils to be transported would have to be on the bus for an average of more than one hour each morning or evening.

(5) Unless a center has a twelfth grade it is to be considered as a junior high school for purposes of computing instruction units and determining isolation.

3. TEMPORARY ISOLATED SCHOOLS. Any school having less than 120 pupils in average daily attendance shall be considered a temporarily isolated school for the purpose of computing instruction units when satisfactory facilities cannot be provided at another appropriate center within the distances prescribed above, or when the pupils cannot be transported because of road conditions; provided, however, no school will be considered as temporarily isolated because of lack of building facilities after July 1, 1948.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Adopted July 21, 1953
Section 239.38
239.41
239.42

State Board Regulation
relating to

THE DISTRIBUTION OF GENERAL SCHOLARSHIPS

1. In accordance with provisions of Sections 239.38, 239.41 and 239.42, Florida Statutes as amended by the 1953 Legislature, the following distribution of scholarships is established:

	White	Negro	Total
Alachua	16	7	23
Baker	7	1	8
Bay	17	4	21
Bradford	8	2	10
Brevard	13	3	16
Broward	21	7	28
Calhoun	7	1	8
Charlotte	5	1	6
Citrus	6	2	8
Clay	10	2	12
Collier	6	2	8
Columbia	11	2	13
Dade	54	10	64
DeSoto	8	1	9
Dixie	5	1	6
Duval	40	12	52
Escambia	27	6	33
Flagler	4	1	5
Franklin	6	1	7
Gadsden	10	9	19
Gilchrist	4	1	5

The Distribution of General Scholarships (Continued)

	White	Negro	Total
Glades	3	1	4
Gulf	7	1	8
Hamilton	7	2	9
Hardee	9	1	10
Hendry	6	1	7
Hernando	7	1	8
Highlands	9	2	11
Hillsborough	42	6	48
Holmes	11	1	12
Indian River	9	2	11
Jackson	12	6	18
Jefferson	6	4	10
Lafayette	4	1	5
Lake	15	4	19
Lee	13	2	15
Leon	15	8	23
Levy	8	2	10
Liberty	3	1	4
Madison	8	4	12
Manatee	15	3	18
Marion	13	6	19
Martin	6	2	8
Monroe	15	2	17
Nassau	9	2	11
Okaloosa	15	1	16
Okeechobee	4	1	5
Orange	28	5	33
Osceola	9	1	10
Palm Beach	24	9	33
Pasco	12	2	14
Pinellas	34	4	38
Polk	29	5	34
Putnam	12	3	15

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Distribution of General Scholarships (Continued)

	White	Negro	Total
St. Johns	12	4	16
St. Lucie	11	3	14
Santa Rosa	12	1	13
Sarasota	15	2	17
Seminole	11	5	16
Sumter	8	2	10
Suwannee	11	2	13
Taylor	8	2	10
Union	7	2	9
Volusia	20	6	26
Wakulla	5	2	7
Walton	9	3	12
Washington	10	1	11
Total	843	207	1050
	80.3%	19.7%	100%

If any county shall receive more scholarships under this distribution than the total of its General, Representative, and Senatorial scholarship holders on the 1953-54 scholarship roll, the additional scholarships shall not be activated until it is ascertained that the appropriation for scholarships is sufficient for this purpose.

2. Within the allocation tentatively allotted each county, vacancies shall be declared in such a manner as to insure having, whenever possible, not less than twenty-five per cent of the total number of awards open to white and to Negro students respectively who would enter an approved Florida institution as freshmen during each and every year. Where there are sufficient vacancies in any county to allow such distribution, twenty-five per cent of the total number shall also be made available to persons falling in each of the following levels: sophomore, junior, senior.

3. A scholarship holder must register in the school, college, or department of education of an institution of higher learning located in Florida and approved by the State Board of Education for teacher education and certification.

4. The State Superintendent shall have authority to declare in which teaching fields applicants must train to be eligible for a scholarship.

5. A General Scholarship for the Preparation of Teachers may be renewed annually for a period of four years, but may not be used for work beyond the four-year degree level nor after the holder has received $1600.00 in scholarship funds.

6. Examinations to fill vacancies for General Scholarships are to be held twice a year, in the fall and in the spring. The State Superintendent of Public Instruction shall make all arrangements for these examinations and shall supervise the selection of winners, etc.

7. If for any reason, illness included, a scholarship holder must remain out of college for longer than one semester, he will forfeit his scholarship. If later he returns to college and desires scholarship aid, he must re-apply by submitting a new application for a declared vacancy. An exception may be made in the case of a scholarship holder called into the Armed Services. If the veteran desires scholarship reinstatement upon his return from service, his scholarship may be restored to him if a vacancy exists in his county.

8. If on July 1 of any year, quotas for white or Negro students with respect to General Scholarships for the Preparation of Teachers remain unfilled in any county, and if upon investigation by the State Superintendent it is found that such conditions exist because of (1) a dearth of persons interested in making application or (2) the failure of applicants to make the required minimum score, the State Superintendent may declare such vacancies to exist on a state-wide basis. The state-wide vacancies declared should then be awarded in the following manner:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

a. A roster shall be compiled containing the names of eligible persons making the minimum passing score who failed to receive an award on the latest examination.

b. From such roster, in order of rank of excellence and in keeping with the college-year level for which the vacancies placed in the state-wide pool exist, awards are to be made.

c. Persons receiving such awards will be permitted to continue them from year to year, as provided by law, until the termination of the scholarship; at the end of this period, such vacancies shall be again restored to the counties to which they were originally allocated.

9. This repeals paragraph 2, pages 225-26 of State Board Regulation relating to Summer School Scholarships and Scholarships for Preparation of Teachers, pages 224-26, adopted July 6, 1949.

Adopted July 21, 1953
Sections: 239.19
239.38-239.44

State Board Regulation
relating to

SCHOLARSHIP COMMITTEE

The State Scholarship Committee shall be composed of eight members appointed by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction. The membership shall be the dean of education of each of four colleges or universities approved for teacher education for white teachers, the president or dean of education of one college or university approved for teacher education for Negro teachers, the dean or the director of one approved junior college, and two members of the State Department of Education.

Two members shall be appointed for a one year term, two for two years, two for three years, and two for four years. Thereafter each member shall be appointed for a term of four years.

Any vacancy shall be filled for the unexpired term by appointment by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

The committee shall elect its chairman and recorder for terms not to exceed two years.

The duties of the committee shall be to formulate policies and make recommendations that will add to the effectiveness of the scholarship program.

The committee shall meet at least twice a year and at such other times as the chairman shall consider necessary.

The committee may invite other officials concerned with the administration of the scholarship program to meet with the committee at any meeting.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Adopted November 16, 1948
Sections 239.41 thru
239.44
239.19 thru
239.24

State Board Regulation
relating to

SCHOLARSHIPS FOR PREPARATION OF TEACHERS AND HOUSE AND SENATORIAL SCHOLARSHIPS

(Adopted in accordance with the provisions of Sections 239.41 thru 239.44 and Sections 239.19 thru 239.24, Florida Statutes, as amended by Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947)

The method and manner of handling and collecting scholarship notes which may become in default shall be as follows:

The President of each institution of higher learning where the scholarship was held shall give such assistance as may be reasonably requested by the State Treasurer in the collection of scholarship notes which have become payable by reason of the scholarship holder failing to perform services in satisfaction of his scholarship note.

Adopted July 3, 1947
Section 242.05 (1)

State Board Regulation
relating to

STATE SUPERVISORY SERVICES

(Adopted in accordance with the provisions of Section 242.05(1), Florida Statutes, 1941, as amended by Chapter 23726, Laws of Florida, Acts of 1947)

1. The use of State Supervisory Funds shall be in accordance with a budget for a program planned as a part of the State Department of Education services for supervision of white and Negro schools as recommended by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

2. Recommendations for nomination of persons to fill State Supervisory positions shall be submitted to the State Board of Education by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction. In no case may any individual be certified, nominated, or paid any salary from State Supervisory Funds who does not meet the qualifications prescribed by the State Board of Education for holding supervisory positions of the type being filled.

3. Approval by the State Board of Education shall be necessary before any State Supervisory Funds may be paid to any person recommended and employed in accordance with the preceding section; approval of both the State Superintendent of Public Instruction and the State Board of Education shall be necessary before the dismissal of any supervisor employed through use of State Supervisory Funds may be effectuated.

4. Included as a part of the administrative plan for supervision the State Superintendent shall file with the recommendation a brief statement outlining (1) the duty to be performed by the supervisor; (2) the total annual salary; (3) the amount to be paid for travel; and, (4) qualifications of supervisor to be employed.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

5. The qualifications and duties of State Supervisors shall be in accordance with the types of qualifications and the duties as listed for County Supervisors as would be applicable to work on the State level.

Adopted February 14, 1950
Sections 234.01 thru 234.25
and related sections.

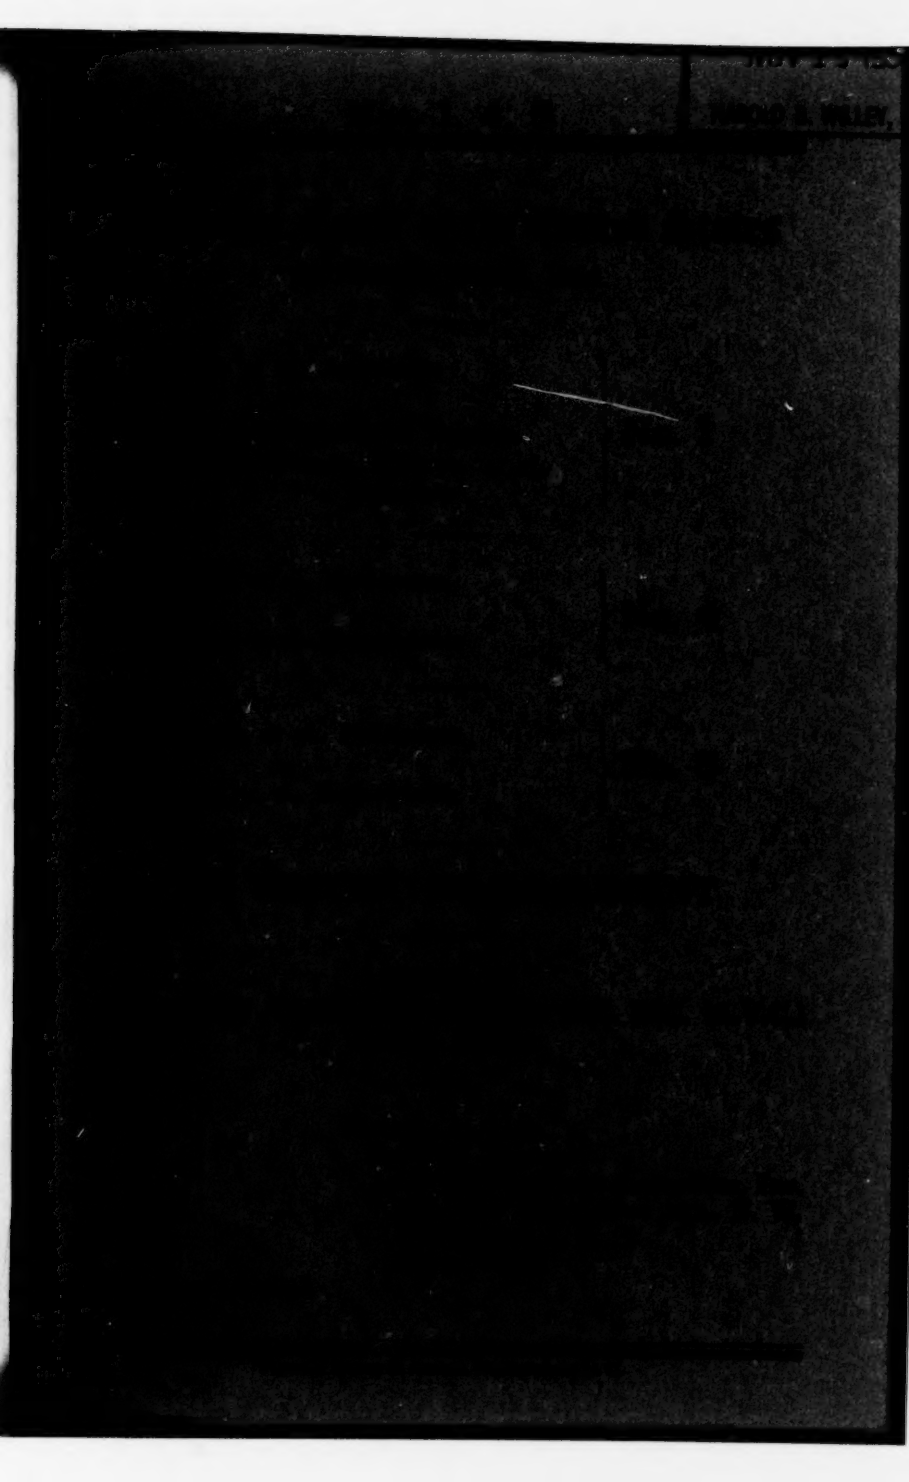
State Board Regulation
relating to

TRANSPORTATION OF PUPILS

(Adopted in accordance with Chapter 234 and related sections of Florida Statutes)

* * * *

(8) The land sections shall be computed separately for white and Negro races.



INDEX

	Page
Preliminary Statement	1
The framework within which the questions should be answered	2
Summary of answers to the questions	4
QUESTION 4	7
I. Analysis of methods to bring segregated school systems into conformity with the Constitution.	7
A. As to children now in a segregated school..	7
(1) Normal geographic school districting..	7
(2) Voluntary transfer to unsegregated schools	9
B. As to children who enter a particular school for the first time	13
II. When the decrees should become effective.....	16
III. "Gradualism" is not necessary to achieve smooth and effective desegregation	19
QUESTION 5	31
The terms of the decrees which we suggest.....	31
Conclusion	33

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES:

Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954) 2, 3, 25
Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)..2, 3, 17, 24
Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60 (1917) 3, 29
Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)..... 29
Commercial Corp. v. New York Barge Co., 314 U.S. 104 (1941) 18
District of Columbia v. John R. Thompson Co., Inc., 346 U.S. 100 (1953) 20
Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941) 13
Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U.S. 284 (1927)..... 8

Page

Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951) 29
Gebhart v. Belton, No. 5, this Term 26
Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230 (1907) 16
Ibid., 237 U.S. 474 and 678 (1915) 16
Ibid., 240 U.S. 650 (1916) 16
Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939) 29
Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U.S. 321 (1944) 16
Henderson v. United States, 339 U.S. 816 (1950) 3, 30
Hernandez v. Texas, 347 U.S. 475 (1954) 3
Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U.S. 24 (1948) 17
Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290 (1951) 29
McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 235 U.S. 151 (1914) 3
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U.S. 637 (1950) 3, 16
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337 (1938) 3
Mitchell v. United States, 313 U.S. 80 (1941) 3, 29
Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86 (1923) 29
Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U.S. 373 (1946) 30
Nebraska v. Wyoming, 325 U.S. 589 (1945) 2
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) 8
Railway Mail Ass'n. v. Corsi, 326 U.S. 88 (1945) 17
Rossi v. United States, 289 U.S. 89 (1933) 18
Schnell v. The Vallescura, 293 U.S. 296 (1934) 18
Selma, Rome & Dalton R. Co. v. United States, 139 U.S. 560 (1891) 18
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948) 3, 17, 29
Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U.S. 631 (1948) 3
Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873) 17
Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303 (1880) 17
Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1950) 3, 30
Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949) 29
United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106 (1911) 16
United States v. Fleischman, 339 U.S. 349 (1950) 18
United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U.S. 131 (1948). 2

MISCELLANEOUS:

Ashmore, The Negro and the Schools (1954) 30
Bankhead, Tallulah, What is so Rare as a Willie Mays, Look Magazine, vol. 18, no. 19, p. 52 (Sept. 21, 1954) 23
Berlingske Aftenavis (Copenhagen, Denmark) 13
Brief for AVC, Nos. 1, 8, 10 (1953 Term) 29
Brief for appellees in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1949 Term, No. 44) 30
Brief for Attorney General of Florida 2, 12, 29
Brief for Attorneys General of 11 States in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1949 Term, No. 44) 30
Brief for Rep. Sam Hobbs in Henderson v. United States, 339 U.S. 816 (1949 Term, No. 25) 30

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Page

Brief for State of Virginia in Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U.S. 373 (1945 Term, No. 704) 30
Bustard, The New Jersey Story: The Development of Racially Integrated Public Schools, 21 J. of Neg. Ed. 275 (Summer, 1952) 19, 34
Clark, Desegregation: An Appraisal of the Evidence, 9 Journal of Social Issues, No. 4, pp. 1-76 (1953).....19, 28
Comment, Racial Violence and Civil Rights Law Enforcement, 18 U. of Chi. L. Rev. 769 (1951)..... 30
99 Cong. Rec. A1982-84 20
99 Cong. Rec. A5384-87 19
Davis, Negro Employment: A Progress Report, 48 Fortune 102 (July 1952) 21
Delaware State Board of Education, Some Items and Suggestions Relative to Desegregation Plans, (August 26, 1954) 9
Die Transvaler 13
Frank, Can Courts Erase the Color Line?, 21 J. of Negro Educ. 304 (1952) 30
Freedom to Serve, Rept. of President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Services (Govt. Printing Off., May 22, 1950) 20, 34
Henderson, The Negro in Sports (1949) 23
Hope, Efforts to Eliminate Racial Discrimination in Industry—With Particular Reference to the South, 23 J. of Neg. Educ. 262 (Summer 1954) 21
Indritz, Racial Ramparts in the Nation's Capital, 41 Georgetown L.J. 297 (March 1953) 20
Integration in the Armed Services, Progress Report of the Civilian Assistant to the Secretary of Defense (Aug. 31, 1954) 20, 23
Journal d'Egypte (Cairo, Egypt, May 30, 1954)..... 13
Kondrashov, section A, Izvestia (June 23, 1954) 13
Leflar and Davis, Segregation in the Public Schools—1953, 67 Harv. L. Rev. 377 (January 1954) 30
National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service, Release, Sept. 13, 1954 23
National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., The Churches and Segregation (June 11, 1952) 22
Ibid., Announcement of May 19, 1954 22
New York Times, pp. 1, 74 (Oct. 3, 1954) 24
Nichols, Breakthrough on the Color Front (1954) 20
President Eisenhower, Statement of Nov. 11, 1953 21
Ruchames, Race, Jobs and Politics (1953) 21
Southern Regional Council, List of Integrated Colleges and Professional Schools (Oct. 1954) 23
Ibid., New South, vol. 9, no. 8 (Aug. 1954) 22
Ibid., Schools in the South, (June, 1954) 22

Page

Southern School News, Vol. 1, No. 1 (Sept. 3, 1954) ..18, 24, 26
Ibid., No. 2 (Oct. 1, 1954) 11, 24, 26
Statesman, (New Delhi, India, May 20, 1954) 13
Time Magazine, Industry—Through the Color Barrier, p. 104 (March 22, 1954) 21
Ibid., The U. S. Negro, 1953, pp. 55-58 (May 11, 1953) (reprinted, 99 Cong. Rec. A5384-87) 19
Ibid., When the Barriers Fall, p. 40 (Aug. 31, 1953) 19
28 U.S.C. (1952 ed.) sec. 2106 16
U. S. Information Agency report, Oct. 6, 1954 13
Washington Post & Times Herald, p. 7 (May 23, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 17 (May 26, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 19 (June 10, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 18 (June 24, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 1 (July 2, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 20M (Sept. 12, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 1 (Sept. 14, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 18 (Sept. 16, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 1 (Sept. 17, 1954) 26
Ibid., pp. 1, 18 (Sept. 22, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 19 (Sept. 25, 1954) 26
Ibid., p. 8 (Oct. 19, 1954) 27
Ibid., p. 24M (Oct. 31, 1954) 23
Washington Star, p. A-2 (Oct. 3, 1954) 28
Ibid., p. B-1 (Nov. 1, 1954) 23
Wertham, Psychiatric Observations on Abolition of School Segregation, 26 J. of Educ. Soc. 333 (March 1953) 19
9 Wigmore on Evidence (3rd ed.), sec. 2486, p. 275 18
Wilmington Journal—Every Evening, p. 1 (June 22, 1954) 26
Ibid., pp. 1, 4 (Sept. 21, 1954) 26
Ibid., Editorial (Oct. 14, 1954) 27
Yorkshire Post (London, England, May 20, 1954) 13

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

Brown, et al., Appellants
v.
Board of Education of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, et al., Appellees — No. 1

Bolling, et al., Petitioners
v.
Sharpe, et al., Respondents — No. 4

Gebhart, et al., Petitioners
v.
Belton, et al., Respondents — No. 5

ON SECOND RE-ARGUMENT

BRIEF OF AMERICAN VETERANS COMMITTEE, INC. (A.V.C.)

Amicus Curiae

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

The American Veterans Committee, Inc. is a nation-wide organization composed of veterans who served honorably in the Armed Forces of the United States during World War I, World War II, or the Korean Conflict. Our interest in the Public School Segregation Cases was explicated in the briefs we filed on the previous arguments in the 1952 and 1953 Terms.

On May 17, 1954, this Court ruled that racial segregation in public schools violates the Constitutional guarantee of equal protection expressed in the Fourteenth Amendment, and implied in the Fifth Amendment, to the Constitution. Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U. S. 483; Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U. S. 497. The cases were continued for further argument on Questions 4 and 5 set forth in this Court's order of June 6, 1953 (345 U. S. 972, 973).

THE FRAMEWORK WITHIN WHICH THE QUESTIONS SHOULD BE ANSWERED

It is, of course, not appropriate for this Court to try to anticipate the legality of every detail of every desegregation plan which, in the context of the particular pressures and attitudes influencing their members, each of the thousands of school boards may evolve in administering their school systems so as to comply with the requirements of the Constitution. Cf. United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U. S. 131, 163-164 (1948); Nebraska v. Wyoming, 325 U. S. 589, 616-617 (1945).

On the other hand, we think this Court should indicate in its decrees the principles underlying any method of desegregation, compliance with which will satisfy the Constitutional prohibition against racial segregation. This Court's order for reargument on Questions 4 and 5 has stimulated widespread interest in knowing what desegregation methods this Court would approve. Moreover, it is entirely possible that if this Court simply remands the cases "for further proceedings" without indicating the guide lines of acceptable desegregation methods, the way would be open for prejudiced school boards to remit each applicant for nonsegregated education, despite the Brown decision, to the arduous, tortuous and time-consuming process of prosecuting a separate suit in which the court of first instance would take over the administrative tasks properly belonging to the school board. That, indeed, is what the Attorney General of Florida urges in his Brief, pp. 61-65, sec. II. But that course might in some areas excise the meaning from the Constitutional right, and would in some other areas open the door to a chaotic pulling-and-tugging in which the lower courts would be hard put to insist on applying the law rather than personal judgment concerning the community's "willingness to accept" the requirements of equal justice under law.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In our opinion, the lode-star in answering Questions 4 and 5 should be the principles inherent in this Court's ruling of May 17, 1954—(1) that under our Constitution all children, of any racial ancestry, including both those now in the public schools and those who may come into the public schools in the future, should and must be permitted to enter the same public schools which children labeled "white" could enter, and (2) that no public school authorities may, in their administration of the public school system, impose any distinctions or accord different treatment, by segregation or otherwise, on the basis of race, color or ancestry.[1]

---

[1] That ruling blends with the body of the law. This court has uniformly and repeatedly held that the right to be free from racial discrimination by governmental authority is a "personal" right, not one to be merged with those of all others of the same race and balanced against the claims of all white persons averaged as a group. Henderson v. United States, 339 U.S. 816, 825-826 (1950); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 22 (1948); Mitchell v. United States, 313 U.S. 80, 97 (1941); Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60, 80 (1917); McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 235 U.S. 151, 161-162 (1914); Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337, 351 (1938). The Constitutional requirement of equal protection of the laws applies to any person subject to group discrimination because of his identifiable racial or ethnic origin. Hernandez v. Texas, 347 U.S. 475 (1954). Since public education on a segregated basis is not equal education, he is entitled to such education on an unsegregated basis. McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U.S. 637 (1950); Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954); Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954). Moreover, he is entitled to receive such equal education, and it must be provided for him, "as soon as" it is provided for the white person. Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U.S. 631, 633 (1948). These decisions were epitomized when this Court unanimously characterized the right to secure public education without racial discrimination as "personal and present." Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629, 635 (1950).

SUMMARY OF ANSWERS TO THE QUESTIONS

The best way to take racism out of the schools (where it "has no place") and to let the schools merge into the neighborhood (where racial agglomeration may reflect voluntary association), is by assigning children on the basis of geographic school boundaries based solely on residential proximity and accessibility to the school. But, in the absence of special considerations, the Constitution does not necessarily compel a school board either to require such boundaries or to permit or prevent choice of school by the child. If, and so long as, racial factors are not involved, the method used is for the school board, not a court, to determine.

As to children now in school, the school board's obligation to administer orderly school programs without future regard to their race can be satisfied by a second method—i.e., by affording to each such child the opportunity to obtain, upon application, admittance or transfer to, and education in, a school near his residence without being subject to racial distinctions. This voluntary application method permits adjustment to desegregation which, without denying any child's Constitutional rights, will lean heavily on the readiness of the local community and, in areas of diffidence to voluntary mixing, will permit more gradual desegregation than would the use of compulsory school boundaries. The essence of this voluntary method is that the child's right to admission to any school may not be denied on the basis of race; the process of adjustment to a nonsegregated school system will begin and be effected as such applications are made.

Any other method of gradual adjustment to a nonsegregated system is either not permissible or inappropriate under the judicial process. In any event, this Court should specifically reject the notion that, until such time as the "hard core of public opinion has softened to the extent that there can be at least some measure of acceptance on the part of a majority of the people," school boards may reject applications for equal education. Adoption of such a proposal would be worse than reinstatement of the "separate but equal" doctrine.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

With respect to students new to a particular school, the first alternative (assignment according to residential boundaries) will, but the second alternative (assignment on the basis of a voluntary application) will not, comply with the Constitution. The latter method implies that in the absence of an application, race or color will determine the assignment of the student. But by applying race or color in the assignment of new students to a school, the structure of segregation in public education will be strengthened and entrenched, instead of gradual adjustment occurring "from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions." To prevent such addition to the structure of racial segregation in public education, the school authorities should be required to assign new students either on the basis of normal residential school boundaries or, where there are no such boundaries, on the basis of reasonable criteria which do not include race or color. In making assignments not based on geographic boundaries, the school board may, if it wishes, permit the student to choose which school he will attend, but may not, in the absence of such choice by the student, assign him on the basis of his race or color or require him to file an application as a prerequisite to obtaining unsegregated education.

The decrees should become effective at the beginning of the school term immediately following the date of the decrees, but the court of first instance should be permitted to allow an additional school term if the school authorities show that unusual conditions involving technical and administrative difficulties require additional time for effective desegregation.

It is not clear whether this Court, in prescribing the time when the decree embodying these principles shall become effective, may permit extensive delay where such delay would destroy Constitutional rights which are personal and present. In any event, the public interest does not require extensive delay.

As shown by experience in many areas of daily life, the fears that desegregation will cause widespread violence are largely wraiths and myths. Such experience also shows that rapid desegregation is often smoother and easier than segmentalized or gradual desegregation. The lag in the law, the inhibiting effect of mores and extra-legal pressures, the accumulated racial patterns of residence, and other factors, will provide ample "gradualism" without judicial espousal of "gradualism" as a legal doctrine. Isolated instances of hooliganism, stimulated by the current uncertainty as to the nature of this Court's decree, are not representative. In any event, the possibility of local friction is legally irrelevant in determining Constitutional rights.

This Court should not specify all details, either itself or through a special master, but should in its decrees include the principles mentioned above, enjoin the school authorities from considering race in administering school programs, and require the courts of first instance to deal initially with specific problems presented either by the school authorities or by those claiming deprivation of Constitutional rights under the general principles of this Court's decree.

This Brief suggests specific terms for inclusion in this Court's decree.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

QUESTION 4

"4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"

I. ANALYSIS OF METHODS TO BRING SEGREGATED SCHOOL SYSTEMS INTO CONFORMITY WITH THE CONSTITUTION

A. As to children now in a segregated school

In so far as concerns children who are now in a segregated school, there are two possible approaches to bringing the school system into conformity with the Constitution while at the same time not denying to any individual his personal and present rights under the Constitution.

(1) Normal geographic school districting

This Court's rulings of May 17, 1954, say that the many children who are now in segregated schools are being denied their Constitutional rights to equal education. This does not mean, and it is not our position, that school boards are under a constitutional mandate to go out looking for interracial school populations.

The duty of the school boards, we think, is solely to maintain orderly school programs without regard to race or color, to refrain from denying to any child admission into any school, and to refrain from treating any person in the school system differently, at any time, on the basis of race or color.

One way in which the school boards can fulfill this duty is by prescribing geographical school boundaries based, not on race, but on the students' residential proximity and accessibility to the school, and by requiring all students within such boundaries to go to that school. The compulsory school attendance laws would thus simply cause the school to reflect the composition of the neighborhood. If the neighborhood is racially mixed, the school will be racially mixed; if the neighborhood population is all-white or all-colored, the school population will have the same hue.

We think, indeed, that this is, from an educational and community standpoint, the desirable way to end the racial aspects of public education with respect to the students. It would shift the issue of racial composition from the public schools, where, as this Court said in the Brown case, it "has no place," to the neighborhood, where racial agglomeration, if not imposed by governmental or other outside influences, may simply reflect the tendencies of voluntary association. Children who live and play in the same neighborhood would study together in the same school.

Moreover, assigning children to schools according to their residence within normal geographic school zones is the easiest way to operate a normal public school system without racial distinctions as to pupils. It is a factual, impersonal, and traditional criterion in administering public schools. Not only does it reflect the neighborhood pattern, but it also permits easier programming of school and community needs, and it avoids the imbalance between schools which results from unrestrained migration of pupils.

Nevertheless, in the absence of special considerations, we do not contend that the Constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the laws necessarily requires that boards of education be compelled to admit all children into schools solely on geographic basis, or that the boards be compelled to permit, or be enjoined from permitting, each child to select or transfer to any public school he wishes to attend. Cf. Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (1925); Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284, 298 (1927). The school board may permit children to go to any school within the public school system, as in Baltimore, Maryland, or require them to go to the nearest school within a rigidly prescribed residence zone, as in some other cities. The choice of method is, in general, a matter of public school administration which is committed to the sound judgment of the school officials. So long as such judgment applies equally to both white and colored children similarly situated and is not based on racial factors, it is not a matter of constitutional concern.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(2) Voluntary transfer to unsegregated schools

The second way that the school boards could afford to each child then in a school his Constitutional right not to be subjected to compulsory racial segregation in public education, is by permitting him to continue in that school or to transfer to another school, the board acting solely on the basis of applicable scholastic considerations without regard to race. If, as in Baltimore, there are no prescribed neighborhood school boundaries, (except for students at a few overcrowded schools), the student could apply to transfer to any school within the school system. In cities or places where neighborhood school boundaries (which are not based on race) are prescribed, his application to transfer would, of course, be limited to the school within whose boundaries he resides.[2]

---

[2] Compare the similar approach adopted by the Delaware State Board of Education on August 26, 1954, in its memorandum Some Items and Suggestions Relative to Desegregation Plans, mimeographed, p. 3:

> "If a school district has more than one building serving a given grade, attendance at a particular school could be decided by choice of the student provided, in the event of insufficient space at a particular school, preference should be given students residing nearest the school in question.
>
> "The State Board of Education believes that constitutional requirements are met either by integration within the fixed attendance areas or integration based on a single attendance area wherein freedom of choice is exercised to the extent that physical facilities will allow. The decision as to which type of attendance plan is established in a school district ultimately rests with the local board of education."

True, it might be said that to require a child to file an application in order to get the equal education to which he is Constitutionally entitled, is itself to impose a burden on the child, and that the school board, not the child, ought to initiate what must be done to provide equality of education in the Constitutional sense. However, in view of the considerable administrative adjustments and time that would be required to turn the massive ship of segregated public schools into its newly charted course, it is not unreasonable to ask those who are now in that boat to exercise their "personal" Constitutional right by applying for admittance to a school wherein they will be admitted and educated without racial segregation or other racial distinctions.

One advantage of this voluntary application method is that, without denying the Constitutional rights of any individual, the adjustments made under it would lean heavily on the state of readiness that each local community may have for integration. Thus, where there is either inertia, or a personal or scholastic reason which leads children to desire to remain in their school, or, in some areas, a diffidence to voluntary mixing of school children heretofore separately educated, the method here suggested would permit a more gradual integration than would occur where compulsory school boundaries are invoked to aid integration. This, indeed, has been the experience in several of the public school systems where students were permitted, in September 1954, to attend the school nearest their home, or, subject to the priority of neighborhood children to attend particular schools which are overcrowded, any school they chose to attend. E.g., in Baltimore, Md., where 39 percent of the 141,000 children are Negro, only about 2.5 percent of the total Negro enrollment chose to go to schools formerly attended only by white children; in Springfield, Mo., almost half of the Negro children chose to remain in the school they previously attended; in Wichita, Kans., only small numbers of Negroes chose to attend schools which formerly served only white students. Southern School News, vol. 1, no. 2, pp. 8, 10, 16 (Oct. 1, 1954).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On the other hand, one of the disadvantages of the voluntary application method would be that it permits substituting the irresponsibility and uncertainty of "mores" (and perhaps extra-legal social or economic pressures) in lieu of orderly application of the compulsory school laws in the context of Constitutional requirements.

The essence of this voluntary application method is that any child now in a segregated school should have the right to apply at any time for admission to a school, at the beginning of a school term, on the basis of proper scholastic criteria which do not include race or ancestry, and that the school board must be enjoined from denying his application solely on the basis of race, color or ancestry. Thus, the process of adjustment to a nonsegregated school system will begin and be effected as such applications are made and granted. Whatever problems may arise can and should be dealt with then.

Every other method of "gradual" adjustment to a nonsegregated system which we have considered (i.e., which does not require or permit education in a school near one's residence without regard to race or ancestry) would either violate the personal and present right of particular persons, or provide prejudiced boards with an excuse for interminably dragging their heels, or both, or are not, we think, appropriate for judicial action. Thus, procedures such as integrating only a limited or specific number of schools, or grades, per year, would disregard the rights and needs of individual children in other schools, or grades, who seek nonsegregated education. Moreover, judicial authorization of such arbitrary methods would encourage evasiveness and procrastination in conforming to the requirements of the Constitution. Also, clearly, gradual desegregation which is based solely on prior change of community attitudes toward desegregation, through use of such techniques as intercultural education and mass communication, training of teachers, administrators and police, etc., not only is disregardful of the present rights of the children seeking unsegregated education but also is beyond the scope of the litigious process and of the judicial power.

In any event, we urge that this Court totally reject the notion advanced by the Attorney General of Florida (Brief, item (5) on p. 63) that the school board be allowed to refuse a Negro child's application for admission to non-segregated education if there is "such a strong degree of sincere opposition and sustained hostility on the part of the public" [apparently he means that portion which is prejudiced against Negroes] as to lead the school authorities to believe that approval of the application would cause "a disruption of the school system" or create "emotional responses among the children which would seriously interfere with their education." That proposal, keyed as it is to criteria of the vaguest sort, means only that the guardianship of Constitutional guarantees should be surrendered to prejudice, mob hostility, and the thoughtlessness of immature children emotionally titillated by parental racism.

Furthermore, such a proposal would be worse than reinstatement of the "separate but equal" doctrine. To prove that the "hard core of public opinion has softened to the extent that there can be at least some measure of acceptance on the part of a majority of the people," which is what the Attorney General of Florida says a Negro child must prove before he can obtain equal education (Brief, p. 43), would be infinitely more onerous than to prove inequality of physical facilities. Such a proposal would relegate Constitutional rights to popularity polls in which the deciding ballots would be cast by those who are most biased and least law-abiding. Indeed, if that proposal were adopted, this Court's rulings of May 17, 1954 that racial segregation in public education is unconstitutional would become, in the words of the late Mr. Justice Jackson,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"only a promise to the ear to be broken to the hope, a teasing illusion like a munificent bequest in a pauper's will." Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 160, 186 (1941).[3]

In any event, the fears which underlie the proposal of the Attorney General of Florida are not legally relevant, and even if they were, part III of our Brief points out that there is no substantial basis for them.

B. As to children who enter a particular school for the first time

Somewhat different, and special, considerations are applicable to students who are ready to enter a particular school for the first time (either by virtue of beginning public school education, transfer of residence, or graduation from a lower level school). The first alternative—

---

[3] We cannot over-emphasize the importance of fulfilling the promise of May 17, 1954. The whole world has been discussing it. Typical of World opinion this side of the Iron Curtain (except in South Africa where Die Transvaler deplored the decisions) was the editorial comment in Journal d'Egypte (Cairo, Egypt, May 30, 1954): "This human victory which America has just won over herself brings her a world wide prestige far superior to any that a demonstration of her military or financial strength might have brought." The Berlingske Aftenavis of Copenhagen, Denmark, said that this Court's decisions of May 17 were a "victory . . . for the United States as a pioneer for human freedom and equality." The conservative Yorkshire Post in London predicted (May 20, 1954) that the decisions "will help stem Communism among the colored peoples of Asia and other parts of the world." The Statesman of New Delhi, India, emphasized (May 20, 1954) the contrast between this Court's decisions and the apartheid madness of Prime Minister Malan in South Africa, but cautioned "it remains to be seen how and when the decision will be enforced."

On the other hand, Soviet propaganda has stressed "how small the practical value" of the decisions is, and that this Court, by this very reargument, "prepares for itself the way to a retreat." Article by S. Kondrashov, section A, Izvestia (June 23, 1954). The Milford, Delaware, incident served as a further opportunity for Moscow to charge that this Court's ruling of May 17 "was only meant for publicity" and that the authorities "had no intention of enforcing it." U. S. Information Agency report, Oct. 6, 1954.

assigning them on the basis of normal geographic school boundaries—would satisfy the Constitution as to them just as it would for children now in school. But unlike the case of children now in the school, to apply the second alternative—the voluntary application method—to new students would probably tend to strengthen and further entrench segregation in public education. This is because the method of voluntary application implies that in the absence of an application the student would be assigned to a public school on a racial basis.

It is one thing to say that, in light of the considerable administrative adjustments and time necessary to shift to wholly nonsegregated operation, a school board may require students who were assigned to that school prior to this Court's decrees in these cases, even though on a racial basis, to continue to attend that school unless they voluntarily apply for transfer to another school. It is quite different to say that a school board may, after this Court's decrees, assign children to a school on the basis of race who have never previously been in that school.

Insofar as concerns the student who is ready to enter a particular school for the first time, if the school board assigns him to a school on the basis of his race and for the purpose of maintaining racial uniformity in the particular school, rather than exclusively on the basis of proper scholastic criteria (age, educational level, residential proximity and accessibility to the school, etc.) which take no account of race, it is at once apparent that he is being subjected to unconstitutional racial distinctions.

Even more important, it is also apparent that such action extends and further entrenches the structure of racial segregation in education and thus makes it more difficult, rather than easier, to change "from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions."

To prevent public education from miring deeper in the bog of unconstitutional racial segregation, the school board must be enjoined from imposing additional segregation.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

This does not mean that the school board may not permit the student, where normal geographic boundaries are not prescribed, to choose which school he will attend. But it does mean that in the absence of such choice by the student, the school board may neither assign him on the basis of his race or color, nor require him to file an application as a prerequisite to obtaining unsegregated education.

Accordingly, in order to effect even the minimum compliance with the Constitution, this Court should, in its decrees:

(a) permit the school authorities to assign children to school in accordance with normal geographic school boundaries which are based on residential proximity and accessibility to the school, and not on race;

(b) prescribe that the school authorities, with respect to children then in school, shall not on the basis of race or color:

(i) either deny admission to any student who applies to transfer to a school within the normal residential school boundaries of which he lives;

(ii) or, if no boundaries are prescribed for a school, deny admission to any student who applies to transfer to that school;

(c) prescribe that the school authorities, with respect to any child who will, after the date of this Court's decree, be new to any particular school (either by beginning public school education, transfer of residence or graduation from a lower level school):

(i) shall assign such student to the school within the normal residential boundaries of which he lives, or

(ii) if no boundaries are prescribed, shall assign such student to a school on the basis of reasonable criteria, as determined by the school authorities, which do not include the factor of race. In making such assignments, the school board may, if it wishes, permit the student to choose which school he will attend, but shall not, in the absence of such choice, assign him on the basis of race or color, or require him to file an application as a prerequisite to obtaining unsegregated education.

(d) enjoin the school authorities from segregating or otherwise according different treatment to any person within a school on the basis of race or color. McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637 (1950).

The adoption of these principles will, we believe, provide a normal and impersonal method (1) for gradual desegregation which (2) recognizes the Constitutional rights of the children, and (3) affords no excuse by which prejudiced school boards may evade or interminably delay compliance with the Constitution.

II. WHEN THE DECREES SHOULD BECOME EFFECTIVE

In our opinion the decrees here suggested should be effective as of the beginning of the school term immediately following the date of the decrees, with provision for delay for an additional school term where the school board proves to the court of first instance that unusual technical or administrative difficulties require such delay.

Whether the equity power of this Court is sufficient to allow more extensive time for gradual adjustment to a nonsegregated system if more time is deemed necessary in the public interest is not entirely free from doubt. Of course this Court has power to consider, and has considered, the exigencies of the public interest in prescribing the time for compliance with its decrees. See 28 U.S.C. (1952 ed.) sec. 2106; Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U.S. 321, 329-330 (1944); Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230, 239 (1907); ibid., 237 U.S. 474 and 678 (1915); ibid., 240 U.S. 650 (1916); United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106, 185, 187-188 (1911).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

But all of these cases involved issues and rights other than the "personal and present" constitutional right to equal protection of the law. In those cases, delay in effectuating the decree did not forever destroy a person's civil right to have equal access to something which he could get only within a limited time or not at all. The present cases, on the other hand, involve injury to the children which "may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone." Brown v. Board of Education, at p. 494. To delay fulfillment of, and thereby to destroy, their Constitutional rights seems inconsistent with the equity function to protect the very Constitutional right (freedom from governmentally imposed racial discrimination) which was "the matter of primary concern" for the Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment. Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 23 (1948); Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U.S. 24, 32 (1948); Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 306, 310 (1880); Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36, 70-72, 81 (1873); Railway Mail Ass'n. v. Corsi, 326 U.S. 88, 94 (1945).

In any event, what we say (see Part III of this Brief) is that the public interest does not require extensive delay in making effective the terms of the decrees as suggested above. We believe that the period between the issuance of the decrees and the opening of the next school term should provide ample time to make necessary changes in records and facilities, personnel assignments, and other purely administrative changes to a non-racial basis. Such administrative adjustments did not prove great obstacles in the desegregation programs of the relatively complex school systems of Washington, D. C., Baltimore, Md., Topeka, Kans., Wilmington, Dela., the States of New Jersey, Indiana, Illinois, and the many other areas where public school desegregation has been proceeding smoothly, effectively, and rapidly.

There may be unusual technical or administrative difficulties because of which one or some school boards may need additional time to change from a segregated to a nonsegregated school system.[4] The decrees of this Court should therefore authorize the court of first instance to allow additional time for such adjustment, but not in excess of one school term at any one time—such additional time to be granted only when the court of first instance, in hearings at which the school authorities have the burden of proof by substantial and probative evidence, is convinced that because of unusual conditions involving technical or administrative difficulties such additional time is clearly needed to enable effective transition to a nonsegregated school system. Each such further extension of time for an additional school term should be predicated on the facts and circumstances then existing as proved by the school authorities in subsequent hearings before the court of first instance.[5] Opposition and hostility by part of the community to desegregation of schools should not

---

[4] E.g., in Dover, Delaware, it may be necessary to consolidate the separate board which administers the new high school for Negroes with the Dover Board of Education which administers the other public schools in Dover, both those for white students and those for Negro students. Southern School News, Vol. 1, No. 1, p. 3, col. 4 (Sept. 3, 1954). In some cases, also, revision of school district boundaries, to apportion children between schools on the basis of residence proximity and accessibility, may require legislative action. Ibid. Col. 5.

[5] It is of course proper and fair that the school authorities (who administer the school system, formulate its programs and schedules, have better opportunity to know the facts, and claim an exemption from the requirement of the law), should have the burden of proving why any child desiring nonsegregated education should be denied that right beyond the beginning of the next school term, and of showing how its plans for more gradual adjustment to a nonsegregated system could be justified under the Constitution and in the light of pertinent circumstances. See 9 Wigmore on Evidence (3rd ed.), sec. 2486, p. 275, and cases cited, n. 3, including 1953 Supplement. See also United States v. Fleischman, 339 U.S. 349, 360-361 (1950); Commercial Corp. v. New York Barge Co., 314 U.S. 104, 111 (1941); Schnell v. The Vallescura, 293 U.S. 296, 304 (1934); Rossi v. United States, 289 U.S. 89, 91-92 (1933); Selma, Rome & Dalton R. Co. v. United States, 139 U.S. 560, 566 (1891).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

in themselves be considered as constituting unusual conditions warranting delay in complying with the court's decrees.

III. "GRADUALISM" IS NOT NECESSARY TO ACHIEVE SMOOTH AND EFFECTIVE DESEGREGATION

There need be no fear that a decree such as we here urge will produce widespread friction and violence. Experience in many areas of daily life, including the administration of public schools, demonstrates that smooth adjustment to nonsegregated operation, in the South as well as the North, and on a large as well as on a small scale, can be accomplished rapidly. See Clark, Desegregation: An Appraisal of the Evidence, 9 Journal of Social Issues, No. 4, pp. 1-76 (1953); Time Magazine, The U.S. Negro, 1953, pp. 55-58 (May 11, 1953) (reprinted, 99 Cong. Rec., A5384-87); ibid., When the Barriers Fall, p. 40 (Aug. 31, 1953); Wertham, Psychiatric Observations on Abolition of School Segregation, 26 J. of Educ. Soc. 333 (March 1953); Bustard, The New Jersey Story: The Development of Racially Integrated Public Schools, 21 J. of Neg. Ed. 275 (Summer, 1952).

Indeed, such adjustment is often facilitated by desegregating as rapidly as the necessary changes can be made in records, facilities, personnel, and other purely administrative affairs to a non-racial basis. Segmentalized "gradual" desegregation which is slower than that does not necessarily make the transition easier. On the contrary, it tends to stimulate an atmosphere of uncertainty and resentments, with the result that those who seek desegregation accelerate their efforts to end injustice, while those who wish to continue segregation intensify their efforts to evade, obstruct, and resist desegregation. Such "gradualism" thus heightens, rather than diminishes, both overt and latent tensions. A vivid illustration is the recent experience of the District of Columbia Recreation Board. During 1952 and 1953, that Board's efforts at gradual and segmentalized desegregation, which ended segregation at a dozen or so individual playgrounds, visibly heightened racial tensions in Washington as the pro- and anti-segregationists pushed their views. See Phineas Indritz, Racial Ramparts in the Nation's Capital, 41 Georgetown L.J. 297, 327 (March 1953). But after the Recreation Board on May 18, 1954, abruptly abolished all racial distinctions simultaneously in all its facilities (over 100), racial tensions in public recreation calmed and ceased.

That large numbers of people are affected, that the proportion of Negroes involved may be substantial, and that the desegregation is relatively rapid, are not, per se, major obstacles to an effective and peaceful transition to a non-segregated community. The recent desegregation of the vast military establishment, as rapidly as administrative adjustments could be made, has been effected smoothly. Nichols, Breakthrough on the Color Front (1954); 99 Cong. Rec. A1982-84; Freedom to Serve, Rept. of President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Services (Govt. Printing Off., May 22, 1950); Integration in the Armed Services, Progress Report of the Civilian Assistant to the Secretary of Defense (Aug. 31, 1954). "There are no longer any all-Negro units in the Services". Ibid., p. 6.

After this Court's decision in District of Columbia v. John R. Thompson Co., Inc., 346 U.S. 100 (June 8, 1953), racial discrimination in the restaurants of a large city having a "southern exposure" ended overnight, without friction or disturbance among the thousands of people who daily use them. Not long thereafter all remaining racial discrimination ceased in District of Columbia theatres and all publicly administered recreational facilities, and the many thousands who now sit and play next to persons of another race display no tremor or qualm.

During the past nine years (since 1945), more than 60 million Americans have obligated themselves, through their legislative representatives in 12 states and at least

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

32 municipalities, to abstain from racial discrimination in employment. Management has generally responded favorably and many unions are extending the principle of nondiscrimination, including nonsegregation. Davis, Negro Employment: A Progress Report, 48 Fortune 102 (July 1952); Ruchames, Race, Jobs and Politics, 192 (1953); Hope, Efforts to Eliminate Racial Discrimination in Industry—With Particular Reference to the South, 23 J. of Neg. Educ. 262 (Summer 1954). Recent surveys have shown that large percentages of Southern workers favor nondiscriminatory employment requirements, one survey showing 48 percent. Ruchames, supra, p. 192. With increasing industrialization, the South is, more and more, experiencing and accepting nondiscriminatory and nonsegregated employment. Time magazine, Industry—Through the Color Barrier, p. 104 (March 22, 1954); see also Statement of November 11, 1953 by President Eisenhower announcing the ending of racial segregation of civilian workers at Navy shore establishments in Southern states.

Moreover, the past 5 years have seen widespread effort to minimize racial discriminations and tension in many other areas. In the fields of housing and urban redevelopment, the federal government (which underwrites over 25 billion dollars of home mortgages) now refuses home loan guarantees or insurance (V.A. or F.H.A.) for property on which racial restrictive covenants have been recorded since February 15, 1950; and racial discriminatory practices are now prohibited by law in 11 States. In addition, either by municipal ordinance or other action, or by resolution of the local housing authority, racial discriminatory practices in housing are forbidden in 24 cities, including such large centers of population as Baltimore, Md., Washington, D. C., Wilmington, Del., New York, Los Angeles, Boston, Cleveland, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, St. Paul, etc. More than 60 cities have established Human Relations Commissions; and at least 50 Southern municipalities have adopted anti-mask ordinances designed to curb Klan terrorism.

As the thinking of America focuses on the subject of school desegregation, this Court's decision is receiving more and more affirmations of support from civic, religious, veterans, parent-teachers, labor, business, educational, and a host of other types of organizations. It is particularly significant that practically every major religious denomination has vigorously urged compliance with both the letter and the spirit of integration.

Illustrative of the tone of such support is the announcement by the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., on May 19, 1954, urging all churches and individuals "to exert their influence and leadership to help the authorized agencies in the several communities to bring about a complete compliance with the decision of the Supreme Court." See also the National Council's Statement The Churches and Segregation (June 11, 1952) urging elimination of segregation and exclusion policies at all church-related, as well as public, schools. Similar views have been expressed by the Southern Baptist Convention, the Southern Presbyterian 94th General Assembly (1954), the Southern Methodist Church (including the Conferences in Florida, North Georgia, Louisiana, North Arkansas, Southwest Texas, etc.), the Southeastern Province of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Catholic Committee of the South, Southern B'nai B'rith lodges, the Disciples of Christ, many Southern councils of the United Church Women, and other active religious denominations. See Southern Regional Council, Schools in the South, pp. 6-7 (June, 1954); ibid., New South, vol. 9, no. 8 (Aug. 1954).

These pronouncements are not simply pious hopes. They reflect what is actually happening in America. Racial discrimination is being abandoned or destroyed in the armed forces, in professional societies, in the entertainment world, in schools and colleges, in churches, in industry, in government, indeed, almost everywhere. It merits noting that only 6 years ago no Negro could hope to play baseball in the major leagues, while now Negro ballplayers are heroes to millions of sports enthusiasts. See, e.g., Tallulah Bankhead, What is so Rare a s a Willie Mays, Look Magazine, vol. 18, no. 19, p. 52 (Sept. 21, 1954); E. B. Henderson, The Negro in Sports (1949).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Yesterday's announcements that the Disciples of Christ 105th International Convention in Florida voted for nonsegregation (Washington Post & Times Herald, p. 24M, Oct. 31, 1954), and that the Medical Society of Virginia voted to admit colored physicians to membership (Washington Evening Star, p. B-1, Nov. 1, 1954), are similar to hundreds of recent instances illustrating how widely race bars are being dropped by voluntary and private groups without legal compulsion to do so.

Literally thousands of schools, in the South and throughout the country, which were operated until recently on a segregated basis, now have integrated student bodies, and many of them already have integrated teaching staffs in the particular school.

White and Negro children are already sitting side by side in church-supported schools in Arkansas, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and other areas where segregation was the rule prior to this Court's decisions of May 17, 1954. See, e.g., Release, Sept. 13, 1954, National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service. Schools on numerous military reservations throughout the South have already been integrated, and no segregated school will be operated on any military reservation after September 1, 1955. Integration in the Armed Services, Progress Report of Civilian Assistant to the Secretary of Defense, pp. 2-3 (Aug. 31, 1954). And according to the Southern Regional Council's list (October 1954), at least 116 colleges and professional schools in Southern and border states, both public and private, which were formerly restricted to white students, are now desegregated. Although we do not have precise data as to how many private non-Catholic schools below college level have race bars no more, we do know they number in the hundreds.

Thousands of public elementary and secondary schools, too, have recently been desegregated. Virtually every section in Missouri has some form of integration in its public schools. In Arizona and New Mexico, public school segregation is now a thing of the past. In West Virginia, more than 25 counties have already fully or partially integrated their public schools. In Texas, at least 10 municipal junior colleges formerly restricted to white students now admit Negro students. These are but samples of the widespread growth of racial integration in the schools of America. See N. Y. Times, pp. 1, 74 (Oct. 3, 1954); Southern School News, Vol. 1, Nos. 1 and 2 (Sept. 3 and Oct. 1, 1954).

In three of the cases here involved, the picture is even more encouraging.

In No. 1, Brown v. Board of Education: In September 1953 the Topeka School Board, which had no segregation at the secondary school level, adopted the policy of desegregating the elementary schools as rapidly as practicable, and immediately terminated segregation in two elementary school districts. In September 1954, the Topeka Board of Education ordered complete integration in 10, and partial integration in 2, additional elementary school districts. Thus, at present, 14 of the 19 elementary schools previously attended by white children now have integrated student bodies; five schools are attended solely by white children; and four schools are attended solely by colored children. The Superintendent of Schools, in his letter of Sept. 24, 1954, advising us that in January 1955 he will announce the third step toward integration, stated as follows: "It is my belief that segregation will be terminated in this city before the Supreme Court acts indicating the manner in which it should be accomplished."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In No. 4, Bolling v. Sharpe: Shortly after this Court's decision of May 17, 1954, the District of Columbia Board of Education adopted a policy of complete nonsegregation and the Superintendent of Schools initiated a program to implement that policy.

Up to the date of filing this Brief, most of the D. C. public schools have been wholly or partially desegregated by virtue of (a) transferring some 3000 Negro children from overcrowded schools chiefly to schools serving the areas where they live; (b) applying new non-racial school boundaries to all students (some 12,000) who in September 1954 were new to the school system; (c) permitting those who had changed their residences to another school zone to transfer to the school serving that zone; and (d) permitting approximately 1000 additional junior and senior high school students and approximately 900 other elementary school pupils to transfer to schools within the boundaries of which they live. Racial exclusion has been abandoned for all evening schools and for the two teachers colleges, and it is proposed to merge these colleges as soon as administrative details and facilities can be arranged. Teachers are being examined and assigned without regard to race.

In addition, all children still remaining in schools which are outside the boundaries within which they live may either remain in their present school until graduation or file applications for transfer to a school serving the school zone in which they live. The Superintendent of Schools has announced that these applications will be made effective either in February or September 1955; that children living within the school boundaries will, after September 1955, have priority, if the school is overcrowded, over those who live outside the boundaries; that all students graduating from junior high school in February 1955 will go to the high school serving the zone within which they live; and that in September 1955 the new boundaries will be applicable to all students except those remaining in a school until they graduate. The D. C. public school system serves over 100,000 students, 60 percent of whom are of Negro ancestry.[6]

In No. 5, Gebhart v. Belton: The two schools involved (Claymont high school and Hockessin elementary school) have been integrated since 1952. In addition, under the policy recently adopted by the Delaware State Board of Education which virtually incorporates the proposals we here urge (see footnote 2, supra), many other Delaware schools have already been integrated, in varying patterns and, except at Milford, without difficulty. Thus, in Newark, junior and senior high schools have been integrated. In Newcastle, integration has been smoothly introduced for first year children and all high school grades. In Wilmington, integration began in the summer school session; in September, integration was smoothly accomplished at the elementary school level where 67 percent of the students are now enrolled in schools attended by both white and colored children while the remainder attend schools which serve all-white or all-colored residential areas (no qualified Negro student sought transfer to any secondary school serving white children); and racial restrictions were removed from evening schools and all activities of extended services. See Southern School News, vol. 1, Nos. 1 and 2 (Sept. 3 and Oct. 1, 1954); Wilmington Journal—Every Evening, p. 1 (June 22, 1954); ibid., pp. 1, 4 (Sept. 21, 1954).

---

[6] Washington Post & Times Herald, p. 7M (May 23, 1954); p. 17 (May 26, 1954); p. 19 (June 10, 1954); p. 18 (June 24, 1954); p. 1 (July 2, 1954); p. 20M (Sept. 12, 1954); p. 1 (Sept. 14, 1954); p. 18 (Sept. 16, 1954); p. 1 (Sept. 17, 1954); pp. 1, 18 (Sept. 22, 1954); p. 19 (Sept. 25, 1954); Southern School News, supra, Nos. 1 and 2.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The recent highly publicized incidents, such as the picketing and threats which stopped or reversed integration plans of the local school boards at Milford, Dela., and White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., and the brief flurry of walkouts and truancy by a small proportion of the students in Baltimore, Md., and Washington, D. C., do not undermine our contention that "gradualism" is unnecessary to smooth integration. Those incidents were isolated instances of rowdyism, largely inspired by professional hate mongers. When compared to the overall picture of effective transition in the many areas where desegregation is taking place, these incidents, despite their notoriety, shrink to their proper miniscule proportion.[7]

Moreover, as shown in the newspaper reports from those localities, the vast majority of the local citizenry disavowed and deplored such defiance of law and order e.g., see daily issues during October of: Wilmington Journal—Every Evening, Wilmington Morning News, Baltimore Sun, Washington Post & Times Herald, Washington Evening Star, etc.).

Indeed, it can be stated that the current atmosphere of uncertainty as to the nature of this Court's decree concerning the methods for desegregation of the public schools has undoubtedly been a large factor in encouraging the climate of overt hostility and active resistance to desegregation which stimulated those incidents. But after this Court's decrees outline the methods of compliance with the Constitution, accommodation and acceptance, even though

---

[7] The Wilmington Journal-Every Evening appraised the Milford, Delaware outburst as "nothing more than isolated incidents of a few irresponsible persons getting briefly out of hand" (Editorial, Oct. 14, 1954), while the Washington, D. C. walkout consisted almost entirely of "teen-agers on a lark. It did not smack of real racial bigotry." Washington Post & Times Herald, p. 8, col. 2 (Oct. 19, 1954).

sometimes reluctant, will rapidly replace the present uncertainty and resistance.[8]

As actual experience has shown, "The likelihood of desegregation being accompanied by active resistance or violence is not directly dependent upon the degree of expressed racial prejudice among the whites prior to the desegregation. Prejudiced whites accommodate as well to a changed social situation as do less prejudiced whites. There is also some evidence that a change in the social situation brought about by desegregation tends to decrease the intensity of expressed racial prejudice." Clark, Desegregation: An Appraisal of the Evidence, 9 J. of Soc. Issues, No. 4, p. 47 (1953). These findings are, indeed, buttressed by the survey of attitudes on desegregation conducted under the auspices of the Attorney General of Florida which found:

---

[8] Washington Sunday Star, p. A-2, cols. 2-4 (Oct. 3, 1954). In Clark, Desegregation: An Appraisal of the Evidence, 9 J. of Soc. Issues, No. 4, pp. 53-54 (1953), the key principles are stated as follows:

"VII. Active resistance, and sometimes violence, though rare, are associated with desegregation under the following conditions:

A. Ambiguous or inconsistent policy;
B. Ineffective policy action;
C. Conflict between competing governmental authority or officials.

* * * * * * * * * *

"VIII. The accomplishment of efficient desegregation with a minimum of social disturbance depends upon;

A. A clear and unequivocal statement of policy by leaders with prestige and other authorities;
B. Firm enforcement of the changed policy by authorities and persistence in the execution of this policy in the face of initial resistance;
C. A willingness to deal with violations, attempted violations, and incitement to violations by a resort to the law and strong enforcement action;
D. A refusal of the authorities to resort to, engage in or tolerate subterfuges, gerrymandering or other devices for evading the principles and the fact of desegregation;
E. An appeal to the individuals concerned in terms of their religious principles of brotherhood and their acceptance of the American traditions of fair play and equal justice."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"While the majority of white persons answering opposed the decision, it is also true that a large majority indicated they were willing to do what the courts and school officials decided." (Florida Brief, pp. 24, 108)

"29. A large majority of white principals and supervisors in all regions indicate that they would comply with the decision regardless of personal feelings but the percentage varies from 76% in Region VII to approximately 94% in Regions VI and VIII." (Ibid., p. 33).

In any event, however, the possibility of occasional local friction does not provide a relevant legal basis for depriving law abiding persons of their legal rights. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60, 80-81 (1917); Mitchell v. United States, 313 U.S. 80, 97 (1941); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 21 (1948). This Court has sturdily refused to permit the standards of the Constitution to be set at the larrikinalian level demanded by local ruffians and Ku-Klux-Klan-like demagogues. See Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86 (1923) (mob violence); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303 (1940) (street argument); Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496, 516 (1939) (anticipated public disorder, but no showing of inability to control it.) Also Cf. Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949) (speech before riotous and turbulent crowd); Kunz v. New York, 340 U.S. 290, 296 (1951) (speech likely to stir strife); Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951) (speech which actually incited crowd). This Court was not frightened by threats of large scale violence nor deemed it necessary to espouse a formal policy of "gradualism", when it ordered the end of racial discrimination, whether in the form of segregation or otherwise, in voting, interstate travel, land ownership and occupancy, employment, public accommodations, graduate education, jury service, and other areas of daily life.[9]

[9] See numerous cases cited in our Brief for AVC on the previous reargument (1953 Term), p. 16, ftnts. 7-13. Some instances of awful predictions of dire violence which never materialized can

Throughout this experience in desegregation, the phobias of predicted violence proved to be wraiths, fantasies and myths. Here and there, one or a few hoodlums created localized tensions and anxieties. But the vast majority of people accommodated themselves to and accepted the change in their pattern of racial relations which, this Court decreed, was required by the Constitution. See Comment, Racial Violence and Civil Rights Law Enforcement, 18 U. of Chi. L. Rev. 769 (1951).

The unfortunate truth is that considerable time, perhaps years, may elapse before all the public schools are fully integrated. Residential segregation alone will greatly minimize the effect of this Court's rulings in these cases. There are multitudes of areas inhabited almost entirely by white persons or almost entirely by colored persons. The student body of the schools in those areas will have the same hue as the residents of the neighborhood.

Moreover, the lag in the law and the inhibiting effect of the mores and extra-legal pressures in particular communities, when added to the accumulated racial patterns of residence, and other factors, will envelope the process of desegregation with ample "gradualism". Cf. Ashmore, The Negro and the Schools, pp. 134-139 (1954); Leflar and Davis, Segregation in the Public Schools—1953, 67 Harv. L. Rev. 377, 404-420 (January 1954); Frank, Can Courts Erase the Color Line?, 21 J. of Negro Educ. 304 (1952).

Whatever may be one's thoughts as to the extent of time which may be desirable, from an administrator's standpoint, for adjustment to a non-segregated system of public education, this Court need not and ought not water down the equal protection guarantee of the Constitution through the formal espousal of a legal doctrine of "gradualism".

---

be seen in the brief for the State of Virginia (pp. 14, 18-20) in Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U.S. 373 (1945 Term, No. 704), in the amicus brief filed by the Attorneys General of eleven States (p. 9) and in the brief for the University of Texas Law School (p. 175) in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1949 Term, No. 44), and in the amicus brief by Rep. Sam Hobbs of Alabama (p. 5) in Henderson v. United States, 339 U.S. 816 (1949 Term, No. 25).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

QUESTION 5

"5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

THE TERMS OF THE DECREES WHICH WE SUGGEST

We have indicated above our belief that this Court should not undertake to encompass in its decree all conceivable local conditions and educational problems or to formulate a decree attempting to foresee and meet every possible contingency concerning the many individuals and circumstances involved in readjusting school districts, educational methods, patterns of pupil attendance, the assignment of teachers, etc. to meet constitutional standards. Nor should this Court do so vicariously through a special master. Such problems, to the extent that they are submitted to the judicial ken, are properly the initial concern of courts of first instance. Moreover, those courts cannot deal with such problems in identical manner. Differences in facts and unforeseen circumstances may compel variations in both procedure and solution.

Nevertheless, the courts of first instance should not be left entirely at large. Pursuant to the views expressed above, we urge that this Court remand these cases to the courts of first instance with the following directions:

(a) That the courts of first instance order and enjoin the respective boards of education:

(1) to admit and educate any applicant (if qualified on the basis of, and subject to, proper scholastic criteria which take no regard of his race or ancestry, including normal geographic school boundaries where such boundaries are prescribed) in any school in which any other person similarly situated, but without regard to race, color, or ancestry, would be admitted and educated; the board may, if it wishes, choose to comply with this requirement by assigning children to schools in accordance with normal geographic school boundaries which are based on proximity of residence and accessibility to the school and not on race, color or ancestry;

(2) as to any student who will thereafter be new to a particular school, to assign him to a school on the basis of normal residential boundaries not based on race or color, or, if no boundaries are prescribed, on the basis of reasonable criteria which do not include race or color; where no boundaries are prescribed, the board may, if it wishes, permit the student to choose which school he will attend, but shall not require him to file an application as a prerequisite to obtaining unsegregated education;

(3) to refrain, in the administration of their respective schools systems, from making any distinction, or providing any difference in treatment or education, solely on the basis of race, color, or ancestry, with respect to any student or other persons; and

(4) to comply with the above provisions not later than the beginning of the school term next following the issuance of this Court's decision.

(b) That the court of first instance:

(1) shall retain jurisdiction of the cases for such time as that court deems necessary to deal, upon motion by either side, with any special problems that may

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

arise in complying with the provisions mentioned above;

(2) may allow such additional time to the respective board of education, but not in excess of one school term at any one time, as the board of education on the basis of unusual conditions involving technical or administrative difficulties then existing, proves, by substantial and probative evidence at open hearings before the court, is needed by the board to effectuate compliance with this Court's decree; and

(3) shall not consider opposition and hostility by part of the community to desegregation of public education as constituting in themselves sufficient basis for delaying compliance with this Court's decree.

If the above directives are included in this Court's decree, we think that the court of first instance should be left free, subject to appellate review of any error committed, to adopt whatever procedures it deems wise in prescribing such additional specific terms, not inconsistent with this Court's decree, as may be necessary in the particular case to provide equal, unsegregated education to each person who desires it.

CONCLUSION

In view of the advanced status of desegregation in Kansas, the District of Columbia, and Delaware, we assume that in the cases from those areas (Nos. 1, 4, 5), the school authorities would have no objection to decrees containing the terms suggested above and effective September, 1955.

No different treatment is required, nor should be made, either for the other two cases now before this Court or for any other public school desegregation situations that we are aware of.

It is significant that although the appellees in the Virginia case stated that racial segregation was designed to prevent violence and reduce resentment, they frankly admitted that "The passage of time has removed violence and substantially removed resentment in Virginia." Brief for Appellees, No. 191, Oct. Term, 1952, p. 17.

In states such as South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, and Alabama, and some parts of a few other states, integration of the public schools will involve a greater emotional adjustment. But we believe that the people of these areas can and will make that adjustment much easier than some of their present political leaders give them credit for.[10]

The events of World War II and its aftermaths have in the past several years brought about a vast reorientation of the community attitudes which formerly buttressed racial segregation. More and more, the people of the South are striving to discard the discriminations which grew from previous prejudices. In ever growing degree it is apparent that they would travel even faster toward that objective as the shackles of legal prohibitions against their voluntary association are removed.

Most of the people of the South respect the Constitution. They will comply with firm directives embodied in decrees of this Court. The more positive the ruling, the greater will be its acceptance. We believe that the future course of desegregation in the South will substantiate the experience of public school desegregation in New Jersey: ". . . that the best way to integrate is to do it." Bustard, supra, 21 J. of N. Ed. 275, 285.

AMERICAN VETERANS COMMITTEE, INC.,
Amicus Curiae.

By PHINEAS INDRITZ,
National Counsel,
American Veterans Committee, Inc.

---

[10] Compare the observation in Freedom to Serve, supra, p. 44: "Integration of the two races at work, in school, and in living quarters did not present insurmountable difficulties. . . . The enlisted men were far more ready for integration than the officers had believed." The same phenomenon was observed when white students greeted Negro students after the Sweatt and McLaurin decisions opened the doors of the Universities, and is now being seen in the vast majority of the elementary and secondary schools which have recently been desegregated.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

HAROLD B. WILLEY, Cle

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER, 1954, TERM

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL.,
Appellants,
VERSUS
BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS ET AL.
No. 1

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL.,
Appellants,
VERSUS
R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.,
No. 2

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL.,
Appellants,
VERSUS
COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.,
No. 3

FRANCIS B. GEBHART ET AL.,
Petitioners,
VERSUS
ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.,
No. 5

BRIEF OF MAC Q. WILLIAMSON, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF OKLAHOMA, AMICUS CURIAE

MAC Q. WILLIAMSON,
Attorney General of Oklahoma,
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma,
Amicus Curiae.

NOVEMBER, 1954.

KING LAW BRIEF CO., 222 N.W. THIRD, OKLAHOMA CITY — PHONE FO 5-2969

AUTHORITY

	PAGE
Oklahoma Constitution, Article 1, Section 5	7
Oklahoma Constitution, Article XIII, Section 3	7
Oklahoma Constitution, Article 23, Section 11	7
Oklahoma Constitution, Article 10, Section 9	8
Oklahoma Constitution, Article 10, Section 19	5
70 O. S. 1951, Section 5-1	7
70 O. S. 1951, Section 5-4	8
70 O. S. 1951, Section 5-8	10
19 Am. Jur., Equity, Section 127	14
30 C. J. S., Equity, Section 67	13
Caldwell v. Taggart, 29 U. S. 190; 4 Pet. 190; 7 L. ed. 828	12
Mercold Corp. v. Mid-Continent Inv. Co., 64 S. Ct. 268; 320 U. S. 661; 88 L. ed. 376;—Rehearing denied—64 S. Ct. 325; 321 U. S. 802; 88 L. ed. 1089 (also see 89 L. ed. 546—motion denied)	13
Scripps-Howard Radio v. Federal Communications Comm., 62 S. Ct. 875; 316 U. S. 4; 86 L. ed. 1229	13
Terrell v. Allison, 88 U. S. 289; 21 Wall. 289; 22 L. ed. 634	13
Virginian Ry. Co. v. System Federation No. 40, 57 S. Ct. 592; 300 U. S. 515; 81 L. ed. 789; affirming CCA, 84 F. 2d 641; affirming D. C.

PAGE

Ry. Employees Dept. of A. F. L. v. Virginian Ry. Co., 11 F. Supp. 621; certiorari granted Virginian Ry. Co. v. System Fed. No. 40, Ry. Employees Dept. of A. F. L., 57 S. Ct. 43, 299 U. S. 529; 81 L. ed. 389 13

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER, 1954, TERM

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL.,
Appellants,
VERSUS
BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS ET AL.
No. 1

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL.,
Appellants,
VERSUS
R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.,
No. 2

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL.,
Appellants,
VERSUS
COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.,
No. 3

FRANCIS B. GEBHART ET AL.,
Petitioners,
VERSUS
ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.,
No. 5

BRIEF OF MAC Q. WILLIAMSON, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF OKLAHOMA, AMICUS CURIAE

AUTHORITY

Authority for the filing of this Amicus Curiae brief may be found in the concluding paragraph of this Court's opinion in the cases (as consolidated) above listed. 347 U. S. 483, 98 L. ed. (advance) p. 583. See, also, Par. 4 of Rule 42 of this Court.

The State of Oklahoma is one of the states requiring segregation in public education; and principally because of both constitutional and legislative restrictions as to the financing of separate educational facilities for white and negro children, it is probably more immediately concerned than some, if not all, of the other states having segregation in public education in whether this Court directs that existing segregated systems be stopped immediately, or adjusted gradually to a procedure not based upon color distinctions.

At the outset, it may be noted that Oklahoma's dual system of tax-gathering is unique and different from most other "segregation" States.

Basically—as will hereinafter be pointed out—our Oklahoma district or "majority" schools (which are usually but not always for white children, because of the numerical preponderance of white children in such school districts) are financed by a school-district-wide ad valorem tax levy, whereas separate schools, (which are usually but not always for negro children, because of the smaller number of negro children) are financed by a county-wide ad valorem tax levy. These levies—the first, to be administered by school district officers, while the second, or separate school funds, are expended by county officers—are supplemented by State excise taxes, etc., and by State appropriations, all of which are presently geared to the segregated or double system of education, as are the ad valorem tax levies for "majority" as well as "separate" schools. The income and revenues allocated for both systems are (usually) barely sufficient to provide appropriate and desirable educational facilities, separately functioning, for all children (of both the white and colored races).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

So that if the method of financing and allocating revenues for the education of one race must now be used for the education of both races (which apparently will be the case, since the doctrine of "separate but equal" has been determined by this Court to have no place in the field of education), then our entire fiscal program with its "two-pronged" methods of raising and dividing tax moneys (1) on a district-wide basis—as to the majority schools; and (2) on a county-wide basis—as to our separate schools, must needs be recast by Constitutional change, and by our next Legislature (which meets in regular session January 3, 1955).

This Court's determination that the doctrine of "separate but equal" has no place in the field of scholastic education quite apparently means that there can be only one system of public education available to negro and white children alike; and since, in each of these cases, children of the negro race were seeking admission to schools attended by white children, it is logical to assume that, as far as the State of Oklahoma is concerned, negro children are intended to be admitted to and integrated in the district schools(usually but not always for white children) and that separate schools (usually but not always for negro children) can no longer be maintained by the State, as such. Thus it appears that separate schools for white and for negro children, based on color distinctions, must be discontinued; it having been said by the Court in these cases that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal"; which (among other things) indicates that separate schools (and the finances therefor) in Oklahoma are contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, and are unlawful.

In this connection, it is pointed out that all budgets for both majority and separate schools for the current Oklahoma fiscal year (1954-55) have long since been officially approved, and tax levies made and extended upon the tax-rolls of each of our 77 counties; and such taxes are now payable, and in process of collection—the first half of all said taxes actually becoming delinquent on December 31, 1954. Thus the fiscal program for all schools on the traditional and divided basis is so far along that it would be a clear impossibility to try at this time to "unscramble" the set purposes and destination of tax moneys of our 77 counties for this year, when and as collected.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Another point to consider is the fact that hundreds of thousands of dollars are being collected—under State constitutional authority—for separate school purposes, with each county—rather than each school district—as a taxing unit; and if the decision should be—under the Court's Question 4—"integration forthwith," then every dollar so collected (and being held by the various County Treasurers) would remain "locked up" and entirely unavailable for any school purposes until new and different constitutional and statutory remedies could be provided; this, for the reason that Sec. 19, Article 10, Oklahoma Constitution, forbids the diverting of any tax moneys away from the original purposes of the levy.

Said Section and Article provide as follows:

> "19. SPECIFICATION OF PURPOSE OF TAX—DEVOTION TO ANOTHER PURPOSE.—Every act enacted by the Legislature, and every ordinance and resolution passed by any county, city, town, or municipal board or local legislative body, levying a tax shall specify distinctly the purpose for which said tax is levied and no tax levied and collected for one purpose shall ever be devoted to another purpose."

Thus, while necessary remedial legislation can (and doubtless will) be provided by or before June 30, 1955

(the end of the current fiscal year), yet it will reasonably take that long to make the change-over.

Each Oklahoma school district, depending—as it now the case—for its very existence upon revenues allocated to it for education of children of only one race, will thus find it presently impossible to provide funds for adequate education for children of both races, unless and until the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma and the people of the State of Oklahoma have had an opportunity—through amendatory legislation—to give increased revenues to such school districts; which might (and probably will) consist largely of new Acts consolidating revenues formerly allocated for both district and separate schools.

The problem confronting the State of Oklahoma in changing from the heretofore approved "separate but equal" system (which has prevailed since before Statehood, in 1907) can better be understood by a consideration of provisions (hereafter quoted) of the Constitution of Oklahoma and statutes enacted by the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma.

For the purposes of this brief, references to statutes of the State of Oklahoma will be by title and section in Oklahoma Statutes, 1951, as follows:

"_____ Oklahoma Statutes 1951, (Title number)
Sec. _____."
(Section number of title)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Section 5, Article I, Oklahoma Constitution, reads as follows:

> "Provisions shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools, which shall be open to all the children of the State and free from sectarian control; and said schools shall always be conducted in English: Provided, that nothing herein shall preclude the teaching of other languages in said public schools: And Provided, further, that this shall not be construed to prevent the establishment and maintenance of separate schools for white and colored children" (Emphasis ours).

Section 3, Article XIII, Oklahoma Constitution, reads as follows:

> "Separate schools for white and colored children with like accommodation shall be provided by the Legislature and impartially maintained. The term 'colored children,' as used in this section, shall be construed to mean children of African descent. The term 'white children' shall include all other children."

Section 11 of Article 23, Oklahoma Constitution, reads as follows:

> "Wherever in this Constitution and laws of this State, the word or words, 'colored' or 'colored race,' 'negro' or 'negro race,' are used, the same shall be construed to mean or apply to all persons of African descent. The term 'white race' shall include all other persons."

70 Oklahoma Statutes 1951, Sec. 5-1 provides that the public schools in Oklahoma "shall be organized and maintained upon a complete plan of separation between the white and colored races with impartial facilities for both races." Other statutes prescribe penalties for teaching pupils of the colored and white races in the same school. 70 Oklahoma Statutes 1951, Secs. 5-4 et seq. However, since this Court has already held that segregation of white and colored children in public education is in contravention of the United States Constitution, this Court will not be burdened with any argument herein as to the meaning of the aforecited constitutional and statutory provisions which for many years have been in effect in Oklahoma.

The question of immediate concern to the State of Oklahoma is an adjustment to a single system of public education, which is to be considered by this Court in resolving Questions 4 and 5 that have been previously propounded by the Court. Therefore, it is deemed appropriate to present for this Court's consideration these further constitutional provisions, constituting—as they do—the basic authority for county-unit taxation for separate school purposes, only.

Section 9 of Article 10, Oklahoma Constitution, reads as follows:

> "Except as herein otherwise provided, the total taxes for all purposes, on an ad valorem basis, shall not exceed, in any taxable year, fifteen (15) mills on the dollar, to be apportioned between county, city, town and school district, by the County Excise Board, until such time as the regular apportionment is otherwise provided for by the Legislature.
>
> "No ad valorem tax shall be levied for State purposes, nor shall any part of the proceeds of any ad

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

valorem tax levy upon any kind of property in this State be used for State purposes: provided, however, any County of the State may make an additional ad valorem levy, not exceeding two (2) mills on the dollar valuation, on any property within the county, for separate schools for white and negro children, such aid or money raised therefor to be apportioned as provided by law; provided, further, that upon certification of the need therefor by the governing board, an additional levy of not to exceed one (1) mill on the dollar valuation on any property within the county shall be made by the County Excise Board for separate schools for white and negro children; provided, further, that upon certification of the need therefor by the governing board, an additional levy of not to exceed one (1) mill on the dollar valuation on any property within the county shall be levied by the excise board, the proceeds derived therefrom to be used exclusively for the acquisition of sites and erection of buildings for separate schools for white and negro children; provided, further, the annual ad valorem tax rate for school purposes may be increased, in any school district, by an amount not to exceed fifteen (15) mills on the dollar valuation, upon all property in the district, on condition that a majority of the qualified voters of such district voting at an election, vote for such increase, provided, however, that the Legislature shall by proper laws prescribe the manner and method of conducting said election, but until such legislative provision is made, said levy may be made and said election held as now provided by law; and provided further, that limitations on the levy of such additional 15-mill levy may be made hereafter by the Legislature.

"Provided, also, an additional levy may be made each year, in the State and in the various subdivisions thereof, on all personal and real property subject to ad valorem taxes, to reasonably take care of bonded and other valid indebtedness of the State and its various subdivisions existing at the time this amendment is adopted and becomes effective, but such necessary additional levy or assessment on such property to take care of such indebtedness existing and owing by the State and its subdivisions at such time shall in no event exceed levy or assessment for which such property would have been liable under the Constitution and laws of the State as same existed immediately prior to the adoption of this amendment. No provision hereof shall be construed to tax churches or schools."—As amended State Question No. 185, Referendum Petition No. 61, Adopted August 15, 1933; State Question No. 319, Referendum Petition No. 91, Adopted special election July 2, 1946; State Question No. 314, Initiative Petition No. 224, Adopted general election Nov. 5, 1946; State Question No. 316, Initiative Petition No. 226, Adopted general election Nov. 5, 1946; State Question No. 327, Referendum Petition No. 92, Adopted special election July 6, 1948.

It will thus be seen that definite limitations are placed upon ad valorem tax levies for school districts (which are maintained for the "majority" race, which usually means the white race), and for separate schools (which ordinarily means the "minority" or the negro race); and it will also be observed that the tax levies for majority school districts are invariably on a district-wide basis, whereas levies for the separate schools are and always have been on a county-wide basis (Emphasis ours).

70 Oklahoma Statutes 1951, Sec. 5-8, prescribes the procedure to be followed in levying taxes for the maintenance of "county separate schools for white and colored children."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

While children of both races may be integrated into the school district system, as distinguished from the county separate school system, in the State of Oklahoma, the aforementioned limitations as to financing must be faced and solved, primarily by the people, and as well, by the Legislature, of the State of Oklahoma, since the principal source of revenue for schools is an ad valorem tax levy, which has a definite limitation by the terms of the Constitution, as aforementioned. This means, of course, that appropriate or adequate facilities for public education cannot be given to both white and colored children under a newly-created and required system of non-racial education until a plan for removing or raising the constitutional limitation on ad valorem tax levies has been devised and submitted to the electorate of the State of Oklahoma.

In this connection, it might be pointed out that the State Legislative Council in Oklahoma (which consists of the entire current membership of both Houses, and which functions between regular legislative sessions) has been making a study of this question and is in the process of submitting its recommendations to the Oklahoma Legislature when it convenes in regular session in January, 1955. Probably the recommendations so made will require, and certainly will be entitled to, debate in both houses of the Oklahoma Legislature; it being necessary to formulate a permanent solution, by way of constitutional amendment, of the future financing of a single system of public education which will include and integrate both white and colored children. Such proposed constitutional amendments will be by the Legislature submitted to the voting citizens of the State. Likewise, it will be necessary for the Oklahoma Legislature, itself, to formulate a system to supplement, by excise taxes, etc., revenues that will be made available from ad valorem tax levies, for the newly arranged school program.

It seems to be settled law that this Court, having once begun an exercise of its equity powers in injunction proceedings, can properly continue its control over the subject matter of the cases, so as to do "entire justice" with respect to such subject matter, which means that this Court has the power—and we think, the corresponding duty—to retain jurisdiction, as long as might reasonably be necessary, to effect entire and complete justice not only to the parties in these cases, but to all others who will be affected by the decision of this Court.

> (U. S. Va. 1830) The process of an equity court should act on known and definite interests and not on such as admit of no medium of estimation, and its decrees should terminate and not instigate litigation.—Caldwell v. Taggart, 29 U. S. 190; 4 Pet. 190; 7 L. Ed. 828.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(U. S. Va. 1937) Extent to which equity will go to give relief where there is no adequate remedy at law is not a matter of fixed rule, but rests in sound discretion of court * * * Equity courts may go much farther both to give and withhold relief in furtherance of public interest than they are accustomed to go where only private interests are involved.—Virginian Ru. Co. v. System Federation No. 40, 57 S. Ct. 592; 300 U. S. 515; 81 L. Ed. 789; affirming CCA, 84 F. 2d 641; affirming D.C. Ry. Employees Dept. of A.F.L. v. Virginian Ry. Co., 11 F. Supp. 621; certiorari granted Virginian Ry. Co. v. System Fed. No. 40, Ry. Employees Dept. of A.F.L., 57 S. Ct. 43, 299 U. S. 529; 81 L. Ed. 389. Also, see Scripps-Howard Radio v. Federal Communications Comm., 62 S. Ct. 875; 316 U. S. 4; 86 L. Ed. 1229. Mercold Corp. v. Mid-Continent Inv. Co., 64 S. Ct. 268; 320 U. S. 661; 88 L. Ed. 376;—Rehearing denied—64 S. Ct. 325; 321 U. S. 802; 88 L. Ed. 1089 (also see 89 L. Ed. 546—motion denied).

(U. S. Miss. 1874) It is a rule of a court of equity to do complete justice when such is practicable, not merely by declaring the right, but by enforcing a remedy for its enjoyment, and such a court does not turn the party to another forum to enforce a right which it has itself established.—Terrell v. Allison, 88 U. S. 289; 21 Wall. 289; 22 L. Ed. 634.

We believe certain generalized rules to be apropos. 30 C. J. S., Equity, Sec. 67, states:

"The aim of a court of equity is to administer complete relief in a single suit and, as a general rule, the court will in the one suit investigate and determine all questions incidental to the main controversy and grant all relief incidental to accomplishment of the principal object of the bill, and it is a well settled rule that a court of equity which has obtained jurisdiction of a controversy on any ground, or for any purpose, will retain such jurisdiction for the purpose of administering complete relief and doing entire justice with respect to the subject matter, particularly with respect to the enforcement of its own decree, and this is true whether the question is of remedy or of distinct yet connected topics of dispute, and whether the rights and remedies involved are legal or equitable."

19 Am. Jur., Equity, Sec. 127, states:

"The rule is that equity will not enter a partial or incomplete decree. Having taken cognizance of a cause for any purpose, a court of equity will ordinarily retain jurisdiction for all purposes; decide all issues which are involved by the subject matter of the dispute between the litigants; award relief which is complete and finally dispose of the litigation so as to make performance of the court's decree perfectly safe to those who may be compelled to obey it; accomplish full justice between the parties litigant; and prevent future litigation. * * *."

Undoubtedly this Court can, and will, consider the ability of States affected by its decision, to endeavor to conform to the doctrine of only one system (without distinction as to color) in public education; and it is respectfully submitted that this Court should consider the financial problems of a State—such as ours—in determining when and how there shall be an affirmance from this Court respecting the time for the ultimate cessation of segregation.

The problem of the State of Oklahoma in adjusting or changing the financial structure for maintaining public schools is a serious one, grounded in constitutional and statutory provisions of long standing—the uprooting of which, in an effort to conform, will take time to solve. Therefore, it is respectfully suggested that this individual problem of the State of Oklahoma be considered by this Court in making a fully equitable and final disposition of these cases, and the principles therein laid down.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

MAC Q. WILLIAMSON,
Attorney General of Oklahoma,
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma,
Amicus Curiae.

NOVEMBER, 1954.

Office - Supreme Court
FILED
NOV 13 19
HAROLD B. WILLEY

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

No. 1 etc.

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL.,
Appellants,
v.
BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL.,
Appellants,
v.
R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL.,
Appellants,
v.
COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.

FRANCES B. GEBHART, ET AL.,
Petitioners,
v.
ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.

AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF ARKANSAS

TOM GENTRY
Attorney General
State of Arkansas
State Capitol
Little Rock, Arkansas

JAMES L. SLOAN
Assistant Attorney General
State of Arkansas
State Capitol
Little Rock, Arkansas

RICHARD B. McCULLOCH
Special Asst. Attorney General
State of Arkansas
Forrest City, Arkansas

PARAGON PRINTING CO., LITTLE ROCK

INDEX

Page

Preliminary Statement 1

Arkansas Constitutional and Statutory Provisions 3

Factual Background 5

Argument:

1. This Court Should Not Order Immediate Integration 7

2. Cases Should Be Remanded to Permit Gradual Integration 10

3. Congressional Action for Integration 13

Conclusion 21

Cases Cited

	Page
Brown et al v. Board of Education of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, et al, 347 U. S. 483	1
Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3	14, 16, 17
Colegrove v. Green, 328 U. S. 549	20
Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433	19
Collins v. Hardyman, 341 U. S. 651	14
Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U. S. 321	10, 11
International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392	10
Meredith v. City of Winter Haven, 320 U. S. 228	10
Minersville School Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U. S. 586	18
McCollum v. Board of Education of School Dist. No. 71, 333 U. S. 203	17
Parker v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341	20

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

INDEX—(Continued)

Page

Pitts v. Board of Trustees of DeWitt Special School Dist. No. 1, 84 F. Supp. 975 ..... 11, 18

Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 ..... 11, 15

Steward Mach. Co. v. Davis, 301 U. S. 549 20

Terry v. Adams, 345 U. S. 461 13

United States v. Fisher, 6 U. S. 358 17

United States v. Gilman, 347 U. S. 507 20

Arkansas Constitution and Statutes

Constitution of Arkansas (1874), Article 14, Section 1 3

Constitution of Arkansas (1874), Article 14, Section 4 3

Act 52, Arkansas Acts of 1868 4

Act 130, Arkansas Acts of 1873, Section 108 4

Appendix "A"

Arkansas School Enrollment 1933-1954 Session With Receipts and Disbursements 25

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

No. .....

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL.,
Appellants,
v.
BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL.,
Appellants,
v.
R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL.,
Appellants,
v.
COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.

FRANCES B. GEBHART, ET AL.,
Petitioners,
v.
ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

This brief is filed by the Attorney General of the State of Arkansas as amicus curiae at the invitation of this Court in the four cases shown in the caption. For brevity and convenience, the four cases are referred to collectively as "the Brown Case". Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, 347 U. S. 483.

In the Brown Case, the Chief Justice, speaking for the unanimous Court, stated the issue presented to the Court in the four cases as follows, 347 U. S. at 493:

> "Does segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race, even though the physical facilities and other 'tangible' factors may be equal, deprive the children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities?"

The Court decided that issue in the following language, 347 U. S. at 495:

> "We conclude that in the field of public education the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal. Therefore, we hold that the plaintiffs and others similarly situated for whom the actions have been brought are, by reason of the segregation complained of, deprived of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment."

Let it be said at the outset that nothing contained in this brief is intended to bring into question the correctness of the ruling of this Court or its reasons for reaching that conclusion.

The full force and effect of the decision in the Brown Case was recognized by a "policy statement" issued by the State Board of Education of Arkansas following a meeting of the Board on June 14, 1954. The policy statement of the Board is as follows:

> "Under our present law the State Board of Education acts only in an advisory capacity to local school boards. The local board itself is the governing body of the school district and its decisions are final. Therefore, decisions must be made by the local school board, but within the limitations and restrictions provided by law. Our present state law provides for segregation in the public schools and any decision by a local board providing for integration of the races is premature, as the Supreme Court in its opinion stated that further arguments would be heard and a decree entered. We do not know when the decree will be entered or what it will provide. In the meantime, members of both races at the community level should continue as they have in the past in working cooperatively and effectively in a friendly effort to achieve better and substantially equal schools for all children, without regard to race.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "It is important to keep in mind that policy decisions are made by local school boards. The public school system in America calls for local control of schools and the state functions in the area of leadership only in such vital statewide matters as the one involving segregation of the races."

The General Assembly of Arkansas (the constitutional legislative branch of Arkansas' government) has not been in session since March of 1953 and will not convene in regular session until January of 1955. Without anticipating what action, if any, the General Assembly of Arkansas will take in its 1955 session, it is probably safe to say at this time that some further words of advice and direction from this Court will go a long way toward charting the course of future action or inaction by the Arkansas General Assembly. One of the purposes of this brief is to solicit most earnestly from this Court such words of clarification and advice as to the course to be pursued by the people of Arkansas in carrying out the final mandate of the Court as may be proper.

PERTINENT ARKANSAS CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS

Ark. Const. (1874) Art. 14, §1, provides:

> "Intelligence and virtue being the safeguards of liberty and the bulwark of a free and good government, the State shall ever maintain a general, suitable and efficient system of free schools whereby all persons in the State between the ages of six and twenty-one years may receive gratuitous instruction."

Ark. Const. (1874) Art. 14, §4, provides:

> "The supervision of public schools and the execution of the laws regulating the same shall be vested in and confided to such officers as may be provided for by the General Assembly."

The first general law providing for the separation of white and negro children in the public schools of Arkansas was enacted on July 23, 1868 — the year of adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. The act provided that school boards in Arkansas shall "make the necessary provisions for establishing separate schools for white and colored children and youths . . . ." Act 52, Ark. Acts of 1868.

In 1873 the Arkansas school law of 1868 was re-enacted and Act 130, Ark. Acts of 1873, §108, provided for "establishing separate schools for white and colored children and youths." According to a contemporary newspaper, there were twenty negro members in the 1873 session of the Legislature and it was reported that "that one-fifth part is a complete master of the two houses, as if the number that composed the group were three times as great." Editorial, "The Colored Legislators," Arkansas Gazette, February 1, 1873, p. 2.

It is also interesting to note that on January 6, 1873 (the year during which the Arkansas school laws were being formulated), J. C. Corbin became State Superintendent of Public Instruction for Arkansas. He was a negro educator who came to Arkansas during the War between the States. See Weeks, "School History of Arkansas." (U. S. Bureau of Education Bul. No. 27, 1912) pp. 59, 117.

The only statutory law in Arkansas today on the separation of white and negro children in the Arkansas public school system provides:

> "The board of school directors of each district in the State shall be charged with the following powers and perform the following duties . . . (c) Establish separate schools for white and colored persons." Ark. Stats. (1947) §80-509.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The existing school segregation law in Arkansas, therefore, apparently had its origin at a time when the negroes in Arkansas greatly influenced, if not dominated, legislative action on the school question.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

Attached hereto as Appendix "A" appears a tabulation which shows pertinent information as to the various school districts of Arkansas. The purpose of this tabulation is to demonstrate the proposition that the wide variety of circumstances which exist in the various counties of Arkansas requires a wide variety of remedies and plans in bringing about the ultimate result demanded by the decision of this Court, that is, the abolition of the dual school system in Arkansas.

There are 75 counties in Arkansas. The tabulation shows there are 422 separate school districts in the State or an average of about five separate districts for each county. Each school district has its separate board of directors which is the immediate governing authority of the district. The members of the board are elected by the qualified electors of the district and they are directly responsible to the people for their actions.

It is of interest to note that there are 14 counties out of the total 75 counties which had no negroes enrolled in the public schools of the county. Ten of the counties without negro population are located in the north and northwest (mountain) section of the State. Two of the non-negro counties (Polk and Scott) are in the southwestern section of the state. The remaining two non-negro counties (Clay and Greene) are contiguous to Mississippi County to the east which had a negro enrollment of 4,789 or about 20% of the total enrollment for Mississippi County.

By way of contrast, it will be seen from Appendix "A" that in six counties in Arkansas the negro enrollment exceeded the white enrollment. Five of these predominately negro counties (Lee, St. Francis, Crittenden, Chicot and Phillips) are in the eastern section of the State and border the Mississippi River. The other predominately negro county (Lincoln) is in South-central Arkansas.

The tabulation shows that the negro enrollment for the State was about 23% of the total enrollment of the State.

As further evidence of the variety of conditions and circumstances in Arkansas, it should be noted that two districts in Arkansas have already integrated the white and negro children in the schools.

The Charleston School District in Western Arkansas (Franklin County) has integrated pupils during the 1954-1955 session from the first grade through the twelfth grade. The Fayetteville School District in Northwest Arkansas (Washington County) has an enrollment of 3,096 white pupils and 64 negro pupils. This district has integrated the negro and white pupils at the high school level. Negro children in the Fayetteville School District attend a segregated school from the first grade through the ninth grade. For the 1954-1955 session, 11 negro high school pupils are attending the same high school with approximately 500 white children.

It is a matter of general information that integration has been accomplished so far in the Charleston and Fayetteville School Districts without any unusual incidents. However, from a comparison of the factual situations of the Charleston and Fayetteville School Districts with, for example, districts in St. Francis and Phillips Counties, it would certainly seem to follow as a matter of necessity that the process of integration must be applied as the circumstances in each district may require.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

ARGUMENT

1. This Court should not order "forthwith integration" in the public schools.

2. This Court should enter a decree in the pending cases which will permit gradual adjustments.

3. The Court should leave the problem of integration of the races in public schools to Congress for appropriate legislation.

Point 1

This Court Should Not Order Immediate Integration

This Court in its opinion in the Brown Case clearly recognized that the procedure for integration of the races in the public schools "presents probllems of considerable complexity." Thus the Court has indicated that it is not unmindful of the possibility of widespread hostility in at least some school districts if immediate integration of the races in the public schools is required by this Court. This hostility is commonly known to exist in varying degrees in a majority of the school districts of Arkansas although there have been, so far as is known, no overt acts by any particular group or groups indicating open defiance of the law as declared by this Court.

But even unwilling or hostile compliance can, and probably would, have a most undesirable effect upon the whole system of public education in Arkansas. It will be conceded, presumably, that the bulk of the financial support for the public schoo' system of Arkansas flows from the white population. This fact will continue to be true for many years to come unless a large portion of those persons who now pay taxes in support of public schools manage, by some means not now forseeable, to withdraw their support as a result of legislative enactments of some kind or other.

Without the leadership of those who carry the large portion of the burden of supporting the school system, the system as a whole is bound to pass through a period of deterioration which might last for many, many years. If the public school system is permitted to deteriorate, it necessarily follows that both the negro children and the white children will be the unfortunate victims. The negro children in all probability will suffer to a greater degree than the white children in such circumstances.

The Arkansas public school system today ranks far down the list in many respects in comparison with the systems of other states. There is a long way to go before Arkansans can point with pride to their school system as a whole. But no well-informed person will seriously contend that Arkansas has not made measurable progress during the past few years. Every well-informed person in Arkansas agrees with this Court when it said that "today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments" and education "is the very foundation of good citizenship." Brown Case, supra.

The executive, legislative and judicial branches of the State government have for years pointed up the school problem as the most important problem confronting the people of this State. It is well within the realm of possibility that any decree of this Court at this time which would have the legal effect of ordering immediate integration of the races in all the school districts of Arkansas would disrupt the financing, management and control of the school system for many years.

A recognized authority on the sociological aspects of school segregation has said:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "Finally, there is the hard fact that integration in a meaningful sense cannot be achieved by the mere physical presence of children of two races in a single classroom. No public school is isolated from the community that supports it, and if the very composition of its classes is subject to deep-seated and sustained public disapproval it is hardly likely to foster the spirit of united effort essential to learning. Even those who are dedicated to the proposition that the common good demands the end of segregation in education cannot be unaware that if the transition produces martyrs they will be the young children who must bear the brunt of spiritual conflict." Ashmore, "The Negro and the Public Schools," (Chapel Hill 1954) p. 135.

It would unduly extend this discussion to take up the problems of grade requirements, transportation problems, revision of school area distribution and the many other complex management problems which will ultimately have to be solved in bringing about complete integration in Arkansas. This Court has already indicated by the opinion in the Brown Case and by the study which the Court has obviously given to these cases that it is fully aware of the complexity of the problem. This Court has not asked for a statement of the problem, but rather for a solution.

What has been said is, of course, addressed to the discretion of this Court in the exercise of its equity powers in the four cases now pending before it. It is believed that this complex problem can be solved most effectively and most satisfactorily in the interest of both the negro children and the white children by a gradual, rather than an immediate, adjustment or transition from segregation to integration of the races in the public schools.

There are, of course, many decisions of this Court pointing out the peculiar nature of equity practice. In the interest of brevity, it is appropriate to point to the opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas in Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U. S. 321, 329, where the Court said:

> "We are dealing here with the requirements of equity practice with a background of several hundred years of history. Only the other day we stated that 'An appeal to the equity jurisdiction conferred on federal district courts is an appeal to the sound discretion which guides the determination of courts of equity', Meredith v. Winter Haven, 320 U. S. 228, 235. The historic injunctive process was designed to deter, not to punish. The essence of equity jurisdiction has been the power of the Chancellor to do equity and to mould each decree of the necessities of the particular case. Flexibility rather than rigidity has distinguished it. The qualities of mercy and practicality have made equity the instrument for nice adjustment and reconciliation between public interest and private needs as well as between competing private claims."

This Court also held in International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, that district courts are invested with large discretion in modeling their judgments to fit the exigencies of the particular case, and the framing of decrees should take place in the district rather than appellate courts.

Point 2

The Court Should Enter a Decree in the Pending Cases Which Will Permit Gradual Adjustments

The pending cases have been designated as class actions by the Court. The principal matter about which the people of Arkansas are concerned is the binding effect of the impending decrees on prospective or pending litigation of similar nature in the federal courts of Arkansas.

It is believed that the decree of this Court in the Briggs Case, for example, would not have the effect of an adjudication of pending or prospective similar actions in the federal courts of Arkansas. That decree would be a precedent to be followed by the federal courts in Arkansas only to the extent that the Briggs decree would permit the federal court in Arkansas in equity to follow the procedural scheme provided for in the Briggs decree.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The ultimate solution of the complex problem of transition is undoubtedly one which calls for "flexibility rather than rigidity." Hecht Co. v. Bowles, supra.

In framing its decrees in the pending cases, it is deemed proper for this Court to consider the opinion of Judge Harry J. Lemley in Pitts v. Board of Trustees of DeWitt Special School District No. 1, 84 F. Supp. 975 (E. D. Ark.). That case asserted the rights of negro plaintiffs to equal public school facilities under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. The Court followed the "separate but equal doctrine" of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, and held that the negro children were entitled under the Amendment to school facilities substantially equal to the school facilities afforded white children. Judge Lemley was there confronted, as the Court is here, with the terms and the scope of the decree to be entered under his findings of fact and conclusions of law. In solving this perplexing problem, Judge Lemley said, 84 F. Supp. at 983:

> "The instant suit is one in equity, and the bill is addressed to the court sitting as a court of equity. Hence the court has a wide discretion in determining what relief is proper and prescribing the time within which such relief must become effective. The case at bar is not the only one of this nature upon the court's docket and, in connection with our discussions and holdings herein, it should be borne in mind that each of these cases stands on its own peculiar facts; relief which might be proper in one > case might not be sufficient in another, and the length of time allowed to a district within which to bring about an equalization of educational facilities which might be reasonable in one case could be unreasonable in another."

In the same opinion, Judge Lemley further said, 84 F. Supp. at 988:

> "We are not going to attempt to say what a 'reasonable time' in this case will be; that is a matter properly left, for the time being, to the good faith and discretion of the Board. If the Board is dilatory, the plaintiffs are not without their remedy in the Courts."

The problem before Judge Lemley was, in effect, the same as now confronts this Court in the framing of its decrees. Judge Lemley decided that the negro children were entitled to separate but equal facilities. This Court has decided that the negro children in the instant cases are entitled to identical facilities, subject only to classification not based on race. Judge Lemley was confronted with a transition from unequal to equal facilities. This Court is confronted with a transition from separate to identical facilities.

It seems obvious that Judge Lemley adopted the logical and equitable solution of the problem before him. It appears also that this Court could find no better solution of its problem in the instant cases than remanding the four cases to the courts of first instance for adoption, in substance, of the language of Judge Lemley in the Pitts Case, supra.

It is contended, therefore, that the Court should enter a decree in each of the pending cases which will read substantially as follows:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"The case is remanded to the court of first instance with directions to enter such orders and decrees as are necessary and proper and not inconsistent with the opinion of this Court in this case. In exercising its jurisdiction upon remand, the court of first instance is left free to hold hearings, through a Special Master of the court if deemed necessary or appropriate, to consider and determine what provisions are essential, proper and appropriate to afford appellants and those similarly situated full protection against segregation of negro children in the public schools solely on the basis of race in violation of their rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution." Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461, 470.

POINT 3

The Court Should Leave the Problem of Integration of the Races in Public Schools to Congress for Appropriate Legislation

Even if the Court remands the pending cases with directions as suggested, there still remains the uncertainty of the immediate effect which those decrees may have on prospective cases in the federal courts in Arkansas. The Court must of necessity make some disposition of the pending cases by way of appropriate decrees. In this connection it is most respectfully urged that the Court take some action by way of a supplemental opinion, in addition to the specific decrees, which will have the effect of precluding what might well turn out to be a flood of cases in the federal courts of Arkansas and other so-called "segregated states."

The point here is that this Court can and should deal with the problem by way of supplemental opinion in such a way that the whole problem of solving the method of integration should fall squarely where the Fourteenth Amendment says it should fall; that is, on Congress for appropriate enactment.

In its opinion of May 17, this Court has definitely and finally decided that the separation of the races in public schools pursuant to state laws on a basis of race violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The law having thus been interpreted and declared by this Court for the first time, it now becomes the function and the constitutional duty of Congress to exercise the power granted by Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment is as follows:

> "The congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

It might be well to mention at the outset that it is fully recognized that "it is not for this Court to compete with Congress or attempt to replace it as the Nation's law-making body," Collins v. Hardyman, 341 U. S. 651, 663, and that "the judiciary may not, with safety to our institutions, enter the domain of legislative discretion and dictate the means which Congress shall employ in the exercise of its granted power. That would be sheer usurpation of the functions of a coordinate department, which, if often repeated, and permanently acquiesced in, would work a radical change in our system of government." Mr. Justice Harlan dissenting in The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 51.

Nevertheless, it would certainly not be entirely without precedent for this Court to point out to Congress, as urged here, the necessity for "appropriate legislation"; especially in view of the known fact that the prolonged inaction by Congress has now resulted in a condition which has some aspects at least of a national emergency.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

As a matter of pertinent history, it is very significant that the legislative records of Congress in promulgating the Fourteenth Amendment and of state legislatures in ratifying it have very little to say about racial segregation in public schools. It is, however, a matter of record that Senator Charles Sumner of Massachusetts appears to have strenuously but unsuccessfully advocated implementing legislation under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment which would have been a specific and far-reaching proscription of racial segregation in the public schools. Cong. Globe, 42 Cong., 2d Sess. 383-84 (1872).

By way of contrast, it is quite obvious from a reading of the Court's opinion in the Brown Case that, in arriving at its decision, the Court took full cognizance of contemporary conditions in the field of public education as compared with conditions existing at the time of and for many years subsequent to 1868. This Court said, 347 U. S. 492:

> "In approaching this problem, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868 when the Amendment was adopted, or even to 1896 when Plessy v. Ferguson was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the Nation . . . .
>
> "Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments . . . . In these days, it is doubtful that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of education."

The Court having pointed out so forcibly the evolving concept of the Fourteenth Amendment, it would seem to follow as a necessary conclusion that the Court should now (by way of an additional opinion) not only nudge but even exhort Congress to enact appropriate legislation under the power of Section 5 of the Amendment.

This Court could with complete propriety point out to Congress that legislative action is a necessity and that such necessity is a result of extending inaction by Congress. If Congress responds to the urgent invitation of the Court (and there are many reasons for believing that it will), then it will be performing the mandate of the people which is incorporated in Section 5 of the Amendment.

This Court in The Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 11, said that, under Section 5 of the Amendment, Congress is empowered > "To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts, and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous."

And in the same cases this Court said, 109 U. S. 14:

> "It is not necessary for us to state, if we could, what legislation would be proper for Congress to adopt. It is sufficient for us to examine whether the law in question is of that character."

In his very forceful dissenting opinion in The Civil Rights Cases, Mr. Justice Harlan said,

> "The legislation which Congress may enact, in execution of its power to enforce the provision of the amendment, is such as may be appropriate to protect the right granted. The word appropriate was undoubtedly used with reference to its meaning, as established by repeated decisions of this court. Under given circumstances, that which the court characterizes as corrective legislation might be deemed by Congress appropriate and entirely sufficient. Under other circumstances, primary direct legislation may be required. But it is for Congress, not the judiciary, to say that legislation is appropriate—that is—best adapted to the end to be attained."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The conclusion to be drawn from the decision in The Civil Rights Cases is that the "appropriate legislation" contemplated by Section 5 is co-extensive with and just as important a part of the Fourteenth Amendment as is Section 1 which declares the rights of all persons to equal protection under the laws. Therefore, whatever action Congress sees fit to take in the light of this Court's decision would rest upon the judgment of Congress; provided, of course, that such legislation is directed against state action. As Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said in United States v. Fisher, 6 U.S. 358:

> "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

Mr. Justice Frankfurter, concurring in McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U. S. 203, 212, said that the case

> ". . . demonstrates anew that the mere formulation of a relevant Constitutional principle is the beginning of the solution of a problem, not its answer." And in the same case, Mr. Justice Jackson, concurring, said, 33 U.S. at 237: 'It is idle to pretend that said, 333 U. S. at 237: 'It is idle to pretend that this task is one for which we can find in the Constitution one word to help us as judges to decide where the secular ends and the sectarian begins in education. Nor can we find guidance in any other legal source. It is a matter on which we can find no law but our own prepossessions. If with no surer legal guidance we are to take up and decide every variation of this controversy, raised by persons not subject to penalty or tax but who are dissatisfied with the way schools are dealing with the problem, we are likely . . . to make the legal "wall of separation between church and state" as winding as the > famous serpentine wall designed by Mr. Jefferson for the University he founded.' "

This Court in the Brown Case arrived merely at the "formulation of a relevant Constitutional principle." This Court should invoke immediate action by Congress to declare and solve the variations of the controversy which are prevalent in the so-called "segregated states" — particularly in Arkansas.

Again it is appropriate to refer to the opinion of Judge Lemley in his "separate but equal" decision, Pitts v. Board of Trustees, where he said, 84 F. Supp. at 988:

> "In the last analysis, this case and others like it present problems which are more than judicial and which involve elements of public finance, school administration, politics and sociology . . . . The federal courts are not school boards; they are not prepared to take over the administration of the public schools of the several states; nor can they place themselves in the position of censors over the administration of the schools by the duly appointed and qualified officials thereof, to whose judgment and good faith much must be left." See also Minersville School Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U. S. 586.

In the Pitts Case and other "equal facilities" cases like it, the Court had before it, insofar as enforcement is concerned, a much less complicated problem than the present problem of integration of races. The magnitude and complexity of the integration problem dictates a legislative solution.

In the enactment of appropriate legislation under Section 5 of the Amendment, Congress could, and probably would, recognize the necessity of allowing school officials wide latitude of administrative discretion under the supervision of a federal agency which would guarantee ultimate integration. Congress could make adequate provisions for variations in such matters as geographical peculiarities, increasing or decreasing enrollment in particular districts, ratios of enrollment as between white and negro children, population shifts and any other factors which Congress might consider to be relevant.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Under Section 5, Congress would undoubtedly have power to fix a definite future date for complete integration in the several districts which have heretofore operated under the segregated system; or Congress might provide that integration must be completed in all districts within a reasonable time — such reasonable time to be determined in the manner prescribed by Congress.

As said by Mr. Chief Justice Stone in Coleman v. Miller, 307 U. S. 433, 453,

> "The question of a reasonable time in many cases would involve, as in this case it does involve, an appraisal of a great variety of relevant conditions, political, social and economic, which can hardly be said to be within the appropriate range of evidence receivable in a court of justice and as to which it would be an extravagant extension of judicial authority to assert judicial notice as the basis of deciding a controversy with respect to the validity of an amendment actually ratified. On the other hand, these conditions are appropriate for the consideration of the political departments of the Government. The questions they involve are essentially political and not justiciable. They can be decided by Congress with the full knowledge and appreciation ascribed to the national legislature of the political, social and economic conditions which have prevailed during the period since the submission of the amendment."

It is submitted that so long as Congress confines its "corrective" legislation to state action which infringes the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress would be the "guardian of its own conscience" as to what legislation on the school integration subject is more or less "appropriate." In fact, it has been noted that in other fields it has not been uncommon for Congress to leave detailed administration to state control and discretion so long as such control and discretion are kept within the framework dictated by federal law. Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U. S. 548, and Parker v. Brown, 317 U. S. 341.

The Constitution has conferred upon Congress the power to secure equal educational opportunities in the public schools for all children regardless of race. If Congress has failed and should continue to fail in exercising its powers whereby equal educational opportunity is denied by reason of state laws "the remedy will ultimately be with the people." "The Constitution has left the performance of many duties in our governmental scheme to depend on the fidelity of the executive and legislative action and, ultimately, on the vigilance of the people in exercising their political rights." Colegrove v. Green, 328 U. S. 549, 556.

It is a matter of particular interest here that on the very same day this Court decided the school segregation cases (May 17, 1954) the Court also decided a very important case arising under the Federal Tort Claims Act, 60 Stat. 842. The case was United States v. Gilman, 347 U. S. 507. In construing the act, the unanimous Court, through Mr. Justice Douglas said, 347 U. S. at 511.

> "Here a complex of relations between federal agencies and their staffs is involved. Moreover, the claim now asserted, though the product of a law Congress passed, is a matter on which Congress has not taken a position. It presents questions of policy on which Congress has not spoken. The selection of that policy, which is most advantageous to the whole, involves a host of considerations that must be weighed and appraised. That function is more appropriately for those who write the laws, rather than those who interpret them."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the instant cases the Court is most certainly dealing with "a complex of relations" between the federal government on the one hand and the state governments on the other. The specific problem of implementing Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment as interpreted by this Court is a matter on which Congress has not taken a position over a period of eighty-six years and presents serious "questions of policy." The selection of policy relating to the integration of the races in public schools "involves a host of considerations that must be weighed and appraised." This Court should, in some appropriate manner, leave the details of the solution of the problem "to those who write the laws."

CONCLUSION

The point which is urged here with most emphasis is that a decree of this Court ordering immediate integration of the white and negro children would have a most disastrous effect upon the public school system of Arkansas. Likewise, it would most seriously disrupt the efforts of the leaders of both races in solving the racial problem in Arkansas in all its various aspects. No person or court can predict at this time what the consequences would ultimately be. There is no need for immediate integration in the public schools. It is not required by the Constitution.

The problem of integration of races in the public schools is of such magnitude that it can be solved effectively only by a gradual process which would vary from locality to locality. It is probably safe to assert at this time that no person or group of persons — not even any court — has formulated any definite plan of integration which would operate successfully in the school districts of Arkansas. As to the four cases now before the Court, the plan for integration in the districts which would be directly affected by those cases must, for the time being at least, be formulated, developed and finally concluded under the supervision and control of the courts of first instance. The decrees of this Court should accord to the lower courts the very widest range of discretion in bringing about integration in a manner which will promote, rather than retard the ultimate solution of the whole problem.

Finally and most earnestly, it is urged that this Court, by a supplemental opinion, point out in no uncertain terms that the integration problem is one which should be solved by Congress under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. The American system of government being what it is, this Court cannot compel Congress to act. But certainly this Court can, by some appropriate suggestion, bring about prompt and appropriate action by that branch of the government in which the people themselves, by adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, lodged the power to adopt the appropriate plan to correct the conditions which, so this Court has said, the states have brought about in violation of the Amendment.

If the powers of this Court were not limited by the Constitution, the proper decrees of this Court in the pending cases would be to "remand the cases" to Congress with directions to take appropriate action. Lacking the power to command Congress, the next best thing would be a most urgent invitation to Congress from this Court. It is such a course which this Court is asked to adopt to the very limit of its power. If the Court complies with this request, then the solution of the problem will rest where it was intended by the Constitution that it should rest—with the Congress.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

November 15, 1954.

Respectfully submitted,

TOM GENTRY
Attorney General
State of Arkansas
State Capitol
Little Rock, Arkansas

JAMES L. SLOAN
Assistant Attorney General
State of Arkansas
State Capitol
Little Rock, Arkansas

RICHARD B. MCCULLOCH
Special Asst. Attorney General
State of Arkansas
Forrest City, Arkansas

APPENDIX

ARKANSAS SCHOOL ENROLLMENT

1953-54 SESSION

COUNTY	Enrollment White	Negro	Total	Annual Receipts	Annual Disb'mts
Arkansas . . .	3,630	1,360	4,990	$ 891,277	$ 732,917
Ashley	3,963	2,367	6,330	1,018,902	895,782
Baxter	2,148	xxx	2,148	326,545	286,029
Benton	7,443	1	7,444	1,199,694	1,046,447
Boone	3,516	xxx	3,516	488,271	483.435
Bradley	2,064	932	2,996	479,622	454,240
Calhoun	1,056	592	1,648	286,115	263,004
Carroll	2,240	xxx	2,240	330,165	315,957
Chicot	2,461	3,053	5,514	837,044	666,743
Clark	3,430	1,569	4,999	719,768	644,724
Clay	5,899	xxx	5,899	712,092	695,944
Cleburne . . .	2,466	xxx	2,466	273,697	257,370
Cleveland . . .	1,546	526	2,072	353,646	333,275
Columbia . . .	3,679	2,807	6,486	1,010,188	927,011
Conway	2,721	1,211	3,932	535,174	489,141
Craighead . . .	11,264	295	11,559	1,502,603	1,389,577
Crawford . . .	5,147	87	5,234	647,874	635,714
Crittenden . .	4,012	6,909	10,921	1,254,324	1,052,578
Cross	4,106	1,985	6,091	797,101	731,553
Dallas	1,659	1,221	2,880	467,792	430,774
Desha	3,426	3,078	6,504	824,451	730,117
Drew	2,237	1,366	3,603	544,724	463.941
Faulkner . . .	3,981	612	4,593	633,314	620,258
Franklin . . .	3,033	38	3,071	408,118	376,237
Fulton	1,728	xxx	1,728	243,406	232,057
Garland	8,045	910	8,955	1,449,747	1,392,016
Grant	2,121	203	2,324	381,496	364,546
Greene	6,608	xxx	6,608	856,064	781,482

ARKANSAS SCHOOL ENROLLMENT

1953-54 SESSION

COUNTY	Enrollment White	Negro	Total	Annual Receipts	Annual Disb'mts
Hempstead . .	2,965	2,355	5,320	783,593	707,316
Hot Spring . .	4,860	744	5,604	1,020,340	877,411
Howard	2,333	809	3,142	511,605	449,967
Ind'p'nd'nce .	4,723	77	4,800	637,999	593,318
Izard	2,093	14	2,107	240,407	224,549
Jackson	5,005	904	5,909	824,448	766,556
Jefferson . . .	8,869	8,025	16,894	2,353,543	2,038,288
Johnson	3,159	41	3,200	450,995	434,097
Lafayette . . .	1,629	1,614	3,243	560,538	480,749
Lawrence . . .	4,857	55	4,912	732,762	670,184
Lee	2,316	3,552	5,868	626,368	537,960
Lincoln	1,744	1,887	3,631	544,104	470,376
Little River .	1,799	964	2,763	438,760	393,134
Logan	3,230	169	3,399	558,614	482,709
Lonoke	4,518	1,428	5,946	829,476	723,716
Madison	2,640	xxx	2,640	277,237	266,346
Marion	1,516	xxx	1,516	254,566	232,608
Miller	5,927	2,106	8,033	1,143,452	1,027,337
Mississippi . .	13,218	4,789	18,007	2,366,353	2,302,446
Monroe	2,394	2,176	4,570	526,483	483,524
Montgomery	1,416	3	1,419	284,030	232,634
Nevada	1,893	1,498	3,391	588,702	494,588
Newton	1,946	xxx	1,946	220,148	212,226
Ouachita . . .	4,781	3,637	8,418	1,336,720	1,095,448
Perry	1,297	48	1,345	221,272	190,383
Phillips	4,294	6,409	10,703	1,132,056	1,036,507
Pike	2,003	74	2,077	348,979	304,222
Poinsett	8,022	694	8,716	1,035,175	972,903
Polk	2,931	xxx	2,931	534,865	439,619
Pope	4,270	123	4,393	608,356	589,653

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

ARKANSAS SCHOOL ENROLLMENT

1953-54 SESSION

COUNTY	Enrollment White	Negro	Total	Annual Receipts	Annual Disb'mts
Prairie	2,296	575	2,871	433,500	413,484
Pulaski	27,695	9,088	36,783	6,413,057	5,871,522
Randolph . . .	2,808	31	2,839	374,322	337,164
Saline	4,800	88	4,888	791,254	729,381
Scott	1,564	xxx	1,564	295,193	254,689
Searcy	2,200	xxx	2,200	278,123	266,129
Sebastian . . .	12,400	903	13,303	2,138,442	2,023,826
Sevier	2,264	264	2,528	479,528	376,536
Sharp	2,345	xxx	2,345	328,387	308,232
St. Francis . .	3,740	5,300	9,040	948,998	886,075
Stone	1,590	xxx	1,590	194,428	182,477
Union	7,524	4,325	11,849	2,264,543	1,892,648
Van Buren . .	1,960	17	1,977	268,505	256,415
Washington .	9,299	64	9,363	1,262,843	1,213,977
White	7,817	302	8,119	1,230,306	1,160,193
Woodruff . . .	2,552	1,946	4,498	553,958	544,544
Yell	2,910	90	3,000	539,774	477,755
TOTAL	314,041	98,310	412,351	$60,261,321	$54,618,690

NOV 15 195
HAROLD B. WILLEY, C

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1953

Nos. 1, 2, 4 and 10 5

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL.,
Appellants,
vs.
BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.,

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL.,
Appellants,
vs.
R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL.,
Appellants,
vs.
COUNTY BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.

FRANCES B. GEBHART, ET AL.,
Petitioners,
vs.
ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.

AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF MARYLAND

EDWARD D. E. ROLLINS,
Attorney General of Maryland,
1201 Mathieson Building,
Baltimore, Maryland,

W. GILES PARKER,
Assistant Attorney General of Maryland,

JAMES H. NORRIS, JR.,
Spec. Asst. Attorney General of Maryland.

The Daily Record Co., Baltimore 3, Md.

INDEX

Table of Contents

PAGE

I. Preliminary Statement 1

II. Questions Presented 3

III. Argument:

1. This Court may and should, in the exercise of its equity powers, so frame its decree as to effect an effective, gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems of public education to systems not based on color distinctions 4

2. These cases should be remanded to the courts of first instance to frame decrees in accordance with the general principles of law as stated by this Court in its opinion, and without specific directions as to methods or time of compliance, which questions should be determined by the courts of first instance in the light of local conditions as they may be found to exist 9

IV. Conclusion 17

Table of Citations

Cases

Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U. S. 607 5

Baltimore v. Brack, 175 Md. 615, 3 A. 2d 471 7

Caretti v. Broring Building Co., 150 Md. 198, 132 A. 619 7

Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230 7

Minersville School Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U. S. 586, 84 L. Ed. 1375 14

PAGE

Virginian R. Co. v. System Federation R. E. D., 300 U. S. 515 5
Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414, 88 L. Ed. 834 6

Statutes

14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States 4, 6
28 U. S. C. A. 2106 5

Miscellaneous

Address of the Solicitor General of the United States before the Judicial Conference of the Fourth Circuit 8
"The Negro and the Schools", Harry S. Ashmore 10, 16
Report to the Governor of North Carolina 17

INDEX TO APPENDIX

APP. PAGE

I. Report to the State Board of Education and the Attorney General of Maryland by the School Superintendent's Committee 1
II. Statement of the State Board of Education, May 26, 1954 17
III. A Survey of Negro Education in Maryland, with tables 19
IV. Tables:
(a) Maryland population by counties and races (1950) 37
(b) White and Negro School population (1954) 38
(c) White and Negro School population (by Elementary and Secondary Schools) 39
(d) White and Negro School Teaching Personnel (1954) 40

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

	App. page
(e) White and Negro School Buildings (1954)	41
(f) Data on School Bus transportation (1954)	42
(g) Data on School Personnel, Superintendents etc. (1954)	43
(h) Population Map of Maryland Counties	45
V. Data relating to desegregation of the Schools in the City of Baltimore:
(a) Letter of Transmittal (Dr. John H. Fischer)	47
(b) Opinion of the City Solicitor of Baltimore (June 1, 1954)	49
(c) Resolution of Board of School Commissioners (June 3, 1954)	50
(d) Report of Superintendent to Board (June 10, 1954)	50
(e) Message of Superintendent to Teachers (June 14, 1954)	52
VI. The So-called "West River Proclamation"	62
VII. Form of petition circulated during summer of 1954 by volunteers of so-called Maryland Petition Committee	63
VIII. Data on Negro point of view as expressed at Conference of Negro Educators (June 19, 1954):
(a) Letter of transmittal (Dr. Martin D. Jenkins)	64
(b) Statement of opinion of Conference (June 19, 1954)	65
(c) Outline of Recommendations for Integration (June 19, 1954)	68
IX. Statement of Trustee Committee on State Scholarships (July 7, 1954)	70

	App. page
X. Maryland Constitutional Provisions and Statutes relating to Segregation in Education:
(a) Article VIII, Sec. 1, Constitution of Maryland	72
(b) Article 77, Sec. 160, Annotated Code of Maryland (1951 Ed.)	72
(c) Article 77, Sec. 207, Annotated Code of Maryland (1951 Ed.)	72
(d) Article 77, Sec. 208, Annotated Code of Maryland (1951 Ed.)	73
(e) Article 77, Sec. 269, Annotated Code of Maryland (1951 Ed.)	73
(f) Article 32, Sec. 22, Baltimore City Code (Originally Ordinance of Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, No. 44, July 10, 1867)	74

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1953

Nos. 1, 2, 4 and 10

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL.,
Appellants,

VS.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL.,
Appellants,

VS.

R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL.,
Appellants,

VS.

COUNTY BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.

FRANCES B. GEBHART, ET AL.,
Petitioners,

VS.

ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.

AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF MARYLAND

I. PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

This amicus curiae brief filed by the Attorney General of Maryland, pursuant to permission granted by this Honorable Court, is intended to be exactly what its name imparts, i.e., we shall endeavor, as a friend of the court to assist in the resolution of the questions propounded. The Attorney General is, of course, not intervening in the cause, nor is he authorized to submit the State of Maryland as a party to the instant case. The opinions expressed herein are those of the Attorney General and, of course, do not preclude the Legislature of the State of Maryland, nor the people thereof from taking any action dealing with the segregation problem which may in the future seem desirable to those bodies.

A thorough study has been made for the assistance of the Attorney General by the educational authorities of the State, and our argument must necessarily, to a great degree, be based upon the facts as they exist in the State of Maryland, which a cursory study indicates are not greatly different from those in most of the other States involved, i.e. those States either requiring or permitting segregation, because of color, in public education. The general feeling of the people of Maryland on the subject is substantially similar, although perhaps not as intense as that of the people of the States further South, and the laws of Maryland requiring segregation in education (App. 72, 73) are substantially similar to those of the States from which the cases before the Court have arisen. A more detailed review of the factual situation in our State will be made during the course of argument herein, and, at this point, the Court may be assured that no attempt has been made herein to circumvent or contest the broad principles of law as stated by this Court in its previous opinion in these cases, and the Attorney General, speaking for himself and the State Department of Education at least, assures the Court of the good faith of the State of Maryland in its endeavor to implement this Court's decision.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

II. QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Strictly speaking, an amicus curiae should address himself exclusively to the Court's decision in the particular cases at the bar. However, in view of the language of the opinion previously given which, in effect, considers these cases as though they were in form as well as in substance, class actions, this amicus curiae will endeavor to assist the Court in a broader manner than would normally be indicated. The Court has presented for argument questions 4 and 5, previously considered, namely:

> "4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment
>
> "(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or
>
> "(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?
>
> "5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),
>
> "(a) should this Court formulate decrees in these cases;
>
> "(b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;
>
> "(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;
>
> "(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

We believe that these questions should be resolved in favor of an affirmative answer to Question 4(b), and a further affirmative answer to Question 5(d), with certain reservations and qualifications, which will be suggested in the course of argument.

III. ARGUMENT

1.

This Court May and Should, in the Exercise of its Equity Powers, so Frame its Decree as to Effect an Effective, Gradual Adjustment to be Brought About From Existing Segregated Systems of Public Education to Systems Not Based on Color Distinctions.

There is a plenitude of authority to support the conclusion that this Court (and, for that matter, the court of first instance) has the power to decree an effective, gradual adjustment of the problems involved in the matter of racial segregation in public education.

Undoubtedly, the violation of a legal right, and specifically the violation of the right to equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, is a proper subject for an equitable decree or injunction to enforce the maintenance of that right in the cases before the Court. However, the questions which have arisen are not confined to the rights of the parties to the cases themselves alone, but involve a deep and lasting effect upon a large portion of our nation. For all practical purposes, a new right has been created for the possible benefit of approximately two million children and their parents, and, as always, with the creation of legal rights, one of the effects is bound to be a limitation of rights or privileges, real or fancied, theretofore enjoyed by others.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Congress has empowered this Court to grant any remedy which it may find consonant with the public interest, and that of the parties involved. 28 U. S. C. A., 2106 states:

> "The Supreme Court or any other court of appellate jurisdiction may affirm, modify, vacate, set aside or reverse any judgment, decree, or order of a court lawfully brought before it for review, and may remand the cause and direct the entry of such appropriate judgment, decree, or order, or require such further proceedings to be had as may be just under the circumstances. (June 25, 1948, c. 646, 62 Stat. 963.)"

This Honorable Court has shown by its decisions on many occasions the broad and flexible character of its powers in adopting remedies to the circumstances of the case. In Virginian R. Co. v. System Federation R. E. D., 300 U. S. 515, at 552, this Court said:

> "Courts of equity may, and frequently do, go much farther both to give and withhold relief in furtherance of the public interest than they are accustomed to go when only private interests are involved."

Language particularly applicable to the present situation was used by this Court in Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U. S. 607 at 619, wherein it was said that:

> "Such a disposition is most consonant with justice to all interests in retracing the erroneous course that has been taken."

It has appeared from the Court's previous opinion in these cases that most of the nation has been operating under the erroneous supposition that segregation in public education was not a violation of the prohibitions of the 14th Amendment as long as facilities provided for the races were substantially equal, and this Court should make a disposition of the cases consonant with justice to all interests involved in retracing the erroneous course that has been taken. It must be recognized that dangerous consequences could very well follow any other course in this Honorable Court's final decree.

In the case of Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414 at 441, 88 L. Ed. 834 at 857, this Court said:

> "But where an injunction is asked which will adversely affect a public interest for whose impairment, even temporarily, an injunction bond cannot compensate, the court may in the public interest withhold relief until a final determination of the rights of the parties, though the postponement may be burdensome to the plaintiff. Virginian R. Co. v. United States, 272 U. S. 658, 672, 673, 71 L. ed. 463, 471, 47 S. Ct. 222; Petroleum Exploration v. Public Serv. Commission, 304 U. S. 209, 222, 223, 82 L. ed. 1294, 1303, 1304, 58 S. Ct. 834; Dryfoos v. Edwards (D. C.) 284 F. 596, 603, affirmed in 251 U. S. 146, 64 L. ed. 194, 40 S. Ct. 106; see Beaumont, S. L. & W. R. Co. v. United States, 282 U. S. 74, 91, 92, 75 L. ed. 221, 233, 51 S. Ct. 1. Compare Wisconsin v. Illinois, 278 U S. 367, 418-421, 73 L. ed. 426, 434-436, 49 S. Ct. 163. This is but another application of the principle, declared in Virginian R. Co. v. System Federation, R. E. D. 300 U. S. 515, 552, 81 L. ed. 789, 802, 57 S. Ct. 592, that 'Courts of equity may, and frequently do, go much farther both to give and withhold relief in furtherance of the public interest than they are accustomed to go when only private interests are involved.' "

The abolition of segregation in public education is beyond question a problem of great public interest and undoubtedly a court of equity may grant or withhold its aid and the manner of moulding its remedies should be influenced by the public interest involved. This is nothing new to courts of equity in the State of Maryland. For example, in the case of Caretti v. Broring Building Co., 150 Md. 198, 132 A. 619, the Court of Appeals of Maryland determined in a case brought to enjoin a nuisance (namely the emptying of sewage into a stream of water flowing through Caretti's land) that since the sudden closing of the system, which admittedly was creating an enjoinable nuisance, might create a serious situation affecting others than the plaintiff and defendant, that the case should be remanded to the lower court with instructions to issue an injunction, unless within a reasonable time the Company changed its system in such a way as to avoid injury to Caretti. See also Baltimore v. Brack, 175 Md. 615, 3 A. 2d 471. In the case of Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, a suit in equity to enjoin the Tennessee Copper Company from emitting noxious gas over an area in the State of Georgia, this Court held that there is no alternative to the issuance of an injunction after allowing a reasonable time to the defendants to complete efforts that they were at that time making to remedy the situation.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Apparently an important factor in all of the cases is the good faith of the defendant in his effort to alleviate the condition complained of by the plaintiff, and the courts under such circumstances have been loathe to use drastic remedies to enforce even obvious rights where such enforcement might cause inconvenience or damage to third parties, or even to the defendant himself.

With reference to the State of Maryland, the Department of Education and the State Law Department, as represented by the Attorney General, have accepted the decision of the Supreme Court and are currently engaged in planning to take such action as has been indicated is required by law by this Court's previous opinion, and as may be further indicated by the final decree in these cases. See the Report to the State Board of Education and the Attorney General of Maryland by the School Superintendent's Committee (App. 1). See also the Statement of the State Board of Education, May 26, 1954 (App. 17). We will consider below at greater length the current factual situation with respect to public education administration and public opinion in the State of Maryland, but suffice it to say at this time that the good faith of the State cannot be questioned in the premises, and it is respectfully urged, for the above reasons, that the answer to Question 4 should be an affirmative one with respect to 4(b), i.e. that this Court should exercise its existing equity powers to permit an effective, gradual adjustment to be brought about as the most equitable solution of the problem created by the impact of this Court's decision upon established practices and mores. In the words of the Solicitor General of the United States, in an address before the Judicial Conference of the Fourth Circuit, on June 29, 1954:

> "* * * In our system the Supreme Court is not merely the adjudicator of controversies, but in the process of adjudication it is in many instances the final formulator of national policy. It should therefore occasion no wonder, if the Court seeks the appropriate time to consider and decide important questions, just as Congress or any other policy-making body might. For example, for several years before taking the School Segregation Cases the Court repeatedly turned away opportunities to decide questions in that area, perhaps because they deemed them premature. Lately it declined to review a ruling on segregation in public housing, perhaps because the Court thought it best, after deciding the School Cases, not to say more on other aspects of segregation at this time. Or the Court may think the record in the case at hand not adequate or otherwise unsuitable to raise and decide the point. We can only speculate. In the decision of great constitutional questions, especially those which are in the realm of political controversy, timing can be of supreme importance."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2.

These Cases Should be Remanded to the Courts of First Instance to Frame Decrees in Accordance With the General Principles of Law as Stated by This Court in its Opinion, and Without Specific Directions as to Methods or Time of Compliance, Which Questions Should be Determined by the Courts of First Instance in the Light of Local Conditions as They May be Found to Exist.

It is the contention of this amicus curiae that the cases before the Court should be remanded to the courts of first instance for the framing of decrees in accordance with the general principles of law as stated in the Court's opinion of May 17, 1954, with specific instructions only to frame such decrees so as to permit an effective, gradual adjustment to be brought about. The courts of first instance, in our opinion, should frame their decrees so as to carry out the processes of desegregation as soon as reasonably possible under the conditions which those courts may find to exist in the areas of their jurisdiction.

It is difficult, if not impossible, for us to argue on the facts that exist in the current cases before the Court, and we are only fully acquainted with the facts as they exist in the State of Maryland, which, however, we feel are so analogous to those existing in the States involved in the instant cases that an argument based on the situation as it exists in the State of Maryland would be a valid and compelling one, if otherwise sound. Maryland is a State with a long tradition of the operation of its public schools on a basis of segregation by race. The State Constitution has provided for the education of both the white and colored races since 1867, and the Maryland statutes, under which the school system operates upon this basis, will be found in the Appendix at pages 72, 73. Maryland has made considerable progress in the education of the Negro, and it is completely true that in Maryland today educational facilities are equal although separate — equal in physical fact and not by law alone or in theory only. As a matter of fact, in some respects, the State of Maryland has shown less discrimination against its Negro students and educators than certain other States in which segregation has been illegal for many years. This shows up particularly with respect to teaching personnel. Maryland, with a population of 2,350,000 has over 2,900 colored school teachers for a non-white population of 388,000; whereas, New Jersey, for example, with a population of 4,835,000, has only 645 colored teachers for a non-white population of 324,000 and Connecticut with a population of over two million has, we are informed, fewer than 100 colored school teachers. Other indications of this situation may be found as referred to in the so-called Ashmore Report, "The Negro and the Schools", The University of North Carolina Press, 1954; which is undoubtedly well known to every member of this Court.

The University of Maryland has been operating on a non-segregated basis in its graduate schools for a number of years, and has recently begun to admit Negroes to its undergraduate courses. The State of Maryland has been spending in excess of $200,000 annually for scholarships for Negroes to out-of-State institutions offering courses which were not available to them at the University of Maryland until this year, and one effect of the Supreme Court's opinion followed by the desegregation of the University has been to eliminate the granting of any further scholarships of this nature (Statement of Trustee Committee on State Scholarships, July 7, 1954, App. 70). The State further operates Morgan State College, which was designed primarily as an institution of higher learning for Negroes, but which has of recent years admitted white students also who care to attend that institution. So much for the situation with respect to higher education.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the City of Baltimore, the public school system has begun the process of desegregation with the Fall Term of 1954, and the documents under which such program was instituted will be found in the Appendix at pp. 47 et seq., with, on the whole, a great deal of success, although some difficulties have been encountered.

In the Counties of Maryland outside of the City of Baltimore, the situation is extremely varied. Maryland has been called "America in Miniature", the aptness of which is certainly indicated by the figures on population and school attendance. The Court is respectfully referred to the population map at page 45 in the Appendix, from which, it may readily be seen that the percentage of Negro population varies from practically zero in Garrett County to almost fifty per cent in Calvert County, there being as much difference in this respect between these two Counties as there is between Maine and Mississippi. There are eight Counties with less than ten per cent Negro population; five with from ten to twenty per cent; six with from twenty to thirty per cent; and four with from forty to fifty per cent. Further, the existing public mores, ways of life and established patterns of thinking vary, probably, to a greater degree than the population statistics, although it must be reiterated, in every County substantially physically equal facilities have been provided for Negro students, and in most of the Counties the facilities provided for the Negro students are superior physically, because newer, than those provided for white children. The tables in our Appendix indicate better than anything we can say the situation with respect to the various problems involved, namely, school population, teaching personnel, school buildings and bus transportation, all of which are factors which must be considered in any survey of the factual situation. It will be seen from a reading of the entire Report to the State Board of Education and the Attorney General of Maryland by the School Superintendent's Committee (App. 1) that the authorities in the field of public education in the State of Maryland are in favor of a peaceful implementation of the Court's decree, whatever form it may take, and they have made what we strongly urge the Court to accept as proper recommendations for the processes of change.

We believe that if left alone to devise in good faith a timetable for the desegregation of every school in Maryland, the local authorities will best be able to solve this problem with the fewest possible ill effects. Unfortunately, all Maryland thinking is not along these lines. Undoubtedly, at the next session of the Maryland Legislature, there will be a deluge of bills and proposals, petitions and propositions, urging everything from the abolition of the school system in its entirety to the election of school teachers by popular vote. The Attorney General of Maryland has received hundreds of letters of varying degrees of literacy upon this subject, all containing suggestions as to what ought to be done.

Two of the more serious attempts to circumvent or defeat this Court's decision are exemplified by two of the inclusions in our Appendix, namely, the so-called "West River Proclamation" (App. 62, 63), which was issued by an earnest and intelligent group of parents of school children in one of the Counties of Southern Maryland. Another example is the petition which has been circulated by the so-called "Maryland Petition Committee", and which already has thousands of signatures appended thereto. A copy of this may be found in the Appendix at page 63. These two documents illustrate the point of view of what might be called the "upper brackets" of anti-integration. Other suggestions go all the way down the line from the type of action indicated by these two inclusions in our Appendix to outright demand for blood and the reactivation of the Ku Klux Klan. On the other hand, there are those who are in favor of immediate integration and even in favor of the establishment of hard and fast school districts, and the requirement that all pupils must attend a particular school regardless of their or their parents' choice in the matter. This has never been a practice in the State of Maryland, and all children have always had a choice of schools and there has been no arbitrary districting except in cases of serious overcrowding. The above point of view is represented by the data to be found in the Appendix at pages 64 et seq., arising out of a conference of Negro educators at Morgan State College on June 19, 1954. This also earnest and intelligent group has apparently studied the problem carefully but has, as may be seen from the data in the Appendix, reached utterly different conclusions, not only from the anti-integrationists, but also from what may be called the middle view taken by the school authorities in the City of Baltimore, as is indicated by the message of the School Superintendent to Teachers of June 14, 1954, to be found in the Appendix at page 52. We are inclined to urge the latter view as the best authority when coupled with a reasonable time schedule, remembering always that what may be done in one County without perceptible effect, could not be done in another County at the same time without grave danger of serious public disorder and personal violence.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It has not been difficult to find judicial authority for the proposition stated in the argument above concerning the equity powers of the courts. However, in arguing the second question, we are removing ourselves from the area of the "is" to the area of the "ought to be". We are transporting our argument from the field of law to that of psychology, sociology and public relations. However, it is no new thing to state that this Court should not place itself in the position of attempting to engage in the administration of any public school system. As was said by this very Court in the case of Minersville School Dist. v. Gobitis, 310 U. S. 586, 84 L. Ed. 1375, at 1381:

> "* * * But the courtroom is not the arena for debating issues of educational policy. It is not our province to choose among competing considerations in the subtle process of securing effective loyalty to the traditional ideals of democracy, while respecting at the same time individual idiosyncracies among a people so diversified in racial origins and religious allegiances. So to hold would in effect make us the school board for the country. That authority has not been given to this Court, nor should we assume it."

Just as soon as this Court decrees "an effective, gradual adjustment", the timetable and the methods to be used to accomplish such "an effective, gradual adjustment" become a matter of school administration, and we respectfully urge that this Court, or any court, should only intervene where school administrators on the local level can be shown to have failed to exercise good faith and reasonable diligence to that end. We further believe that the cases before the Court should be remanded to the courts of first instance with as few specific instructions as possible, except to frame decrees so as to permit the "effective, gradual adjustment", with, of course, a right of review of their actions in such matters by this Honorable Court, if necessary by the continuing supervision of these particular cases. It is further respectfully urged that the courts of first instance, in the cases at bar, and also other nisi prius courts in which similar cases may be pending, or in which similar cases may be filed in the future, be guided by principles substantially similar to those recommended in the Report included in the Appendix at page 10, i.e.:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

1. The Courts should enforce the constitutional right of any child to attend the school of his choice within reasonable limits, and this right must not be impaired because of race or color.

2. The Courts should recognize that they are not school boards or administrative bodies at any level. Their function should be judicial and not administrative.

3. The Courts should take into consideration in enforcing the rights of one citizen, or a class of citizens, the possible effect of such enforcement upon the rights of other citizens.

4. The Courts should take into consideration the good faith and intentions of those with a desire to accept the Court's decree and charged with the difficult job of carrying out the process at a level dealing with human minds and bodies and not with abstract principles, however lofty, and these administrators must, therefore, not be hampered by unnecessary restrictions.

5. The Courts should take into account the motives of those who, in the future, may bring actions to enforce the rights established by this Court's decision.

In any event, this amicus curiae and the educational authorities of the State of Maryland stand together in one respect at least, and that is that, under no circumstances should little children of any race be used as guinea pigs in experiments to support or destroy anyone's social theories. The purpose of an educational system is to educate, and there can be no sound reason, in the operation of a sound educational system like that of Maryland, to operate so as to arbitrarily create integration any more than to create segregation. As a matter of fact of which this Court is probably well aware, school segregation has been well on its way out long before this Court acted in the present cases. We cannot express this feeling better than in the words of Harry S. Ashmore in "The Negro and the Schools", at page 135:

> "Finally, there is the hard fact that integration in a meaningful sense cannot be achieved by the mere physical presence of children of two races in a single classroom. No public school is isolated from the community that supports it, and if the very composition of its classes is subject to deep-seated and sustained public disapproval it is hardly likely to foster the spirit of united effort essential to learning. Even those who are dedicated to the proposition that the common good demands the end of segregation in education cannot be unaware that if the transition produces martyrs they will be the young children who must bear the brunt of spiritual conflict."

We do not want spiritual conflict in our school children, nor do we yearn to create martyrs. We do want to preserve public peace and order and, at the same time, continue the excellence of the school system which Maryland has enjoyed for many years, and as was said in the Report to the Governor of North Carolina by the Institute of Government of the University of North Carolina, at page 38:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "Law and order is an achievement of men and women and not a gift of the gods. It must be affirmed or lost in every generation."

Good public schools are likewise an achievement and not a gift and it is to preserve these achievements that we respectfully urge the Court that time, understanding and education of the public are necessary to solve the great problem which has been created by the decision in the instant cases, and we, therefore, urge that this Court so frame its decree as to leave the determination of the "how" and the "when" at the lowest possible local level administratively, if possible, and judicially, if necessary.

CONCLUSION

It is, for the reasons stated in the argument, respectfully submitted to the Court by this amicus curiae, that this Court so frame its decree as to answer the questions propounded in the manner in which we have indicated.

Respectfully submitted,

EDWARD D. E. ROLLINS,
Attorney General of Maryland,

W. GILES PARKER,
Assistant Attorney General of Maryland,

JAMES H. NORRIS, JR.,
Spec. Asst. Attorney General of Maryland.

APPENDIX TO AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF OF ATTORNEY GENERAL OF MARYLAND

I.

REPORT

TO

THE STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION

AND

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF MARYLAND

Foreword

This report combines the findings and recommendations of individuals, and committee groups, who have—

(1) studied the recent opinion of the Supreme Court with respect to segregated school systems, such as exist in the twenty-three counties of Maryland;

(2) gathered pertinent data; and,

(3) developed statements of principles for consideration by:

The State Board of Education
and
The Attorney-General of Maryland

William S. Schmidt, Chairman.

Acknowledgment is due many individuals in the preparation of this report. As chairman of the Superintendent's Committee on Desegregation of the Public Schools of Maryland, I wish to express my gratitude first to the members of my committee,

Mr. James M. Bennett, Superintendent of Schools, Wicomico County,

Mr. William M. Brish, Superintendent of Schools, Washington County,

Mr. Reade W. Corr, Superintendent of Schools, Kent County

and

Mr. John H. Fischer, Superintendent of Schools, Baltimore City, who assisted me so ably in the gathering of data and the drafting of statements of general principles, as well as, through their critical reading of the preliminary report.

The Committee is indebted especially to our State Superintendent of Schools, Dr. Thomas G. Pullen, Jr., to Mr. W. Giles Parker, Assistant Attorney-General of Maryland, and to Mr. Paul E. Huffington, State Supervisor of High Schools, for their invaluable contribution of thought, and their wise counsel. The Committee also wishes to acknowledge the help of all others who had a share in gathering and compiling the data upon which this report is based.

As chairman, I wish to express my appreciation to a member of my professional staff, Miss Rowannetta S. Allen, for her assistance in editing and combining the several reports received.

Maryland has always been considerate of its colored population. As a matter of fact, the State was considerate of the Negro race when most of its representatives within the confines of the State were not citizens but slaves. The most eloquent testimony of this fact is that in 1861 the number of Negroes in Maryland was about equally divided between freed men and slaves. In its Constitution of 1867 the State provided for the education of both the white and colored races. True, it did provide for the education of both races in separate schools, but this was the accepted pattern of the day.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Elsewhere in this report is a summary of the progress that has been made in the education of the colored race in Maryland from 1867 through 1954, a period of nearly a century. Progress has been phenomenal. It is not the purpose of this report to belabor this particular point; facts and figures are cited merely to prove the good will and intent of the State of Maryland toward all its citizens.

On May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court of the United States rendered an opinion to the effect that the continuation of segregated schools is unconstitutional, and it invited the attorneys general of the various states affected to present briefs to the Court in the capacity of "amici curiae" suggesting procedures by which segregation of schools could be eliminated most satisfactorily and to guide the Supreme Court of the United States in drawing up its final decree.

The State Board of Education held its first meeting following this decision on May 26. The Board was advised by Attorney-General Rollins that the Supreme Court had issued only an "opinion" not a final decree.

It should be noted that the Attorney-General of Maryland, while not objecting in any sense to the opinion and to the forthcoming decree of the Supreme Court, notified the State and local school authorities of Maryland that in accordance with the laws of the State it would be necessary for them to continue segregation in the schools and teachers colleges of the State until such time as a final decree was transmitted or until such time as the Legislature of the State might repeal its laws requiring segregation.

Particular attention should be called to the fact that the Attorney-General of Maryland accepted the opinion of the Supreme Court as being just and equitable and publicly affirmed his willingness to assist in the desegregation of the schools of the State in accordance with due process of law and the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Especial attention is called also to the fact that the State Superintendent of Schools has accepted the decision of the Supreme Court and has indicated his willingness to implement desegregation to the best of his ability and to the limit of the powers of his office. Further, the State Board of Education, at its meeting on May 26, took the position that the final judicial authority of the land had spoken and that it would do all within its power to implement the decision of the Court's decree when it is finally passed. (For the record, a copy of the statement of the State Board of Education is included in this brief.)

This action of the State Board was followed by a meeting of the school superintendents from the twenty-three counties and Baltimore City with the Attorney-General and other state officials. At that time, Dr. Thomas G. Pullen, Jr., State Superintendent of Schools, announced the appointment of a five-man committee of superintendents to (1) work closely with the State Department of Education and the Attorney-General's Office on the collection and preparation of data to be used in the presentation of Maryland's brief to the Supreme Court in October, and (2) to draw up a broad general statement of principles to be used by local boards of education as guiding principles for implementing the Supreme Court decision "that will be fair and equitable through the state" and impair no individual rights.

In compliance with this assignment, the committee divided itself into two sub-committees: one studied and considered the general guiding principles; the other conducted the survey and compiled data regarding the present status of our segregated schools.

Very early in its work, the committee discovered that one of its functions would be to advise the Attorney-General on the arguments to Questions 4 and 5 which the Supreme Court had propounded for reargument in the October 1954 session. These questions are: (4) "Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,

(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"

In search for the answer to this question, the committee was governed by the returns on its questionnaire circulated to the superintendents of the twenty-three counties of the State, and to the Superintendent of Schools of Baltimore City. In a majority of the counties the returns indicated that the most acceptable method for ending public school segregation would be by a gradual transition period. In support of this position, the committee offers the following statements:

(a) Since 1870, Maryland has operated a segregated system of public education. The adherence to the Plissy v. Ferguson doctrine of "separate but equal facilities" since 1896 has created in many counties a duplication of facilities, personnel and administrative practices which, if abruptly discontinued or ignored, could create much unrest and confusion and ultimately result in unnecessary harm to children and youth.

(b) Few, if any, of the county units are prepared for a sudden changeover if integration should be made a mandatory requirement. Workshops in Human Relations on a bi-racial basis need to be instituted at all levels; i.e., pupil, teacher, administrator and parent. The hopeful outcome of such planning and preparation would be to identify any problems and tensions which now exist, and to develop, through cooperative endeavor, techniques and procedures for solving these problems and for relieving the tensions. An orderly transition would be a more certain way of improving inter-racial understanding than to summarily implement the desegregation of the public schools.

(c) The wide variation which exists in the number and percentage of Negro pupils in the different counties of Maryland makes obvious the view that the counties in the State vary in their racial composition as Maine varies from Mississippi. In four or five counties the transition would possibly create few, if any, problems at all as the number of Negro pupils affected totals less than 500. In all other units the total of Negro pupils involved is considerably larger and the percentage in one county exceeds 50% of the total school enrollment. It is apparent that with such differences it is desirable that the counties within the State be permitted a gradual period of transition consistent with local conditions.

(d) The canvass of the counties also indicates that there is considerable variation within a county. One county specifically noted that desegregation would affect four communities within that county. While little or no opposition or tension would be manifest on a county-wide basis, citizens in the affected areas have indicated a preference for a gradual period of change from segregation to integration. This condition can be duplicated in nearly every unit where there is a concentration of Negro population.

For these reasons, the committee urges the Attorney-General of Maryland to argue for a "gradual adjustment" as the counties move from a segregated system "to a system not based on color distinctions". As stated above, the variation among states having segregated schools; the variation existing in Maryland as reflected in Garrett, Allegany and Washington Counties with the region of Southern Maryland and the Eastern Shore Counties; the variation within a given county; compel us to suggest that any time limit recommendation be flexible enough to provide for local adaptation to the final decree of the Court. If it please the Court to issue such a decree, it may be argued by some protagonists that indefiniteness is an invitation to endless court litigation and confusion. In fact, some have already argued that "gradual adjustment" will be nothing short of a dodge — "a law of compliance which permits state officials to do nothing at all whenever they are of a disposition to do nothing". In rebuttal, the committee would call to the attention of the Supreme Bench the expressed intent of public officials of Maryland, who would be charged with the responsibility of carrying out the Court's decree, which appear earlier in this document. The committee would also wish to impress upon the honorable judges the fact that the process of desegregation will be carried out with the same good will and spirit — which have always characterized the application of the law in Maryland. The long and honorable record of Maryland as a member of the Union attests to the integrity of this statement. However, it may be argued that the moment a state or county ceases to operate a system providing enforced separation of every Negro child from every white child solely because of race, it has begun an action aimed to guarantee to every citizen his, or her, rights existing under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, as recently interpreted by the Supreme Court.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Any decree of the Supreme Court as to the procedure to be used in desegregation, we believe, should take into due consideration the good faith, fair-mindedness, and civil integrity of the people who will be affected, as well as, the profound and sweeping changes involved. The court's decision (May 17, 1954) will inevitably affect the entire school system of the State in the areas of administration, expenditures, allocation of pupils and teachers, construction of school facilities, and other related services. It may even necessitate a revision of state laws. We believe that changes of this kind, involving extensive reorganization, and the mores of society, to be successfully and soundly established, must be based on intelligent, considered action in the light of both fortunate and unfortunate eventualities, of both positive and negative reactions. In the judgment of the committee it would seem better to plan and prepare the way thereby creating a readiness which would assure success.

The Supreme Court in abolishing segregation in the public schools of this country created a new right for a minority group. By the same action it abrogated a right of the majority group. It is specious to argue that this right of the majority did not exist legally; it has been countenanced as a right for nearly a century and the Supreme Court on one memorable occasion placed its official sanction upon it. Pragmatically, then, the right of the white people in any given state, under the approval of its state laws, to send their children to segregated schools has existed. More important than any other consideration is the fact that the citizens of the several states practicing segregation in their schools have thought they had this right and their thinking and their attitudes have been conditioned by this fact.

The Supreme Court, in rendering its opinion to the effect that the operation of segregated schools by any state or local community is unconstitutional, strongly emphasized the psychological disturbances in Negro children due to this policy of excluding them from schools for white children. Supposedly, and conversely, the mixing of children, white and colored, will eliminate this emotional disturbance on the part of Negro children. Assuming for the purposes of this discussion that the premise has validity, although the problem is not quite so simple, by the same token it is reasonable to expect that integration will cause emotional disturbances in those white children who have lived in a segregated world with as clear a conscience as that of the English, Dutch, and New England slave traders who brought the Negroes to America for financial gain. Without implying criticism of the Court on this point, it might be said that justice—we are not referring to mercy—has no concern with the purely psychological. Justice is concerned solely with rights and privileges — moral or legal.

But since the psychological disturbances of Negro children have been considered in creating this new right for them, the Court should bear in mind the emotional disturbance it is creating in white children by revoking the pre-existing right. The practical application of this point is that this factor should be taken into consideration in deciding upon the final decree.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The second question (#5) propounded by the Supreme Court and, in turn, directed to this committee for a recommendation is stated as follows:

"5. On the assumption on which question 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and, if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

The reply to these questions is a legal one with many different answers. These questions ask: Who will decide the exact and precise steps to be taken in abolishing segregation? Who will decide when the process is to begin? Who will decide how the process will proceed? These and many other questions must be clarified before the Supreme Bench issues its final decree.

It was the considered judgment of the committee that the Attorney-General of Maryland should be requested to plead for the remanding of all cases involving segregation to courts of the first instance (lower courts) with instructions to them to devise a program for implementing the Court's opinion of May 17. This decision was reached because of our belief that it is not proper for the Supreme Court to involve itself in the administration of the public schools.

In the light of the foregoing, the following statement of principles to guide the State and local school authorities in Maryland would seem appropriate:

1. The primary concern of the Supreme Court is to guarantee that the right of no child to attend the school of his choice be impaired by reason of race.
2. The Supreme Court is not an administrative body on the Federal, State, or local level. Its function is judicial, not administrative.
3. The Court, in setting forth the condition under which its decree is to be implemented, should take into consideration the same psychological disturbances which were one of the bases for its decision.
4. The Supreme Court, in setting forth the conditions of implementation, should recognize the good faith of those who accept its decree and not inhibit them with undue restrictions.
5. The Supreme Court should be mindful of the fact that public education is the responsibility of the several states, and that they are accountable to no Federal agency or court except as they may infringe upon the rights guaranteed citizens by the Constitution.
6. The Supreme Court would be less than fair to those who are entrusted with the task of implementing its decree unless it defined a "non-segregated school". Are the terms "non-segregated" and "integrated" synonymous? Is non-segregation a legal fact only if there is a close relationship between the ratio of races in a school to the racial composition of the community? Would the practices in the states where segregation is already illegal be accepted in Maryland as satisfying the decree of the Supreme Court?

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The following recommendations are made only with the unique problem in Maryland in mind.

Under the laws of Maryland "The State Board of Education shall exercise, through the State Superintendent of Schools and his professional assistants, general control and supervision over the public schools and educational interests of the State; . . .", and "The county board of education shall exercise through its executive officers, the county superintendent, and his professional assistants, control and supervision over the public school system of the county." Other sections of the law state that "Educational matters affecting the State and the general care and supervision of public education shall be entrusted to a State Department of Education, at the head of which shall be a State Board of Education", and "Educational matters affecting a county shall be under the control of a County Board of Education".

It should be apparent from these and other laws that the State Board of Education is entrusted with general oversight and supervision of the public schools of the State, but that the actual operation of schools, including specifically such matters as the assignment of pupils, consolidation of schools, and the appointment and dismissal of teachers, is the responsibility of the local (the several counties and Baltimore City) school systems.

It should be obvious then that the functions of the two divisions of administrative authority are different. Briefly and simply, the functions of the State Department of Education, acting under the State Board of Education, are supervisory; and those of the local school systems are operational. In the implementation of the decree of the Supreme Court, the statement made by the State Board of Education at its meeting on May 26, 1954, clearly defines the respective duties and functions of the two authorities.

The following is an excerpt from the statement of the State Board, and the amplifying and clarifying principles are added:

> "The role of the State Board of Education is not to set the detailed pattern of operation but to take an official position that the decision will be implemented with fairness and justice to all, and with due regard for the professional aspects of the program. Further, its responsibility is to act in a general over-all supervisory nature to insure that standard, equitable, practices are followed throughout the State."

In the opinion of the Committee the State Board of Education would be acting within the scope of its authority and in line with its responsibility if it should agree upon the following set of general principles, including possibly others, regarding the implementation of the decree of the Supreme Court.

It should state clearly and unequivocally to the local school authorities and the public the effect of the decree of the Supreme Court and of its (the State Board's) intention to exercise whatever authority it may have to guarantee that the decree is implemented fairly, honestly, and intelligently:

1. The administration of the public schools in Maryland is the responsibility of the county and city boards of education. Practices locally must be consistent with the laws of the State and the by-laws of the State Board of Education.

2. By law the consolidation of schools is the responsibility of the county and Baltimore City boards of education. The State Board of Education has no initiatory powers with respect to consolidation; it does have the right of review upon appeal.

   Likewise, the county boards of education have the responsibility for assigning children to schools. The only inhibitory condition placed upon the county boards in the assignment of children is that race shall not be a factor in the decision.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

3. In consolidating schools and in assigning children to schools, no county board may deny any child a right enjoyed by others.

4. Coercive measures should not be employed; that is, no child should be compelled to attend a particular school, rather, he should be given a choice. This position is more or less consistent with the pattern now employed in the several school systems of the State with respect to white children attending white schools and colored children attending colored schools.

5. Each county and Baltimore City should study its own situation and decide upon a plan to be put into operation within that system. The policy determined should be uniform throughout the system.

6. Certain cases of individuals who might believe themselves to be discriminated against could be appealed to the State Board of Education; others would have to appeal to the courts.

7. State funds are distributed to the counties and Baltimore City contingent upon the faithful adherence to the school laws; otherwise these funds can be withheld.

8. Due to different conditions, professional and social, the change from segregated schools to non-segregated schools will be more rapid in some local systems than in others; the change should be gradual but as rapid as possible.

While the local school systems are governed in a general way by the supervisory authority of the State Board of Education, they possess a considerable degree of autonomy. This autonomy, in effect, permits them to accept or reject certain actions suggested by the State Board; in certain aspects of operation, however, the coercive authority must be accepted. In the field of simple administrative procedure, the autonomy of the local board is quite clear. As local school systems vary greatly in their problems it would be exceedingly unwise and futile for either the Court, or the State Board of Education, to make detailed suggestions for implementing the program of desegregation within the counties of the State.

If the committee's reasoning is correct the inauguration and implementation of desegregation in the schools of Maryland will constitute an involved and time-consuming process. It was our hope that we might be bold enough to suggest a possibility for the carrying out of the Court's opinion. Would it not be feasible to suggest to the Court that it provide for the principle of "gradual adjustment" and that it leave great discretion to responsible state and county school authorities and the legal department of the several states to devise ways and means for putting the program of desegregation into effect? We believe because of the argument previously presented, that these responsible school authorities should have the first opportunity to devise and inaugurate a plan, reasonable, fair and just, to implement the opinion of the Court. We believe that such action on the part of the Court would reaffirm our great faith in the wisdom and integrity of our State and local county boards of education and their executive officer — the superintendent of schools.

For that reason, the following set of principles for the local school systems, would seem appropriate:

That the County and Baltimore City Boards of Education, solely responsible for the operational phases of the local units of the public school system of the State, plan for desegregation on the basis of morally, legally, and administratively sound principles. In the opinion of the Committee those principles should be a clear delineation to the public of the implications of the decree of the Supreme Court.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

THAT each local school system should develop a program of action based upon a thorough and comprehensive study of the local situation designed with due regard to the rights of every child and after consultation with representatives of both races. It might be remarked, parenthetically, at this point that such studies have already been inaugurated in many of the local units in Maryland.

THAT each local school system should develop a program of action that takes into proper consideration the psychological and other factors, both detrimental to and beneficial of, the orderly process of desegregation. In effect, application of this principle means simply that desegregation may be more rapid in some local school systems than in others. but it does not mean that no step in that direction may be taken by any local system. It does mean, however, that no uniform rigid pattern of desegregation can be followed statewide in Maryland.

THAT each local school system should keep in constant contact with proper authorities, educational and judicial, for review of actions taken as to their professional and legal appropriateness.

THAT the attitude of the local school authorities should not be one of aggressive advocacy but rather one of calm, fair administrative justice.

THAT the local school board should exercise all the leadership of which they are capable in bringing about an orderly implementation of the decree of the Supreme Court.

THAT in their procedure of implementation, the local school authorities making public utterances should be mindful not to make careless statements which will inflame the public. On the other hand, the local school officials should be clear, frank, and meticulous in informing the public of the detailed steps they intend to take in carrying out the program of desegregation.

In summary, the committee advocates a policy of gradual adjustment and remanding of responsibility for implementing the decree to the local school authorities. Legal opinion would seem to indicate that the issues to be treated in moving from segregation to desegregation are not within the conventional experience of the judiciary. The state and local agencies which have been established to cope with such problems should be afforded the first opportunity to work out on a bi-racial basis the procedures for meeting the new principles of law as contained in the Court's decision of May 17.

Our adherence to this position is based on our desire to build at the local level in our respective counties a climate of good will between all parties concerned. This climate is necessary to undergird the program of action which must be organized to carry out the opinion of the Court. We recommend to the several counties the formation of Citizens' Committees appointed by the local board and consisting of representatives of both races, who will consult with the local educational authorities on the steps to be taken in each county, the progress of desegregation, and the setting up of safeguards for the protection of the rights of all children. Following such a democratic procedure the people will feel that they have had a part in this program if the authority and responsibility for implementing the course of action is arrived at through citizens' advisory groups working in cooperation with local boards of education to devise the appropriate administrative policies. It is our further belief that this program will need the sympathetic understanding of all citizens, if the decision and resultant course of action are to be freed of emotional outbursts. Imposition of the specific directions at a level of government detached from the people will only add suspicion and confusion to an issue highly charged with emotionalism. The very nature of our democratic life implies that we approach this problem with an attitude of trust and a determination to develop a satisfactory answer to our immediate problem.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The essence of democracy lies in the local community; its manifestations are in the light of local tradition and thought. Mere edict from above will not change thinking nor the attitudes which influence human behavior; although its power may be accepted. If respect for law and order, elementary justice, and good will toward every man are present, as we desire them to be in Maryland, then the Supreme Court may well decide that establishment of the principle of non-segregation is the primary concern of the nation for the moment, with the belief that each community will move as rapidly as possible to bring its practices in line with proper moral and legal principles. Coercive measures, particularly drastic and sudden ones, never settle issues; they often create new ones. However, proper restrictive measures properly employed could serve as a gentle prod to action in the desired direction.

Finally, it is but a truism to say that the means determine the end. The manner in which desegregation is put into effect in our state and in our nation will determine for many years to come the attitude of the races toward each other. Only through good will is good will engendered.

II.

STATEMENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION REGARDING THE SUPREME COURT DECISION OF MAY 17, 1954

"The Supreme Court of the land has spoken. It is the duty and responsibility of the State Board of Education to do all within its power to work out the problem 'seemingly and in order' and in such manner that the rights and priviliges of no individual are impaired by arbitrary or capricious methods.

Upon the advice of the Attorney General of Maryland, the decision of the Supreme Court and the full implications of the decision will not be made until some time in the fall after the Court has had a conference and further hearings and arguments with the Attorneys General, and possibly other representatives from the various states which will be affected. Until the conditions of the decision are made known finally, with the mandate and decree of the Supreme Court, any detailed plan of action for implementation would be premature. This statement does not imply, however, that the State Board of Education and the local school authorities, upon whom the major burden of solving the problem will fall, should delay in analyzing the situation and making plans for implementing the decision of the Court.

The laws of Maryland specifically provide for segregation in the public schools and in the teachers colleges. In view of this law requiring segregation, no program of integration can be put into effect until the decision of the Supreme Court becomes final and an effective date is set by the Supreme Court.

The detailed problems in respect to implementing the decision of the Supreme Court will rest primarly upon the local boards of education. The problems involved in any program of integration will vary among the different school systems of the State, but we are confident that they will be solved in a fair, decent, and legal manner and with good common sense. Furthermore we are confident that the local school boards, the local school officials, and the parents will settle this problem without restorting to chicanery or devious methods and with due regard for the rights of all parties concerned. Any program of implementation will be based upon professional and human considerations and not with coercive designs or methods. The public school system of Maryland has always been known for its high professional attitude and for its unbiased and unprejudiced treatment of all children.

The role of the State Board of Education is not to set the detailed pattern of operation but to take an official position that the decision will be implemented with fairness and justice to all, and with due regard for the professional aspects of the program. Further, its responsibility is to act in a general over-all supervisory nature to insure that standard, equitable practices are followed throughout the state."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

May 26th, 1954.

III.

A SURVEY OF NEGRO EDUCATION IN MARYLAND

Since the early days of the State's history, Maryland has had a relatively large Negro population. In 1790, the year of the first Federal census, Maryland's total population was 319,728, of which 65.3 per cent were white and 37.7 per cent were Negro. The maximum proportion of Negroes to white was reached in 1810, with 38.2 per cent, with a gradual decrease, decade by decade, until in 1950 the Negro population comprised but 16.5 per cent of the total.

The following table gives the racial population since 1890.

Population of Maryland by Races*

Year	Total Population	White	Per Cent	Negro	Per Cent
1890	1,042,390	826,493	79.3	215,657	20.7
1910	1,295,346	1,062,639	82.0	232,250	17.9
1930	1,631,526	1,354,226	83.0	276,379	16.9
1950	2,329,263	2,343,009	83.5	385,972	16.5

* U. S. Census Bureau Reports.

A. Public School Education for Negroes

In any study of the status of Negro education in Maryland, two or three basic factors and conditions should be mentioned. The first of these has to do with the varied population patterns among the counties and the metropolitan areas of the State. The northern and western counties have very sparse Negro populations; in fact, there are no Negroes of school age in Garrett, the mountainous, western-most county of the State. The concentration of population increases from less than two percent in Western Maryland to approximately 25 per cent in the Southern Maryland and Eastern Shore counties and in Baltimore City.

The second factor has to do with the State's geographic location and socio-economic life. Maryland's varied topographic features, socio-economic patterns, and racial groups are some of the reasons why the State is frequently referred to as a "miniature America." Although it is a border state, many of its customs and traditions have linked it with the South. In fact, life in some areas of Southern Maryland and the Eastern Shore is similar in many respects with life in areas traditionally characterized as "the deep South." The highly industrialized Baltimore City area has attracted large numbers of people, both white and Negro, many in the unskilled labor category, chiefly from the South. Similarly, because of employment opportunities in government and related service fields, a tremendous concentration and expansion of population of both races is characteristic of the Washington suburban areas.

The third factor concerns the impact of the above noted population trends and patterns upon the school enrollments in the counties and in Baltimore City. These enrollment figures are shown in the table below:

Maryland Public School Enrollment by Color:
1923-1953

A. State Enrollment

Year Ending June 30:	Total Enrollment	White	Per Cent	Colored	Per Cent
1923	256,546	208,023	81.1	48,523	18.9
1933	280,519	228,071	81.3	52,448	18.7
1943	279,842	222,596	79.5	57,256	20.5
1953	399,050	314,916	78.9	84,134	21.1

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

B. Baltimore City Enrollment

Year Ending June 30:	Total	White	Per Cent	Colored	Per Cent
1923	104,072	87,066	83.6	17,006	16.4
1933	113,039	89,251	79.0	23,788	21.
1943	105,212	75,309	71.6	29,903	28.4
1953	131,854	84,498	64.2	47,356	35.8

C. County Enrollment — All Counties

Year Ending June 30:	Total	White	Per Cent	Colored	Per Cent
1923	152,474	120,957	79.4	21,517	20.6
1933	167,480	138,820	82.9	28,660	17.1
1943	174,640	147,287	84.2	27,353	15.8
1953	267,196	230,418	86.1	36,778	13.9

Maryland Public School Enrollment — Colored Pupils: 1923-1953

Year Ending June 30:	Total State			Total Counties			Baltimore City
	Total	Elem.	High	Total	Elem.	High	Total	Elem.	High
1923	48,523	46,745	1,778	31,517	30,070	447	17,006	15,675	1,331
1933	52,448	47,193	5,255	28,660	25,944	2,716	23,788	21,249	2,539
1943	57,256	48,699	8,557	27,353	22,170	5,183	29,903	26,529	3,374
1953	84,134	57,877	26,257	36,778	23,631	13,147	47,356	34,246	13,110

Historically, Negro education in Maryland has followed the social and economic trends of our country's development. During the Revolutionary War period, benevolent attitudes were prevalent, especially on the part of many statesmen and churchmen; education was favored, and many Negroes became tradesmen, artisans, and clerks. Maryland early developed a favorable attitude toward the education of Negroes as evidenced by the establishment in Baltimore in 1797 by the Maryland Abolition Society of "An Academy for Children of Africans."

With the invention of the cotton gin, the extension of the plantation system southward, and the expansion of slavery, the first half of the nineteenth century was a period of strong reaction against education of Negroes, with legal restrictions in the South and segregated schools for Negroes in the northern states.

During the hectic reconstruction period following the Civil War, Negro education gradually became accepted and extended, with special help from church groups, philanthropic foundations and the Freedman's Bureau. By 1900, the Negro had achieved his legal right to education in all states, but with segregation the pattern in the South and border states.

Maryland is particularly fortunate in the legal framework supporting the public school system. The State school system is made up of twenty-three self-governing local county units and Baltimore City, each under the leadership of professionally trained superintendents and supervisors, and each unit developing its own program in compliance with the State School of Law and under the leadership and support of the State Superintendent of Schools and his staff. The entire structure of the system rests upon legislation enacted from session to session to support and implement the 1867 Constitutional provisions for public education.* This section of the Constitution is the foundation for a State minimum program of education for every child in Maryland regardless of race, creed, color, or geographical location of his birth. This program makes provision, among other things, for:

1. A qualified teacher for every child
2. A twelve-year system of education
3. A minimum salary scale for teachers, principals, and supervisors

* Constitution of Maryland — Declaration of Rights and Articles III and VIII. Also Article 77: The Public School Laws of Maryland.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

4. State assistance to local units in establishing a minimum pupil-teacher ratio.
5. Free transportation for all pupils who live beyond a reasonable and safe walking distance
6. Free textbooks and materials of instruction
7. A minimum school year of 180 days
8. Compulsory school attendance
9. Special non-teaching services to pupils
10. Additional financial assistance for atypical pupils
11. An incentive fund to assist local units in financing construction of school buildings
12. A system of teacher tenure and retirement

A brief review of some of the legislation and practices affecting the progress of Negro education will show the tremendous advances made, particularly in the last few decades, in the State's effort to provide adequate educational opportunities for its children and youth.

Separate colored schools were established as a part of the public school system in Maryland as a result of the enactment of Chapter 377 of the Laws of 1872. Every county had colored schools in operation for the school year 1872-1873. In 1918, four counties established high schools for their colored youth. The number increased gradually until by 1934 every county, with the exception of one county with no colored children, was providing and is continuing to provide high school advantages for its colored youth.

A. Supervision

An act of 1910 Maryland Legislature provided supervision of Negro schools in the counties and carried with it a State appropriation for the salary of the supervisor. This law was modified in 1916 to require that a county must have as many as ten Negro schools to receive the State appropriation.

In 1920 a by-law of the State Board of Education, having the force of law, fixed the minimum academic and professional qualifications of supervisors and required the State Superintendent's approval for their appointment.

The 1916 Legislature created the position of State Supervisor of Colored Schools, as a member of the State Superintendent's staff, restricting the appointment to a white person. This restriction, however, and the position were removed by later legislation. In 1947 the first Negro was appointed to the supervisory staff of the Department of Education, and there are now two members on the staff. Special supervisors in the Department have, since their appointment, rendered equitable and regular services to all schools without regard to color.

Legislation enacted in 1945 provided that each county employing 30 or more teachers must employ a colored person as supervisor of colored schools, and also provided part-time supervision in counties employing from 10 to 30 teachers, with no color restriction.

B. Teacher Certification

When certification of teachers became a State function, according to 1916 legislation, the same certification requirements were set for both white and colored teachers. As the certificate requirements were increased from time to time, those for colored teachers usually lagged by a few years but are now identical. As a matter of fact, the certification status of colored teachers has maintained a most favorable position. As early as the school year ending in June 1934, the county colored elementary teaching staffs of 704 members included 689, or 98 per cent, who held first-grade certificates. As certification requirements were extended first to three years' and then to four years' training, the colored teachers have continued to maintain almost 100 per cent full certification status at both elementary and high school levels.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

C. Teacher Salaries

Maryland had no State-wide salary schedule for public school teachers prior to 1904, at which time the Legislature prescribed a minimum of $300 per year for white teachers. In 1918 a salary schedule for colored teachers was set up by the Legislature. This schedule was increased in 1920 and in 1922 legislation provided for increments for satisfactory service, with a maximum of $85 per month for the eight-month school year then required. Although other salary adjustments were made after the 1922 legislation, the most significant advance was made when the Legislature, in 1941, passed the law equalizing salaries of white and colored teachers, effective January 1, 1942. Maryland thus became the first state to equalize salaries. Equality in salary for all teachers with comparable training and experience has since been fully respected by all counties, including the payments of increments not specified by State law. From an examination of the data in Table 2, it will be noted that the average annual salary for colored teachers in the State in 1953 (the latest year available) exceeded that of the white teachers by $61 or $3996 for colored and $3935 for white teachers. This favorable status is accounted for through the generally longer tenure and higher certification ratings of Negro teachers.

D. Length of School Year

The minimum session for colored schools was fixed at 140 days, or seven months, in 1916, but the Legislature raised this to 160 days or eight months in 1922, and to the present 180-day minimum for all schools in 1937. See Table 3 for fuller details regarding length of school year.

E. Transportation and Consolidation

Consolidation of schools has developed at an accelerated pace during the last decade or two as modern highways and buses have aided transportation of pupils. The extent to which consolidation has taken place is shown in Table 4. From less than one per cent in 1923, transportation is now provided for more than half of all colored elementary pupils (57.0%) and for nearly three-fourths (73.5%) of colored high school pupils.

Even more remarkable has been the consolidation of schools from the inadequate, often drab and sub-standard one- or two-room schools to the modern, functional school plants which now are provided generally for all pupils, regardless of color. The figures in Table 5 tell only a part of the story but the reduction from over 400 one-teacher schools to only 26 in three decades is partial evidence of the trend toward adequate facilities for the colored pupil. Further evidence is found in tremendously accelerated post-war building programs for Negro schools. From 1946-1953, inclusive, the total capital outlay for new schools or additions in the State amounted to $31,432,740, with every county and Baltimore City sharing in this cost. Based on the 1952-53 total State enrollment of 84,134 colored pupils, this capital outlay represents an investment of $374 per pupil in new facilities alone. This figure compares favorably with the value of school property per pupil, regardless of color.

F. Enrollment and Persistency Trends

With the expansion of facilities, the extension of transportation, the improvement of teacher qualifications, and the modifications in the school program, there have come marked changes in enrollment and persistency in schools for colored children. Certainly the greatest change has been the expansion of high school enrollment. We note a 73 per cent increase in elementary enrollment since 1923 and a 1380 per cent increase in high school enrollment. Overageness likewise was reduced from more than 65 per cent in 1921 to 11.8 per cent in 1949, the last year such studies were made by the State Department of Education. Persistency to high school graduation, while not keeping pace with enrollment increases, has improved remarkably and is now approximately 50 per cent — that is, one-half of all pupils enrolled in the 9th grade remain until graduation four years later. The number of graduates in the county high schools has increased from 24 in 1923 to 1,086 in 1953 and the State total from 958 in 1933 to 1,912 in 1953 — a 100 per cent improvement in twenty years (See Table 6). Further examination of the data in this table will show the improved situation with regard to the extension upward into high school grades of very large numbers of our colored youth. For example, the ratio of high to elementary enrollment has been reduced from 1 to 27 pupils in 1923 to 1 to 2.2 pupils in 1953.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

G. Miscellaneous Information Supporting Progress in Negro Education

It is generally conceded that the current expense cost per pupil is a fair index of educational opportunity. From this criterion, there is full evidence that the State is fulfilling its obligation of equal educational opportunity for all its children and youth. In 1953 the State per capita cost for elementary pupils was:

Colored pupils — $185.72	For high schools:	Colored	— $239.07
White pupils — $184.61		White	— $247.36

(See Table 7, for further detail)

The effectiveness of a school's program is in part dependent upon the number of pupils assigned to each teacher. State aid is given to counties on the basis of thirty pupils per teacher in the elementary school since this ratio is considered the maximum for optimum effectiveness. The ratio for high schools is somewhat smaller in view of the nature of the offerings. From Table 8, it will be noted that in recent years, especially, there has been little difference in the teacher-pupil ratio among the schools regardless of color. The counties, in particular, have been able to reduce class size nearly to the desired minimum. In 1953, for example, the ratio for colored elementary schools was 32 and for high schools 21.2.

Another evidence of an improved educational program is the extent to which teachers take advantage of the in-service training opportunities offered them. Traditionally, the colored teachers of the State have taken full advantage of all programs designed to improve themselves professionally. Through summer schools, extension courses, workshops, and other such programs, teachers have been given full and equal opportunities. In recent years these programs in the various counties have been conducted for all teachers on an integrated basis. Indeed, one of the most promising advances has been the complete integration of local supervisory and administrative staffs to promote one program for all pupils in a particular unit.

Other evidences of continued progress in the public schools of the State include:

1. The appointment of a Negro member to the State Board of Education
2. The appointment of Negro members to various local Boards of Education
3. Removal of the color restriction concerning membership in the Maryland State Teachers' Association
4. Extension of programs of adult education on an integrated basis in the local units
5. Programs of Parent Education extended to County units
6. The appointment of Negro supervisors of pupil personnel in counties with large Negro pupil populations
7. Extension of vocational programs in home economics, agriculture and trade and industrial education in all high schools where enrollment justified without regard to color
8. Legal provision for colored supervisors in all county units with 30 or more colored teachers even though such restriction based on color is contrary to current interpretations.*

* Chapter 11, Section 142: Public School Laws of Maryland, Vol. 28, April '48, No. 2.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

9. Proper distribution of all funds received from local, State, and Federal sources for educational purposes, without regard to color.

10. Adequate provision for buildings, equipment, and materials of instruction for every child in the State, regardless of color.

11. Uniform provision for related and supporting services to the educational program; e.g. school lunch, health, and library services, to all pupils without regard to color.

B. Higher Education for Negroes in Maryland

There are at the present time four Negro colleges in the State, all of which are under public control and state support. Two of these are State Teachers Colleges, operated under the State Board of Education, acting as their Trustees, one is a branch of the University of Maryland and the fourth is a liberal arts college with its own Board of Trustees. None of the Negro colleges have ever offered work beyond the under-graduate level. In 1950 a Junior College for Negroes was opened in Montgomery County, with some State aid, but operating under the County Board of Education.

Within the past few years, the rigid pattern of racial segregation in higher education has begun to relax. Since 1935, an increasing number of Negro students have been admitted to the School of Law of the University of Maryland, and to such private institutions as the Johns Hopkins University, Loyola College and St. John's College. During the current year 1953-1954, both graduate and under-graduate Negroes are enrolled in several colleges of the University of Maryland.

The State's interest in and support of higher education for Negroes are reflected in its investment for capital outlay and general fund appropriations to the Negro colleges. The figures for recent years are shown below:

STATE SUPPORT FOR MARYLAND NEGRO COLLEGES

Year	Bowie State Teachers College	Coppin State Teachers College	Maryland State College	Morgan State College
A. Capital Outlay Appropriations — 1939-1953*
1939	$ 30,000	—	$ 35,000	$ 122,000
1947	42,000	—	587,000	1,491,000
1949	750,000	—	865,000	1,669,170
1951	800,000	—	865,000	2,111,170
1952	—	—	—	—
1953	260,500	—	—	1,920,000
B. Property Inventory — Buildings, Equipment and Land
1953	$1,720,843.88	$674,213.84	$2,506,689.03	$6,392,225.55
C. General Fund Appropriations
1950-51	$187,531	—	$457,186	$639,041
1951-52	241,456	$70,000	495,807	822,083
1952-53	263,012	86,035	559,461	929,681

* Source: Reports of the Comptroller of the Treasury Construction and Property Inventories and Fiscal Digests of the State of Maryland.

SUMMARY OF SELECTED DATA CONCERNING INSTITUTIONS OF HIGHER LEARNING FOR NEGROES IN MARYLAND*

Institution and Location	Date Founded	Enrollment, June	Number Teachers on Staff	Number Acres in Site	Estimated Value (Present Value)
1. Carver Jr. College	1950	39	**	**	**
2. Maryland State College, Princess Anne	1886	431	47	303	$4,500,000
3. Morgan State College, Baltimore	1867	2314	102	91	9,300,000
4. State Teachers College, Bowie	1867	348	16	187	1,720,844
5. State Teachers College, Coppin — Baltimore	1900	206	14	21	920,216

* Source — Replies received from Questionnaire to the College Presidents, Summer 1954.

 Uses staff and facilities of Montgomery County Public Schools.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The foregoing picture, however, gives only a part of the State's support of Negro higher education. To alleviate somewhat the condition of limited opportunities for graduate work or undergraduate work offered at the University of Maryland but not offered at any of the Negro colleges, the General Assembly of Maryland[1] in 1935 authorized the payment of partial scholarships to Negroes attending out-of-state institutions and appropriated $10,000 a year for 1936 and 1937. Additional legislation[2] provided $30,000 yearly for the 1938-39 biennium and subsequent appropriations have been made for each year since that time. Increasing demand has resulted in constantly increasing appropriations and disbursements. The 1954 appropriation was $200,000, with disbursements estimated to be $244,000. The total amount appropriated by the General Assembly for this purpose from 1936 to 1953, inclusive, is $995,000 with $1,269,745 disbursements during the same period — the difference having been made up from supplemental appropriations. The highest number of persons receiving grants was in 1953, with 907 recipients, divided among 76 out-of-state institutions. From the above data, the State appears to have been most generous in its provisions for higher education for Negroes.

---

[1] Acts of 1935, Ch. 92.
[2] Acts of 1937, Ch. 506, . . . (Article 49B).

III. Table 1.

Enrollment in Maryland Public Schools: By Color, September 1953

County	All Pupils	White	Per Cent	Colored	Per Cent
Total State	409,570	325,910	79.6	83,660	20.4
Baltimore City	125,266	79,127	63.2	46,139	36.8
Total Counties	284,304	246,783	86.8	37,521	13.2
Allegany	15,837	15,553	98.2	284	1.8
Anne Arundel	24,396	19,663	80.2	4,733	19.8
Baltimore	52,341	48,520	92.7	3,821	7.3
Calvert	3,172	1,594	50.3	1,578	49.7
Caroline	3,869	2,976	76.9	893	23.1
Carroll	8,763	8,311	94.8	452	5.2
Cecil	7,164	6,695	93.5	469	6.5
Charles	5,759	3,197	55.5	2,562	44.5
Dorchester	5,249	3,607	68.7	1,642	31.3
Frederick	11,533	10,458	90.7	1,075	9.3
Garrett	4,518	4,518	100.	—	—
Harford	11,924	10,658	89.4	1,266	10.6
Howard	5,037	4,053	80.5	984	19.5
Kent	2,835	2,013	71.1	822	28.9
Montgomery	37,362	34,860	93.3	2,502	6.7
Prince George's	42,223	36,468	86.4	5,755	13.6
Queen Anne	3,086	2,238	72.5	848	27.5
St. Mary's	3,886	2,734	70.3	1,152	29.7
Somerset	3,945	2,337	59.2	1,608	40.8
Talbot	3,767	2,582	68.5	1,185	31.5
Washington	15,531	15,205	97.9	326	2.1
Wicomico	7,491	5,607	74.9	1,884	25.1
Worcester	4,616	2,936	63.6	1,680	36.4

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

III. Table 1-A.

Summary Distribution

Percentage Distribution Colored Enrollment	No. of Counties	Baltimore City
0- 9.9%	8	----
10.0-19.9	4	----
20.0-29.9	5	----
30.0-39.9	3	1
40.0-49.9	3	----
Total	23	1

III. Table 2.

Maryland Public Schools

Average Salary Per Teacher:

By Color 1923-1953*

Year Ending June 30	Elementary Schools		High Schools
	White	Colored	White	Colored
1923	$1,228	$ 899	$1,690	$1,455
1933	1,401	1,056	1,710	1,197
1943	1,724	1,634	1,968	1,905
1953	3,856	4,017	4,031	3,963

* For purposes of brevity, the data in these tables have been condensed to cover a 30-year period by decades only. All data in this report are from the Annual Reports or other sources on file in the Maryland State Department of Education, unless otherwise indicated.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

III. Table 3.

Maryland Public Schools

Average Days in Session: By Color 1923-1953

Year Ending June 30	Total State				Baltimore City				All Counties
	Elementary		High		Elementary		High		Elementary		High
	White	Col.	White	Col.	White	Col.	White	Col.	White	Col.	White	Col.
1923	187.3	172.4	186	181.1	188.9	189.1	184	184	186.4	162.5	187	171.5
1933	188	178.4	186.9	181.3	190	190	188	189.5	187.7	167.8	186.4	173
1943	184	185	186	185	188	188	188	188	183	184	183	181
1953	182.4	183.1	182.8	183	184	184	184	184	181.8	182	182.5	182.1

III. Table 4.

Number and Per Cent of Pupils Transported at Public Expense — Maryland Counties: By Color 1923-1953

Year Ending June 30	Elementary				High
	White		Colored		White		Colored
	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%
1923	3,485	3.	133	1.	843	6.	—	—
1933	28,750	26.5	847	3.	10,209	33.7	502	19.
1943	45,733	42.	6,591	29.	18,804	49.	3,583	69.
1953	68,070	48.1	13,240	57.	54,060	63.7	9,649	73.5

III. Table 5.

Reduction in Number of One-Teacher Schools in Maryland Counties 1923-1953

Year Ending June 30	Total Number Elementary Schools		Number of One-Teacher Schools
	White	Colored	White	Colored
1923	1,619	521	1,093	403
1933	901	489	406	334
1943	565	298	143	132
1953	498	182	33	26

III. Table 6.

Maryland Public Schools

High School Graduates: By Color 1923-53

Year Ending June 30	All Counties		Baltimore City
	White	Colored	White	Colored
1923	1,953	24	(Not available)
1933	4,921	297	2,381	661
1943	6,731	664	2,501	453
1953	8,609	1,086	2,835	826

COPY BOUND VERTICALLY

III. Table 7.

Maryland Public Schools

Current Expense Cost Per Pupil: By Color 1923-53

Year Ending June 30	State Average
	Elementary		High
	White	Colored	White	Colored
1923	$ 49.69	$ 30.68	$102.25	$ 94.35
1933	52.91	36.84	86.10	61.16
1943	65.23	57.72	113.43	103.15
1953	184.61	185.72	264.11	239.85

III. Table 8.

Maryland Public Schools

Average Number of Pupils Per Teacher: By Color 1923-53

Year Ending June 30	Elementary				High
	All Counties		Baltimore City		All Counties		Baltimore City
	White	Colored	White	Colored	White	Colored	White	Colored
1923	31.7	38.3	—	—	20.	15.2	—	—
1933	36.2	34.9	34.5	38.3	24.6	26.7	26.5	29.7
1943	36.8	36.3	32.	34.7	23.	25.4	21.	20.9
1953	31.4	32.	32.3	33.5	21.6	21.2	20.9	26.3

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

IV.

Table (a)

Maryland Population by Counties and Races

1950

County	Total	White	Negro	% White	% Negro
Allegany	89,540	88,308	1,232	98.63	1.37
Anne Arundel	117,239	94,800	22,439	80.87	19.13
Baltimore County	270,124	252,247	17,877	93.39	6.61
Calvert	12,096	6,972	5,124	57.64	42.36
Caroline	18,234	14,782	3,452	81.07	18.93
Carroll	44,891	42,850	2,041	95.46	4.54
Cecil	33,348	30,742	2,606	92.19	7.81
Charles	23,406	15,190	8,216	64.90	35.10
Dorchester	27,802	20,112	7,690	72.35	27.65
Frederick	62,271	57,979	4,292	93.11	6.89
Garrett	21,258	21,249	9	99.996	.004
Harford	51,741	46,293	5,448	89.48	10.52
Howard	23,105	19,247	3,858	83.31	16.69
Kent	13,671	10,110	3,561	73.96	26.04
Montgomery	164,134	153,804	10,330	93.71	6.29
Prince George's	193,899	171,247	22,652	88.32	11.68
Queen Anne	14,576	10,708	3,868	73.47	26.53
St. Mary's	29,073	23,129	5,944	79.56	20.44
Somerset	20,742	13,416	7,326	64.69	35.31
Talbot	19,418	14,154	5,264	72.90	27.10
Washington	78,869	76,691	2,178	97.24	2.76
Wicomico	39,624	31,252	8,372	78.88	21.12
Worcester	23,142	16,048	7,094	69.35	30.65
Baltimore City	948,754	723,655	225,099	76.28	23.72

Table (b)

Number and Percentage

White and Negro School Population in Counties of Maryland — June 30, 1954

County	Total School Population	White	Negro	% White	% Negro
Allegany	15,480	15,207	280	98.24	1.76
Anne Arundel	24,231	19,449	4,782	80.26	19.74
Baltimore	51,888	48,272	3,616	93.03	6.97
Calvert	3,075	1,530	1,545	49.76	50.24
Caroline	3,805	2,949	856	77.50	22.50
Carroll	8,635	8,198	437	94.94	5.06
Cecil	7,029	6,567	462	93.43	6.57
Charles	5,660	3,121	2,539	55.14	44.86
Dorchester	5,153	3,522	1,631	68.35	31.65
Frederick	11,497	10,427	1,070	90.69	9.31
Garrett	4,434	4,434	0	100.00	0.00
Harford	13,234	11,930	1,304	90.15	9.85
Howard	4,960	4,007	953	80.79	19.21
Kent	2,773	1,965	808	70.86	29.14
Montgomery	42,561*	39,838	2,723	93.60	6.40
Prince George's	41,650	35,966	5,684	86.32	13.68
Queen Anne	3,246	2,351	895	72.43	27.57
St. Mary's	3,852	2,660	1,192	68.76	31.24
Somerset	3,883	2,309	1,574	59.46	40.54
Talbot	3,714	2,534	1,180	68.23	31.77
Washington	15,746	15,439	307	98.05	1.95
Wicomico	7,347	5,524	1,823	75.19	24.81
Worcester	4,474	2,859	1,615	63.91	36.09

* Plus 444 White Students in Jr. College.
60 Negro Students in Jr. College.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

TABLE (c)

WHITE AND NEGRO SCHOOL POPULATION IN THE COUNTIES OF MARYLAND — JUNE 30, 1954

(Elementary — Secondary)

County	Population	White E	White S	Negro E	Negro S
Allegany	15,487	8,370	6,837	163	117
Anne Arundel	24,231	12,998	6,451	3,094	1,688
Baltimore	51,888	31,283	16,932	2,262	1,354
Calvert	3,075	947	583	1,103	442
Caroline	3,805	1,771	1,178	536	320
Carroll	8,635	4,973	3,225	256	181
Cecil	7,029	4,303	2,264	280	182
Charles	5,660	1,942	1,179	1,671	868
Dorchester	5,153	2,122	1,400	1,016	615
Frederick	11,497	6,242	4,185	697	373
Garrett	4,434	2,715	1,719	0	0
Harford	13,234	8,100	3,830	766	538
Howard	4,960	2,485	1,522	587	366
Kent	2,773	1,197	768	505	303
Montgomery	42,561*	23,715	11,362	1,635	870
Prince George's	41,650	23,693	12,273	3,660	2,024
Queen Anne	3,246	1,378	973	523	372
St. Mary's	3,852	1,755	905	791	401
Somerset	3,883	1,435	874	964	583
Talbot	3,714	1,496	1,038	750	430
Washington	15,746	8,889	5,986	172	135
Wicomico	7,347	3,901	1,623	1,237	586
Worcester	4,474	1,716	1,143	1,066	549

* Plus 444 white students in junior college and 60 colored students in junior college.

Table (d)

County	Total Teaching Personnel	White	Negro	% White	% Negro
Allegany	606	595	11	98.2	1.8
Anne Arundel	882	719.8	162.2	81.6	18.4
Baltimore	1,877	1,725	152	91.9	8.1
Calvert	121	62	59	51.2	48.8
Caroline	163	126	37	77.3	22.7
Carroll	346	328	18	94.8	5.2
Cecil	292	275	17	94.2	5.8
Charles	231	132	99	57.1	42.9
Dorchester	203	147	56	72.5	27.5
Frederick	394.6	359.1	35.5	91.0	9.0
Garrett	175	175	0	100	0
Harford	405	360	45	88.9	11.1
Howard	217	177	40	81.6	18.4
Kent	119.5	85	34.5	71.1	28.9
Montgomery	1,700.5	1,571	129.5	92.4	7.6
Prince George's	1,530	1,312	218	85.8	14.2
Queen Anne's	137	101	36	73.7	26.3
St. Mary's	144	101	43	70.1	29.9
Somerset	162	101	61	62.3	37.7
Talbot	152.5	105	47.5	68.8	31.2
Washington	611	596	15	97.5	2.5
Wicomico	252	185	67	73.4	26.6
Worcester	182	121	61	66.5	33.5

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Table (e)

County	Total School Buildings	White Elementary	White Secondary	Negro Elementary	Negro Secondary
Allegany	34	25	7	1	1
Anne Arundel	63	34	8	20	1
Baltimore	77	49	13	12	3
Calvert	17	6	2	8	1
Caroline	13	4	5	3	1
Carroll	19	8	9	1	1
Cecil	30	19	8	2	1
Charles	24	6	5	11	2
Dorchester	33	17	6	9	1
Frederick	37	22	7	7	1
Garrett	31	29	2	0	0
Harford	25	17	4	2	2
Howard	16	6	5	4	1
Kent	18	8	3	6	1
Montgomery	85*	62	13	8	2
Prince George's	95	58	13	19	5
Queen Anne's	15	9	3	2	1
St. Mary's	20	9	2	7	2
Somerset	22	7	5	8	2
Talbot	21	9	2	9	1
Washington	50	38	10	1	1
Wicomico	26	15	1	9	1
Worcester	20	6	6	7	1

* Plus two junior high schools (1 white, 1 negro).

TABLE (f)

DATA ON SCHOOL BUS VEHICLES AVAILABLE FOR TRANSPORTATION OF WHITE AND NEGRO PUPILS

County	Buses For White		Buses For Negro		Total No. Buses	No. Negro Drivers % White Buses
	No.	%	No.	%
Allegany	98	99.0	1	1.00	99	0
Anne Arundel	84	75.0	28	25.0	112	0
Baltimore	213	91.4	20	8.6	232	2
Calvert	22	59.5	15	40.5	37	0
Caroline	32	74.4	11	25.6	43	0
Carroll	60	90.9	6	9.1	66	1
Cecil	47	83.9	9	16.1	56	1
Charles	37	47.8	27	42.2	64	0
Dorchester	40	70.2	17	29.8	57	0
Frederick	90	89.1	11	10.9	101	0
Garrett	90	100	0	0	90	0
Harford	89	84.8	16	15.2	105	5
Howard	36	80.0	9	20.0	45	3
Kent	23	65.7	12	34.3	35	0
Montgomery	101	77.1	30	22.9	131	0
Prince George's	111	75.5	36	24.5	147	0
Queen Anne's	27	73.0	10	27.0	37	0
St. Mary's	28	65.1	15	34.9	43	0
Somerset	30	63.8	17	36.2	47	0
Talbot	24	70.6	10	29.4	34	0
Washington	88	97.8	2	2.2	90	0
Wicomico	45	73.8	16	26.2	61	0
Worcester	37	62.7	22	37.3	59	0

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Table (g)

School Personnel

(Superintendent and Staff)

County	White	Negro	Total	No. of Negro Supervisors	No. of Negro V.T.'s
Allegany	17	0	17	—	—
Anne Arundel	28	2	30	1	1
Baltimore	61	3	64	2	1
Calvert	3	1	4	1	—
Caroline	4	1	5	1	—
Carroll	9	1	10	1	—
Cecil	7	0	7	—	—
Charles	5	3	8	2	1
Dorchester	4	1	5	1	—
Frederick	8	1	9	1	—
Garrett	6	0	6	—	—
Harford	13	0	13	—	—
Howard	5	1	6	1	—
Kent	4	1	5	1	—
Montgomery	72	1	73	1	—
Prince George's	36	3	39	2	1
Queen Anne's	4	1	5	1	—
St. Mary's	5	1	6	1	—
Somerset	4	1	5	1	—
Talbot	4	½	4.5	½	—
Washington	19	0	19	0	—
Wicomico	7	1	8	1	—
Worcester	5	1	6	1	—

V(a)

DATA RELATING TO DESEGREGATION OF THE SCHOOLS IN THE CITY OF BALTIMORE

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION
Administration Building
Three East Twenty-Fifth Street
Baltimore 18, Maryland

Office of
The Superintendent

July 2, 1954

Mr. W. Giles Parker
Deputy Attorney General
Mathieson Building
Baltimore, Maryland

Dear Mr. Parker:

I am sending you herewith copies of several documents which have been developed in the Baltimore Public Schools to deal with the elimination of racial segregation. These include: the opinion of the City Solicitor of Baltimore, the initial statement of policy by the Board of School Commissioners, the administrative directive approved by the Board following its adoption of the policy statement, the address of the Superintendent to the teaching force, and an administrative circular concerning the handling of applications for pupil transfers.

You will note that there is no plan to reorganize the Baltimore School System. It is, rather, our basic assumption that we shall continue to operate very largely as we have in the past except that the race of a pupil will have no bearing upon any decision made affecting him. We shall take no action deliberately to integrate any school because we believe that it would be as wrong to use pupils as the means of bringing about integrated schools as it would be to use them to create segregated units.

FOLD OUT TO LARGE TO BE FILMED

At the staff level we shall make no reassignments for racial purposes. As vacancies are filled, selections will be made in each case from the five persons standing highest on the appropriate eligible list. In determining which of the five persons is to be assigned to a given vacancy the specific requirements of the situation and the total qualifications of the candidate will be taken into account.

We have in Baltimore several major assets which should contribute to a smooth transition. For many years our Board has dealt equally with white and Negro schools regarding construction, maintenance, supplies, teacher qualifications, and all of the other elements affecting quality of education. Negro and white staff members have worked together in committees, workshops, and other staff activities. Pupils of both races have visited each others schools and have participated in an increasing number of joint activities.

Baltimore has never followed a rigid districting practice. Of our 175 units, only approximately 35 are districted. Each one of these is a crowded school, about which a boundary has been fixed to prevent its further over-crowding. In such cases pupils living within the boundaries have the right to attend a districted school but are not required to do so. Those who live outside the boundary are not allowed to enter the districted school. In general, any pupil is free to attend any school in the city for which he is qualified. None of our senior high schools and only one junior high school is currently districted.

I trust that I have given you the sort of information you desire but if you have any further questions I shall do my best to answer them for you.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN H. FISCHER,
Superintendent.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

V(b)

CITY SOLICITOR'S OFFICE

June 1, 1954

Board of School Commissioners
3 East 25th Street
Baltimore 18, Maryland
Attention: Mr. Walter Sondheim, Jr.

Gentlemen:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 25, 1954, making inquiry relative to the legal effect upon the duties and obligations of the Board of School Commissioners, of the recent Supreme Court decision regarding segregation of children in public schools on the basis of race.

As you know, Article 32, section 22, of the Baltimore City Code specifically sets forth the Board's duties on this regard, as follows:

> "It is hereby made the duty of the Board of School Commissioners of the City of Baltimore to organize separate schools for colored children, and to establish as many schools for the education of the colored children of Baltimore City as may in the judgment of said board be necessary."

It is the opinion of this Office that the Supreme Court, by its decision, has determined that segregation in education, as provided for by Article 32, section 22, of the Baltimore City Code, is in deprivation of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, and is, consequently, unconstitutional and invalid.

Very truly yours,

THOMAS N. BIDDISON,
City Solicitor.

V(c)

RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF SCHOOL COMMISSIONERS OF BALTIMORE CITY

Adopted at Board Meeting — June 3, 1954

In view of the decision of the Supreme Court regarding segregation in our public schools, and in view of an opinion given us by the Baltimore City Solicitor dated June 1, 1954, it is the opinion of this Board that our system should be conformed to a non-segregated basis to be in effect by the opening of schools in September of this year.

In doing so, we would ask our staff to prepare material outlining the practical steps to be taken and that this material be presented at our next meeting.

V(d)

BALTIMORE-18, MARYLAND

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Office of
The Superintendent of Public Instruction

June 10, 1954

To the Board of School Commissioners:

Ladies and Gentlemen:

In view of the policy on the elimination of racial segregation in the Baltimore Public Schools enunciated by the School Board on June 3rd, the Board of Superintendents presents the following recommendations to implement that policy:

1. All of the standards and criteria which are now in force with respect to the admission of pupils to schools, grades, or curricula shall continue in force except that the race of the pupil shall not be a consideration.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The present policy of the school system with respect to pupil transfers shall be continued. Under this policy, transfers because of changes of residence are routinely approved. Transfers for other reasons may be approved by the two principals involved or by the appropriate Assistant Superintendent.

2. As in the past, no child shall be required to attend any particular school. Baltimore has never adopted a districting policy which requires such attendance. There is to be no change in the present rule of the School Board for establishing school districts. This rule says, in effect, that where a building is overcrowded, specific district lines may be established as required by building capacity and neighborhood population. No pupil who lives beyond such a line may then enter the districted school. All pupils enrolled in any school prior to the establishment of a district line about that school are permitted to remain there.

   On the other hand, any pupil who lives within such a district and whose parents desire him to attend a more distant school may be admitted to that school if it is not districted and if the reason for seeking a transfer is considered satisfactory. As population increases occur, it may become necessary in the future, as it has in the past, to district additional schools.

3. In the assignment, promotion, and transfer of staff members, the present policy of respecting relative merit shall be scrupulously observed. As in the past, it shall be the purpose of the Department of Education to assign each employee to that position in which he is likely to render his best service to the school and to the community. No person shall be denied any opportunity because of his race.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN H. FISCHER,

Superintendent.

V(e)

ADDRESS TO THE TEACHERS OF THE BALTIMORE PUBLIC SCHOOLS BY DR. JOHN H. FISCHER, SUPERINTENDENT

June 14-15, 1954

My fellow teachers:

Only the most urgent reason could justify calling you to an extra meeting in this busy final week of the school year. I think you will agree that what brings us here today is of the greatest importance. What I want to discuss with you is the recent action of our Board of School Commissioners eliminating racial segregation in the Baltimore Public Schools at the beginning of the next school year.

It would be better for us to talk about this in a conversational fashion, but the size of our staff denies us that pleasure here. I have no alternative, therefore, but to lay before you some of the major implications of this action for us as teachers, and to invite you to discuss the subject freely among yourselves in your respective schools, or with any of us on the central staff.

Without fear and without subterfuge our Board has met its responsibility. Paraphrasing the words of Robert E. Lee, we cannot now do more than our duty, we shall not want to do less.

The cases in which the Supreme Court handed down its historic decision of May 17 were before the Court for about two years. There was much speculation, as you well know, upon the probable decision and yet it appears extremely doubtful that any student of American history or culture could have been truly surprised when the decision was finally read.

What happened in Washington on the 17th of May 1954 was not unusual for America. The whole course of our history as a nation is marked by such actions, actions which one by one have destroyed barriers that stood between the ordinary man and a richer life. Those of you who know the history of democracy will recall how the prophets of doom warned against every one of these forward steps. In advance of each one, our ancestors were assured by the viewers-with-alarm that it would undoubtedly lead to the most awful consequences. And each time a strengthened people proved them wrong.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It was so when each shipload of optimists set sail for the New World.

It was so when we determined to separate our colonies from the British crown.

It was so when property qualifications upon voting were removed.

It was so when manhood sufferage was adapted, when child labor was outlawed, when compulsory school attendance was instituted, when slavery was abolished.

And always there have been the satisfied sustainers of the status quo.

In this present instance they are represented by those of both races who say, "But why should we not continue to provide equal separate education? After all, have we not done quite well under that doctrine?"

Listen, if you will, to the words of Court; a court frequently divided in its decisions, but in this one, unanimously decisive.

> "In approaching this problem, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868 when the amendment was adopted, or even to 1896 when Plessy v. Ferguson was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the nation.
>
> "Today education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments. Compulsory school attendance laws and the great expenditures for education both demonstrate our recognition of the importance of education in our democratic society. It is required in the performance of our most basic public responsibilities, even service in the armed forces. It is the very foundation of good citizenship. Today it is a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment. In these days, it is doubtful that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of an education. Such an opportunity, where the state has undertaken to provide it, is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms

* * *

"Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racially integrated school system.

"Whatever may have been the extent of psychological knowledge at the time of Plessy v. Ferguson, this finding is amply supported by modern authority. Any language in Plessy v. Ferguson contrary to this finding is rejected.

"We conclude that in the field of public education the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal."

In an editorial published the day after the decision, the New York Times pointed out that the Constitution and the Bill of Rights can be hard masters. What the Times might have added is that these are masters of our own creation. From our earliest days as a nation we have set down from time to time in historic documents the high principles by which we mean to govern ourselves. Often these statements have run ahead of our usual behaviour but they remain our deliberately established goals and our own freely chosen standards.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It is when we become aware that our daily conduct is inconsistent with these statements of purpose that we begin to rise above our past. It is on these occasions that the American dream comes more nearly true for more Americans.

In one of these pivotal chapters of American history we are now privileged to become active participants. To a greater degree than most historic events the abolition of segregation in public schools will affect the daily lives of individuals. Because it has to do with long-established patterns of association, it will raise questions with emotional overtones. To ignore these aspects of the problem would be unwise and irresponsible.

Being teachers and, therefore, students of human behaviour we need to understand these things, and being human, we must view our own attitudes with as much objectivity as we can muster. As instructors of children and leaders of community thought, we must be sensitive to the anxieties which exist, and we should prepare ourselves to be of the greatest possible assistance in clarifying misunderstandings and providing reassurance.

Let me review some of the questions that are being asked, and let me give you such information as I can bearing upon them.

1. Will the school system be reorganized to integrate all schools?

The answer to that question is "No". There will be no such reorganization. All of our present policies for admitting or transferring pupils will remain in full effect, except that no child shall be denied entry to any school or class because of his race. The designation of white and Negro schools will, of course, be discontinued, because every school will now receive children of both races. But no effort will be made deliberately to transfer children of either race for the purpose of "mixing" schools. We have had the last of placing children anywhere for racial reasons. Hereafter every child will be dealt with strictly on the basis of his educational requirements and in terms of his best development.

The Division of Colored Schools will cease to exist, but no one now associated with that Division will suffer any loss of status because of this administrative change.

2. Will there be a large number of pupil transfers in September?

There should not be. Because of the long-standing policy of our Board and our City Government, Negro and white schools in Baltimore are operated according to equal standards. In the construction of buildings and their maintenance, in the professional examination of teachers, in the allocation of funds for books and supplies there have been no racial distinctions.

It is no secret that we have many crowded schools, or that most Baltimore children attend school in buildings that are about as old as the homes in which they live. But this statement applies to children of both races. Where a nearby school offers advantages to any pupil, white or Negro, over the school he now attends, and the parent requests a transfer, the request should be granted. But only in rare instances should a young child be sent far from his home to another school.

At the secondary or vocational level, distance is less important, but in such cases a pupil in the middle of a three year program should be transferred only where it is clearly advisable for him to do so.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

3. Will teachers or other staff members be discharged as a result of the new policy?

Again, the answer is "No." As in the past, vacancies which occur in the future will be filled with a scrupulous regard for relative merit. There will be one eligible list for each type of position. Whenever a vacancy occurs, one of the applicants of the five standing highest on the list will be selected for employment. As in the past specific requirements of the position and the total qualifications of each available candidate will determine who is assigned. Whether we are dealing with teaching positions filled by transfer or initial placement, or promotional positions filled by selection by the Board of Superintendents, no one will be discriminated against because of his race. Nor will his race entitle anyone to preferment over another who is better qualified.

4. Will children be required to attend particular schools?

No, and again I refer to our present policy. Baltimore does not insist that any child attend the school in whose district he lives. Of our 175 school units only about 25 or 30 which are badly crowded are districted. In these cases, children living within a prescribed area have the right to attend the districted school and others are excluded. But if a child living in any district wishes to attend elsewhere, he may do so if the school of his choice is not itself districted and if there is a good reason for transferring.

No secondary school except Garrison Junior High School is now districted and every other one is accordingly available to any qualified student.

As population changes occur additional schools may have to be districted, and if this happens, the regular policy will apply. No child will be deliberately assigned to any school because of his race.

5. The question perhaps most frequently asked is, "Will it work?"

The only guide we can have for the future is our experience of the past.

At the staff level we have been working for many years in groups assembled without regard to race. In workshops, in committees, in staff conferences of all kinds we have helped and complemented each other. In the Public School Teachers Association, the Teachers Union, the Principals Association, integration has been the pattern for many years. In our staff we know it has worked.

In many of our schools Negro and white pupils have visited each other to exchange assembly programs, to engage in debates, to discuss common problems. This has worked.

For several years, the Junior Red Cross has conducted summer workshops in which white and Negro pupils have worked and played side by side with pleasure and profit. This has worked.

Here at Poly Negro boys were admitted to the "A" Course in 1952. The faculty and student body decided at the outset that there would be in this school only one class of boy — the Poly boy. The Negro students, now some 40 of them, participate in every phase of school life. Has it worked? The first boy is scheduled to graduate next June. You might ask him or his white classmates who refer to him as a "good guy".

In our adult education program for a number of years, without headlines or fanfare, Negro and white students have studied in the same classes and within the month, in this very building we have organized an adult center in which the faculty and the student body both include white and Negro members, in about the same proportions as our total school population. And this is working so well that the viewers-with-alarm couldn't have been more wrong.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

But, some say, what about the parents? How will they react? Since 1947 when our Coordinating Council of Parent Teacher Organizations was formed, it has been a unified group. Established on the basis of councilmanic districts, the executive board of the Council has included every year men and women of both races. Has it worked? The record of the Council's accomplishments is proof enough of its success.

Will it work? Review, if you please, every activity of our school system for the past fifteen or more years in which Negro and white children, adult students, or staff members have been associated. You will discover that, without exception, every one has succeeded.

In response to such facts as I have given, some will say that these experiences have occurred on too small a scale to be conclusive. They may not represent the general reaction. Many of us think that, on the contrary, these experiences do in truth represent the general reaction of pupils, teachers and parents. There is abundant evidence that good will and good sense are widely distributed among our people and that those qualities are characteristic of both our races.

To be sure, there are a few white persons who see no good in any Negro and a scattering of Negroes who look with distaste or distrust on every white person. Such people are a small minority among us. Both their number and their influence are happily on the decline. I doubt that there are any in our teaching staff. Certain it is that such people would feel uncomfortable and unwelcome in this group.

Jacques Barzun in his delightful new book, "God's Country and Mine" says, "The first thing that democracy must be is inclusive." We may add that he who would serve as a teacher in a democracy must be broadly inclusive not only in his sympathy but in his appreciation of the good in all manner of men.

When our schools face such a mission as the one we are now assigned, I value more than ever the knowledge that ours is a great army of volunteers. Of our own choice we have enlisted to serve all our people and the cause of education. We are, therefore, entitled to share the quiet pride that only the volunteer may feel.

We are in many ways a fortunate group. We teachers enjoy priceless blessings, despite whatever problems we face. Ours is a happy task for every day we deal with youth and growth and enlightenment. All that we do is founded upon faith and hope and love. The love of truth, the love of learning, the love of children, these are great forces with which to work.

There is no doubt that the world could be transformed if only their power could be fully unleashed. More than most men and women, we are in a position to use that power.

Walter Hines Page was thinking in this vein a half century ago when at a Normal School Commencement in Athens, Georgia, he said:

> "It is a shining day in any educated man's growth when he comes to see and to know and to feel and freely to admit that it is just as important to the world that the child of his neighbor should be trained as it is that his own child should be. Until a man sees this he cannot become a worthy democrat nor get a patriotic conception of education; for no man has known the deep meaning of democracy or felt either its obligation or its lift till he has seen this truth clearly."

There are many reasons why I take pride in my twenty-four years of membership in this staff. And the response which so many of you are making wholeheartedly and voluntarily to the enormous new responsibility now placed upon you has added to this sense of great privilege which I feel. I know that in many faculties plans are being made to receive graciously new pupils and staff members of the race not now represented in your school. By chance on Friday, I saw a copy of a letter addressed by the principal of one of our schools to his faculty. This happens to be a white school, No. 10-10A, and the principal is Mr. James Carroll. But the tone of the message so well reflects the spirit of our entire system that I want to read it to you and with it to conclude my remarks and this meeting—

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"It is probable the addition of Negro teachers and pupils to this school will be an established fact next September.

The adjustment problem may well be a simple one if you prepare yourself and your class for the change. Knowing all of you as I do, I am certain the problem will be simple with us.

For my part, I shall receive every teacher and every pupil on terms of perfect equality.

I shall give the Negro teacher or the Negro child no special favors because of his color, nor shall I withhold any privilege or right from him because he is Negro.

I shall remember that the same God made both of us — that he put my mind inside a white skin — that except for the accident of birth my mind might well have been covered by a colored skin and the mind of my new helper or pupil might have been placed inside the white skin.

My stepson found the Negro boys who fought in Korea beside him to be first-class fighting men who neither asked for nor received special favors. He learned that the colored skin received enemy bullets with the same bravery that the white skin received them.

The tax collector accepts (demands) money from the colored hand as from the white.

Segregation in the schools has ended. Let us make the transition in this school a smooth transition. Let us be proud of ourselves next June."

VI.

THE WEST RIVER PROCLAMATION

Being very deeply concerned with the results of the recent Supreme Court opinion on the conduct of education by the states, we, the parents and teachers of Owensville Elementary and Southern High Schools have assembled and given due consideration to our rights and responsibilities in the operation of public schools. Being citizens of the free and sovereign state of Maryland and being conscious of its great tradition of tolerance for the diverse religious faiths, political creeds, and natural races of mankind, we petition the State government to continue to respect the rights reserved to the people of the Federal and State Constitutions. We believe, as our ancestors proclaimed in 1776, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed with certain inalienable rights, that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers only from the consent of the governed, and that among our rights is a direct voice in the education of our children.

Upon these timeless truths we base our firm resolutions as follows:

1. That any action taken in this state in consequence of the recent opinion of the Supreme Court should be based only upon due process of state law sanctioned by the people through referendum, and not merely upon arbitrary action of temporary office holders or appointed commissions.

2. That in order to assure equal protection of the law to each race and to prevent development of an inferiority complex in any child, no child should be compelled to undertake public education under instructors not of his own race without consent of his parents or guardians.

3. That the administration of free schools should be conducted on the principle of maximum local control with the objective of the greatest satisfaction to all participating students, subordinating neither the majority to the minority nor the minority to the majority.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

4. That to accomplish these objectives it is essential to give local populations a direct voice in the selection of their own Boards of Education and their school trustees, and that these locally designated representatives should retain the authority to establish equitable administrative policies for selection of instructors and for admission to the various schools in their responsibility and to make plans for necessary expansion and assignment of facilities.

We earnestly solicit the adoption of these sincere resolutions, which we henceforth will identify as the "West River Proclamation," by every fair-minded organization interested in public education in the free state of Maryland.

Formally Approved By:

Southern High School P. T. A. on August 11, 1954

Owensville School P. T. A. on August 19, 1954

Subsequently endorsed by other
Anne Arundel County Public School P. T. A.

VII.

PETITION CIRCULATED BY THE "MARYLAND PETITION COMMITTEE"

STATE-WIDE PETITION COLLECTED IN .... COUNTY

We, the undersigned citizens of the State of Maryland, being residents of voting age, do consider the ruling of the U. S. Supreme Court on May 17, 1954, against race segregation in public schools as an invasion and violation of our individual rights under a sovereign state. We believe that the heritage of our race is the one gift received from our ancestors which we may with surety transmit to our children. We believe that this God given heritage should not be taken from us by any human law or decision. We believe that it is the duty of judicial, legislative and executive agencies to protect this heritage, not to move for its destruction. We believe that the abolition of segregation in our schools strikes through our children, at the survival of our race, because it deprives them of protection which they need until they develop adult judgment.

We, therefore, do petition the government of the State of Maryland to make provision for the establishment of a system of private schools for any group or groups which may wish to protect the continued existence of its own race; and make provision that any citizen who subscribes to the support of such a school shall be entitled to and, in fact, shall receive a rebatement of, or a freedom from all taxes collected or to be collected from him, henceforth, for all purposes of public instruction.

Joined together in this common cause, one to another, we are in full belief that our Constitution grants us the right to withdraw our children from the public schools at any time the aforementioned privileges are denied us by the State of Maryland. By affixing our signatures we do witness that we have never, nor do we intend to ever become a member of any organization advocating the overthrow of the government of the United States of America by force or violence.

NAME (SIGNATURE) MAILING ADDRESS

.....

.....

VIII(a)

MORGAN STATE COLLEGE
Baltimore 12, Maryland

June 21, 1954

To the Superintendents of Maryland Schools

The principals, supervisors and presidents of the Negro schools and colleges of the State met in a conference at Morgan State College on June 19 to consider how they might contribute to a smooth and orderly adjustment of our public school system to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The attached statement was adopted by the conference. It is hoped that you will find this statement helpful in the formulation of plans and procedures in your county.

I am also enclosing two of the papers read at the conference. In addition to the value of their content, these papers will convey to you the basic approach of the conference.

Cordially,

Martin D. Jenkins,

President of Morgan State College and Chairman of the Conference.

cc: Boards of Education

VIII(b)

A STATEMENT ADOPTED BY THE CONFERENCE ON PUBLIC SCHOOL INTEGRATION IN MARYLAND

June 19, 1954

The Supreme Court of the United States has rendered the decision that segregation in public education is in violation of our national constitution. The principals, supervisors and presidents of Negro schools in Maryland recognize that no other decision was possible if the enduring and universal principles enunciated in our constitution were followed to the ultimate. And because we believe that this is the beginning of a new era of human relations in this state, citizens of Maryland have had their faith and belief in democracy strengthened. Each in his own way, Negro and white, will now have the opportunity to contribute to the good of society in terms of individual qualifications.

We recognize that the transfer from a dual system to a democratically organized system may give rise to many problems of adjustment. This conference goes on record as pledging Negro educational leaders to unstinted effort to make democracy work at this time. We believe that the leaders represented at this conference will take immediate steps to prepare the general public, teachers, administrators and pupils for integrated schools. We believe, further, that all the other educational leaders of the state will want us to stand shoulder to shoulder with them in a cooperative effort to meet this situation in a democratic way. We ask only an opportunity to serve the common good.

This conference commends the educational leaders of our state for the forthright position taken looking toward implementation of the Court's decision.

We commend the educational leaders of Baltimore City for their immediate implementation of the Supreme Court's decision. We likewise commend the State Superintendent of Schools and the State Board of Education for the unequivocal statement of intent to conform to the mandate of the Supreme Court.

Excerpts from the statement of the State Superintendent and the State Board of Education follow.

> The Supreme Court of the land has spoken. It is the duty and responsibility of the State Board of Education to do all within its power to work out the problem "seemingly and in order" and in such manner that the rights and privileges of no individual are impaired by arbitrary or capricious methods * * *
>
> The detailed problem in respect to implementing the decision of the Supreme Court will rest primarily upon the local boards of education. The problems involved in any program of integration will vary among the different school systems of the State, but we are confident that they will be solved in a fair, decent, and legal manner and with good common sense. Furthermore, we are confident that the local school boards, the local school officials, and the parents will settle this problem

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

without resorting to chicanery or devious methods and with due regard for the rights of all parties concerned. Any program of implementation will be based upon professional and human considerations and not with coercive designs or methods. The public school system of Maryland has always been known for its high professional attitude and for its unbiased and unprejudiced treatment of all children.

The role of the State Board of Education is not to set the detailed pattern of operation but to take an official position that the decision will be implemented with fairness and justice to all, and with due regard for the professional aspects of the program. Further, its responsibility is to act in a general over-all supervisory nature to insure that standard, equitable practices are followed throughout the State.

In view of expressed positions of the highest governing boards in the public schools of the State, this conference enunciates several assumptions which we believe will underlie any and all decisions in any and all educational subdivisions of the state.

1. We assume the Board of Education of each county will adopt and announce a policy with respect to the integration of public schools which will make clear the determination that the schools shall be organized and administered without regard to race of pupils, teachers and administrative officers and non-teaching personnel.

2. We assume and believe that Negro citizens will be called to committee work designed to lay plans for the integration of schools. We believe that Negro leaders should participate in planning from the outset and to assist in formulating calm, logical approaches which may be made at this time.

3. We assume that in each county specific plans will be made for preparing teachers and administrative personnel, both white and Negro, for integrated schools.

We believe there are many negative factors, emotional and attitudinal, which can be eliminated through careful planning and preparation.

4. We assume that there will be specific plans for preparing pupils, both Negro and white, for integrated schools. Children reflect in their personalities the mores of the community in which they live. Planning and preparation will pay large dividends in Americanism.

5. The school children are but one population of many concerned with this problem. We assume that each county will make specific plans to enlist the cooperation of parents, community leaders and community agencies, both Negro and white, in the development of positive attitudes for integrated schools.

VIII(c)

CONFERENCE ON PUBLIC SCHOOL INTEGRATION IN MARYLAND

Morgan State College

June 19, 1954

What Can Be Done to Prepare Teachers and Administrative Officers, both White and Negro, for Integrated Schools? (Outline of a Presentation by a Conference Participant)

The recent decision which was handed down by the Supreme Court of the United States anent segregation in public schools has deep and broad implications for the principal and teacher. Great and far-reaching social changes beget uncertainties, doubts, lack of a sense of security, and many obstructions to the ultimate fruition of those changes. Therefore, in order that we may chart our course with some degree of certainty and in order that we might have a few points for your studied consideration, I herewith list the following:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Challenge 1: The Negro teacher, much more so than the Negro student, needs to become emotionally and psychologically competent in terms of the demands of integration.

A. The school principal should provide staff meetings at which time prerequisites for the successful teacher participation might cooperatively be agreed upon.

B. The principal with the teachers, could with the help of his staff, organize an instrument for the purpose of teacher self-appraisal.

C. The principal should use his influence with the chief executive officer of his school system to have teachers of his school appointed to integrated school committees.

Challenge 2: In order to eliminate possibilities of tensions during this period, what steps should be taken by administrators, supervisors, counselors and teachers?

A. Within the keeping of teachers, both white and Negro, are students who after all represent the end product; it is within their power to set the pace of their students and hold in subjection those who might tend toward being firebrands and trouble makers. This might be done by:

1. Members of the staff, including the principal, discussing with students the implications of the Supreme Court decision in a very frank, objective and unemotional manner.

2. Making every effort to see to it that students representing the school participate in every integrated county-wide and state-wide school program which may be sponsored within their systems. However, the administration should take every precaution to see to it that proper and enlightened supervision is provided.

3. Those who are charged with the guidance and direction of our boys and girls should make every effort to arrange for the kind of programs within their respective schools which will provide the opportunity to invite white boys and girls to come into the Negro school and share in that program.

Challenge 3: There is a dire need for white teachers to develop an understanding of Negro children on social, economic, psychological and achievement levels.

A. Invitations should be extended to outstanding white teachers to participate on the staff meetings of the Negro schools.

B. There should be a constant exchange of news and information between white and colored schools.

C. Surveys and studies which are made relative to the Negro school population should be made available; however, some caution should be observed in this particular instance.

D. Administrative officers should make every effort to encourage civic and church organizations to utilize where possible the vast reservoir of talent which could be used.

IX.

The Trustee Committee on State Scholarships
MORGAN STATE COLLEGE
Baltimore 12, Maryland

July 7, 1954

A STATEMENT OF POLICY GOVERNING THE AWARDS OF STATE SCHOLARSHIPS

In compliance with an opinion of the United States Supreme Court, rendered on May 17, 1954, and in view of the action of the Board of Regents of the University of Maryland, which provides for the admission of all eligible citizens of the State without regard to race, creed or color, and in accordance with the ruling of the Attorney General of Maryland, the above named Committee announces its new policy as follows:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

1. Beginning with the academic year 1954-55 (September, 1954), no grants will be made to new applicants for State Scholarships.

2. Current recipients of State Scholarships, whose status as candidates for degrees is definitely established on or before September 1, 1954, may have their grants renewed until they graduate, provided graduation shall be accomplished within a reasonable time. Scholarships will be terminated in June, 1958.

3. Questionnaires have been mailed to all recipients of Scholarships for the academic year 1953-54, and the Summer of 1954, as a first step in determining their eligibility for renewal privileges. These should be filled out and returned to the Secretary immediately. The next step will be a verification of the facts submitted, either from data in our files or by the University the student is attending.

4. Late in August or early in September, 1954, the Committee will consider all applicants for renewal of scholarship grants in light of the above policies. Renewal application forms will be sent on request. No such applications will be honored after August 1.

THE TRUSTEE COMMITTEE ON STATE SCHOLARSHIPS

Ivan E. McDougle, Chairman

Willard W. Allen

Josiah F. Henry, Jr.

Martin D. Jenkins

Edw. N. Wilson, Secretary

X.

MARYLAND CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES RELATING TO SEGREGATION IN EDUCATION

(a) Constitution of Maryland

Article VIII.

Education

Section 1. The General Assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall, by law, establish throughout the State a thorough and efficient system of free Public Schools; and shall provide by taxation or otherwise, for their maintenance.

Annotated Code of Maryland (1951 Ed.)

Article 77

Public Education

Chapter 12. State Teachers' Colleges

(b) Section 160. The state board of education and the state superintendent of schools shall be the board of trustees of each of the normal schools maintained and supported by the State; the state normal school at Towson, the state normal school at Frostburg and the state normal school at Bowie.

Chapter 18. Schools for Colored Children

(c) Section 207. It shall be the duty of the county board of education to establish one or more public schools in each election district for all colored youths, between six and twenty years of age, to which admission shall be free, and which shall be kept open not less than one hundred and eighty (180) actual school days or nine months in each year; provided, that the colored population of any such district shall, in the judgment of the county board of education, warrant the establishment of such a school or schools.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(d) Section 208. Each colored school shall be under the direction of a district board of school trustees, to be appointed by the county board of education subject to the provisions of Section 13 of this Article, and schools for colored children shall be subject to all the provisions of this Article.

Free Scholarships

State Teachers Colleges

(e) Section 269. There shall be located in the city of Baltimore or elsewhere (if the board of education deem best) a State normal school for the instruction and practice of colored teachers in the science of education, the art of teaching and the mode of governing schools, to be known as State Normal No. 3 (now a State Teachers College); the said school shall be under the control of the State board of education, who shall appoint the principal and necessary assistants; and the faculty shall consist of a principal and as many teachers as the board shall appoint. The sessions of the school shall be determined by the State board of education, who shall prescribe the curriculum of study, which, however, shall include courses for the special preparation of instructors for teaching the elements of agriculture and mechanic arts, provide necessary quarters, supplies and apparatus, fix the qualifications for admission as students, the salary of the principal, assistant teachers and employes.

Baltimore City Code (1950 Ed.)
Article 32

Schools

Schools for Colored Children

(Originally Ordinance of Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, No. 44, July 10, 1867)

(f) Section 22. It is hereby made the duty of the Board of School Commissioners of the City of Baltimore to organize separate schools for colored children, and to establish as many schools for the education of the colored children of Baltimore City as may in the judgment of said board be necessary.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

OCT 15 1954

HAROLD B. WILLEY, CLERK

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1954

Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.

FRANCES B. GEBHART, ET AL., PETITIONERS

v.

ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.

BRIEF OF HARRY McMULLAN

Attorney General of North Carolina, Amicus Curiae

HARRY McMULLAN
Attorney General of
North Carolina

GEORGE A. LOVE
Assistant Attorney General
of North Carolina

T. WHEELER TAYLOR
Assistant Attorney General
of North Carolina

RALPH MOODY
Assistant Attorney General
of North Carolina

SUBJECT MATTER INDEX

PAGE

Preliminary Statement 2
Questions Propounded by the Court 3
Summary of Argument 4
Argument 10

I

A Decree Directing a School Board of a State to Admit Negro Children Forthwith to the School of Their Choice Within the Limits of Normal Geographic School Districting Would Exceed the Authority of a Federal Court 10

II

If This Court Has Authority to Issue a Decree Requiring the Admission Forthwith of Negro Children to Schools of Their Choice Within the Limits of Normal Geographic School Districting, It Is Not Required to Do So, but in the Exercise of Its Equity Powers Can Permit a Gradual Adjustment From the Existing School System to a System Not Based on Color Distinctions 13

III

If This Court Has the Authority to Issue a Decree Requiring the Admission Forthwith of Negro Children to Schools of Their Choice Within the Limits of Normal Geographic School Districting, It Should Not Do So, If Such a Decree Is to Be a Pattern to Be Followed in Other Cases Arising in Other States and Other School Districts 18

IV

A Decree Which May Be Workable Under Conditions Prevailing Elsewhere May Have Grave and Far Reaching Consequences If Applied to the Public Schools of North Carolina 20

A. Diversity Between North Carolina and Other States 20
B. The Existing North Carolina Public School System 25
C. The Development of the North Carolina Public School System 27
D. The Future of Public Schools in North Carolina If Immediate Integration Is Directed by the Court 35
E. Diverse Conditions Within North Carolina 37
a. Distribution of Negro Population 37
b. Retarded Children 39
c. Urban and Rural Distribution of Negroes 41
F. The North Carolina School Bus System 42

Conclusion 43
Appendix 45

APPENDIX

PAGE

Exhibit 1

Map of North Carolina Showing Distribution of Negro and White Population in 1950 45

Exhibit 2

North Carolina Population by Counties and Races 47

Exhibit 3

North Carolina Counties By Percentage of Negro Population, 1950 50

Exhibit 4

Map of the United States Showing Distribution of Negro and White Populations in 1950 53

Exhibit 5

States by Percentages of Negro Population, 1950 55

Exhibit 6

Letter of Transmittal and Questionnaire to County and City Superintendents of Schools With Tabulation of Answers to Questions 8 through 18 56

Exhibit 7

Comments of County and City Superintendents in Response to Questionnaire 61

Exhibit 8

Letter of Transmittal and Questionnaire to Sheriffs and Chiefs of Police With Tabulations of Answers to Questions 1 through 10 186

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

PAGE

(a) Decisions

Alexander v. Hillman, 296 U. S. 222, 56 S. Ct. 204, 80 L. Ed. 192 15

Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1, 65 S. Ct. 1416, 89 L. Ed. 2013 15

Honeyman v. Hanan, 302 U. S. 375, 58 S. Ct. 273, 82 L. Ed. 312 11

International Salt Company v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 68 S. Ct. 12, 92 L. Ed. 20 15

McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 70 S. Ct. 851, 94 L. Ed. 1149 18

Missouri v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 59 S. Ct. 232, 83 L. Ed. 208 11

Patton v. State of Mississippi, 332 U. S. 463, 68 S. Ct. 184, 92 L. Ed. 76 11

Rice v. Elmore, 165 F. (2d) 387, cert. den. 333 U. S. 875, 68 S. Ct. 905, 92 L. Ed. 1151 12

Sipuel v. University of Oklahoma, 332 U. S. 631, 68 S. Ct. 299, 92 L. Ed. 247 18

Standard Oil Company v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619 15

State of Missouri v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 59 S. Ct. 232, 83 L. Ed. 208 11

Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 70 S. Ct. 848, 94 L. Ed. 1114 18

United States v. American Tobacco Company, 221 U. S. 106, 31 S. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663 ..... 14, 17

United States v. United States Gypsum Company, 340 U. S. 76, 71 S. Ct. 160, 95 L. Ed. 89 15

United States v. United States Steel Corporation, 251 U. S. 417, 40 S. Ct. 293, 64 L. Ed. 343 15

(b) Statutes

28 United States Code Annotated 41(1) 12

(c) Legal Treatises

Lord Hardwicke, Letter to Lord Kames 17

Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, 5th ed. 16, 17

Story, Equity Jurisprudence, 14th ed. 16

PAGE

(d) State Agencies and Officials

Holden, Governor, Message to Legislature (N. C.) of 1868....28, 29, 30

House Journal of 1868 (N. C.) 31

Journal of Constitutional Convention of 1875 (N. C.) 32

Senate Journal of 1868 (N. C.) 31

Public Instruction, Department of (N. C.) 33, 34, 40

Public Instruction, State Superintendent of (N. C.) 33, 34

(e) Miscellaneous

Ashmore, The Negro and the Schools 26

Carter, The Court's Decision and the South, Reader's Digest, September, 1954 13

Dowdey, A Southerner Looks at the Supreme Court, Saturday Review, October 9, 1954 .....21, 43

Knight, Public School Education in North Carolina.....28, 30, 31, 32

Lee, Newark (N. J.) Telegram 24

Newark (N. J.) Telegram 24

Peabody Board of Trustees, Proceedings of 32

Reader's Digest, September, 1954 13

Saturday Review, October 9, 1954 .....14, 21, 43

Second Regional Conference, State Boards of Education, etc., Report of 39

State School Facts, January, 1952 40

U. S. News and World Report, August 27, 1954 .....23, 24

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In The Supreme Court Of The United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

NOS. 1, 2, 3, 4

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.

FRANCIS B. GEBHART, ET AL., PETITIONERS

v.

ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.

BRIEF OF HARRY McMULLAN

ATTORNEY GENERAL OF NORTH CAROLINA, AMICUS CURIAE

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

The Attorney General of the State of North Carolina submits this brief as amicus curiae because of the vast importance to the State of North Carolina, and to all of the people of the State, of the decision heretofore announced and of the decrees to be issued by this Court in these cases.

The State of North Carolina is not a party to any of these actions and its Attorney General is not authorized to make it a party thereto or to enter an appearance on its behalf.

As suggested by the Court, with approval of His Excellency, William B. Umstead, Governor of North Carolina, this brief is submitted for the purpose of stating to the Court what, in our opinion, the answers should be to its Questions 4 and 5, set forth in Footnote 13 to its opinion in these cases issued May 17, 1954.

It must be frankly stated at the outset that this brief is not intended to present any solution to the extremely delicate and dangerous problem which has arisen in North Carolina by reason of this Court's decision. It is impossible for the Attorney General to present any plan to this Court for the mixing of the races in the public schools of North Carolina, and such is not the purpose of this brief.

The Kansas and Delaware cases apparently involve no further problems and, thus, there are left for the present consideration of the Court only the decrees to be entered in the cases concerning school boards of Clarendon County, South Carolina, and Prince Edward County, Virginia.

This Court apparently recognizes that in overruling its historic decisions and adopting an entirely new concept of the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment, making necessary a change in the public schools in 17 states including North Carolina and directly affecting the customs and lives of fifty million people, consideration must be given to the impact of this revolutionary pronouncement on the states which heretofore acted upon this Court's former decisions holding that they were entirely within their constitutional power in providing for the separation of the races in their public schools.

This brief is submitted for the purpose of showing the unparalleled gravity of nullifying the Constitution and laws of North Carolina affecting its most cherished, important, and expensive enterprise, its public schools, and for the purpose of stating sincerely and emphatically that the subsequent decrees of this Court in these cases should allow the greatest possible latitude to the District Judges in conducting subsequent hearings and in drafting final decrees, if any of the objectives sought by this Court's decision are to be attained.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

From all information available, an attempt to compel the intermixture of the races in the public schools of North Carolina forthwith would result in such violent opposition as to endanger the continued existence of the schools. It is impossible at this time to foresee what the final results would be even if the Court should recognize the divergent conditions existing in this State and allow sufficient time and ample discretion in the District Judges to frame final decrees after full hearings to meet these conditions. This, however, would seem to be the only way, if any way can be found, which might possibly have the result which the decision of this Court contemplates.

The General Assembly of North Carolina has not convened since this Court handed down its decision on May 17, 1954. What action the General Assembly may take and the final decision of the people of North Carolina may depend upon what ultimate decrees are entered in this Court and in the District Courts. The Attorney General of North Carolina has no authority whatever to say what this action will be or to commit in any way the General Assembly, or the people of North Carolina, to any particular course of action in this grave situation. No other problem has so deeply moved and disturbed the people of the State since the dark days of the early 'sixties.

QUESTIONS PROPOUNDED BY THE COURT

The Court restored these cases to the docket for further argument on Questions 4 and 5 previously propounded by the Court as follows:

"4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

"(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

"(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

"5. On the assumption on which question 4 (a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4 (b),

"(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

"(b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;

"(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

"(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

It is submitted that the answer to Question 4 (a) is clearly, "No," and the answer to Question 4 (b) is clearly, "Yes." The answer to Question 5 (a) is "No," which eliminates Questions 5 (b) and 5 (c). The answer to Question 5 (d) is that the judgments in Briggs v. Elliott and in Davis v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, Virginia, should be remanded to the courts of first instance with no instructions except the general instructions set forth in Part III of this brief.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

This Court's determination that the state constitutions and statutes before it violate the Fourteenth Amendment does not compel the issuance of a decree "providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice." On the contrary, in our opinion neither this Court nor any other federal court is authorized to issue such a decree.

Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment empowers Congress to enact "appropriate legislation" to enforce the amendment, but in the absence of legislation enacted by Congress, whatever may be the case when Congress has spoken, no federal court is authorized to legislate and give to a state or a local school board affirmative directions as to the operation of its public schools. The federal courts may compel a school board to desist from a practice which violates the Fourteenth Amendment, but they may not compel the state, or any of its agencies or subdivisions to do what, in effect, would place the courts in charge of supervising the operation of its public schools.

This Court has decided in these cases that segregation of children (1) in public schools, (2) solely on the basis of race, violates the constitutional rights of children in the minority group. The decision would not reach public schools in which pupils are separated on the basis of sex, on the basis of intelligence or achievement tests, or on any other basis except race, provided only that the basis has a reasonable relation to the proper conduct of the schools or to the preservation of the public peace, morals, health or welfare. It would not, of course, have any application to any state which no longer maintains public schools.

Even if this Court had the authority to require these defendant school boards to permit a Negro child to go to school in whichever building within the district the child selects, a privilege, incidentally, which white children do not have in North Carolina, such a decree would not necessarily follow from the determination that the state constitutions and statutes before the Court are unconstitutional. This Court, in the exercise of its equity powers which the plaintiffs have invoked, is not required to consider these plaintiffs, and others similarly situated, to the exclusion of others not similarly situated or of others similarly situated but not desiring to attend or send their children to mixed schools. A court of equity may so frame its decree as to preserve both the rights of the plaintiff and the peace of the United States, or of a single state or community. It is not necessary, in order to secure the constitutional rights of the plaintiffs, to subject to grave danger of destruction a public school system painfully evolved through the sacrifices of four successive generations, which acted in reliance upon the interpretation placed upon the Fourteenth Amendment by this Court, by the Congress, and by the courts of last resort in Northern as well as Southern states. Even if it were, this Court may and should stay its hand because of the greater interest of these plaintiffs and all others, whether similarly situated or not, in the maintenance of public schools.

The Court has well said:

> "(B)ecause of the great variety of local conditions, the formulation of decrees in these cases presents problems of considerable complexity."

This diversity exists not only between state and state, but also, and to an even more pronounced degree, between regions and communities within a single state. An averaging of the differences between parts of South Carolina approaches in result an averaging of the differences between parts of North Carolina much more closely than conditions in western North Carolina counties approach those in eastern North Carolina counties. If the public schools and the public peace are to be preserved, the decrees to be entered in the South Carolina and Virginia cases must be framed to fit the conditions in the actual communities involved, not to fit the conditions in a non-existent, average community. Only a court conversant with local conditions and granted wide discretion can tailor the decree to fit the local variations.

It may be, as Mr. Justice Jackson suggested during the oral argument of these cases, that to send the cases back to the lower courts, without standards to guide them in their further proceedings, will mean a generation of litigation. If so, such a result is far preferable to a generation of strife outside the courts and of chaos inside the schoolroom.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Attorney General of North Carolina and the State Superintendent of Public Instruction prepared and sent a questionnaire to 174 county and city school superintendents throughout North Carolina. Appendix, Exhibit 6. It was designed to ascertain what consequences these men, who know more about the schools of North Carolina than any other group anywhere, anticipate would flow from an attempt to commingle forthwith Negro and white or Indian children in North Carolina schools, within the limits of normal geographic school districting. Each superintendent was asked to give his opinion with reference to his own school unit alone. Of the 165 who expressed opinions, within the time limit set by the transmittal letter (Appendix, Exhibit 6), only 7 believe such an attempt would be accepted peacefully. 145 believe it would seriously impair their conduct of their schools. 124 believe it would cause serious complications in the operation of school busses serving their schools. 135 believe they would have serious difficulty in securing a sufficient number of properly trained white teachers and only 3 believe it would be practicable to use Negro teachers. 148 believe serious problems of discipline would be created. 146 believe extra-curricular activities would be seriously affected. 141 believe parents in large numbers would withdraw their children from the public schools. 138 believe instruction would be seriously impaired by reason of the difference between the average attainments of white and Negro children. 163 are of the opinion that white children will not attend schools heretofore conducted for Negroes, none expressing a contrary opinion. It is a matter of common knowledge in North Carolina that the schools now operated for white children, like those now operated for Negro children, are so crowded it would be a physical impossibility to squeeze any substantial number of Negro children into them, unless a corresponding number of white children either go to the schools presently operated for Negroes or drop out of school.

149 of the superintendents believe a gradual adjustment over a period of time would enable their schools to cope better with the problems flowing from a conversion of the existing school system to one not based on color distinction.

The school superintendents were invited to state in their own words such explanations of their answers to the questions in this questionnaire as they might wish to make. Most of them did so. It may be of interest to the Court to read all of these statements made by those who best know all facets of the school problems in their respective communities. Therefore, these explanatory responses to each question are printed in the Appendix, Exhibit 7.

The Attorney General of North Carolina also prepared and sent another questionnaire to 438 sheriffs and chiefs of police throughout North Carolina. Appendix, Exhibit 8. It was designed to ascertain what these men, who know more about the likelihood of violence in North Carolina than any other group, believe about the likelihood of violence if an attempt were made to commingle forthwith Negro and white children in North Carolina schools within the limits of normal geographic school districting. Each officer was asked to give his opinion with reference to his police jurisdiction alone. Of 198 officers who replied within the time limit fixed by the letter of transmittal (Appendix, Exhibit 8), 191 believe there would be likelihood of violence among racial groups of students which would seriously interfere with the operation of the schools. 189 believe parents, and others not students, would be involved in such violence. 192 believe there would be danger of violence on school busses or at places where children wait for busses. 179 believe their present police forces would not be sufficient to preserve the general peace and order if such an attempt to commingle the children were made forthwith. Only 4 officers out of the 198 who replied believe white parents would permit their children to attend schools in which a substantial number of the students are Negroes, 186 expressing a contrary opinion. 71 believe Negro parents would not permit their children to attend a school in which a substantial number of the students are white. 194 believe racial conflicts would result from the disciplining of white children by Negro teachers, only 2 expressing a contrary view, and 146 believe such conflicts would result from the discipling of Negro children by white teachers. 172 believe there would be increased danger of malicious destruction of school buildings and school busses. Every officer of the entire 198 who answered believes the majority of the people in his jurisdiction favors segregation.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

North Carolina educates more Negroes than any other state in the Union. North Carolina employs more Negro teachers than any other state in the Union. The average Negro teacher in North Carolina has more college training and is better paid than the average white teacher. North Carolina's concern for the education of her Negro children is not a recently acquired concern. North Carolina's public school system is a state-wide system, not a county system. North Carolina has built this system in good faith and in reliance upon this Court's former interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment. One of the sills upon which the entire structure rests is the belief, still firmly held by the overwhelming majority of North Carolinians, that separate schools for the Negro, Indian and white children are essential to the peace of the state and to the proper education of the children.

The Negro population of North Carolina is not scattered evenly throughout the state, but varies from negligible numbers in western counties to a majority of the total population in nine of the eastern counties. Appendix, Exhibits 1, 2, and 3. In North Carolina's cities, as in cities elsewhere, schools are located so that there will be less commingling of the Negro and white children in the same school building in cities than in rural areas, but most of North Carolina's Negroes and most of North Carolina's white people do not live in cities. North Carolina does not have a population of many racial and sub-racial groups. Practically all of the people of North Carolina are either Negro or Anglo-Saxon.

These are conditions which distinguish North Carolina from other states. These are conditions which must be taken into consideration in formulating any decree intended to apply directly or indirectly to the schools of North Carolina. To ignore them is to ignore reality and the accumulated experience of four generations. A decree which would cause little or no dissension and confusion in the schools of Kansas may well make effective teaching impossible in North Carolina and may even result in the abandonment of public schools. That which is a mere preference in Illinois or California, may well be a condition precedent to a North Carolina child's going to any school at all.

ARGUMENT

I

A DECREE DIRECTING A SCHOOL BOARD OF A STATE TO ADMIT NEGRO CHILDREN FORTHWITH TO THE SCHOOLS OF THEIR CHOICE WITHIN THE LIMITS OF NORMAL GEOGRAPHIC SCHOOL DISTRICTING WOULD EXCEED THE AUTHORITY OF A FEDERAL COURT.

Courts of the United States may restrain an official or a school board acting under the authority of a state from denying to a Negro child the equal protection of the laws. This Court having determined that segregation in the public schools solely on the basis of race deprives Negro children of the equal protection of the laws, an injunction may properly issue from a federal court directing a state school board to desist from denying a Negro child admission to a public school solely because the child is a Negro, but a federal court may not properly require a state school board to perform affirmative duties or require it to follow procedures prescribed by the court. Such a decree would amount to the supervision by the Court of the actual operation of the public schools.

In the matter of judicial procedures this Court has said:

> "The Federal Constitution does not undertake to control the power of a state to determine by what process legal rights may be asserted, or legal obligations be enforced, provided the method of procedure gives rea> sonable notice and affords fair opportunity to be heard before the issues are decided."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> Honeyman v. Hanan, 302 U. S. 375, 58 S. Ct. 273, 82 L. Ed. 312 (1937).

That is, under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the federal courts may concern themselves only with the results of state laws and state administrative actions. If those results deprive a person of his life, liberty or property without due process of law, the federal courts may intervene to the extent of requiring the state to change the result, but the procedure or method by which the acceptable result is to be reached is a matter for state, not federal determination.

The same is true of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, when a Negro had been convicted of a crime by a jury from which members of the Negro race were excluded, pursuant to a systematic, intentional, deliberate and invariable practice to exclude Negroes from juries, this Court reversed the result because the result violated the Equal Protection Clause, but remanded the case to the state court "for proceedings not inconsistent with" this Court's opinion, leaving to the state the choice of a procedure leading to a constitutional result. Patton v. State of Mississippi, 332 U. S. 463, 68 S. Ct. 184, 92 L. Ed. 76 (1948). When a state denied a Negro facilities for a legal education within its borders, this Court reversed the result because the result violated the Equal Protection Clause, but remanded the case to the state court "for further proceedings not inconsistent with" the opinion of this Court, leaving to the state the finding and selection of a new road leading to a constitutional result. State of Missouri v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 59 S. Ct. 232, 83 L. Ed. 208 (1938). When, by state action, Negroes were denied the right to vote because of their race, a federal court enjoined the election officials from reaching that result which it said violated the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, and this Court denied certiorari, but the federal courts did not go further than to enjoin the continued reaching of the unconstitutional result. No master was appointed to supervise future elections. No detailed decree was issued setting forth procedures to be followed by election officials. The right of the state to adopt and administer election laws so as to reach a different result was not impaired. Rice v. Elmore, 165 F. (2d) 387, Fourth Circuit, 1947, cert. den. 333 U. S. 875, 68 S. Ct. 905, 92 L. Ed. 1151 (1948).

Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment empowers the Congress to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of the amendment. Whether Section 5 authorizes the Congress to enact legislation requiring state school boards forthwith to admit Negro children to the schools of their choice within the limits of normal geographic school districting is not now before the Court. Congress has not so provided. Congress has provided that when a person is deprived by state action of rights guaranteed by the Constitution a federal court may enjoin the reaching of the unconstitutional result, 28 U. S. C. A. 41 (1), but Congress, even if it has the power, has not granted to any federal court the authority to administer the admission of children to schools operated by a state or to control the state in its choice of a procedure leading to a constitutional result.

It is a matter of which judicial notice may be taken that virtually every school building in North Carolina is presently crowded to its physical capacity. If a substantial number of Negro children are admitted to what is now a school crowded with white children, a corresponding number of white children must attend another school or attend no public school at all. Thus, a decree requiring a school board in North Carolina forthwith to admit Negro children to the schools of their choice will, if a substantial number of them choose a school now used by white children, necessarily require the school board to deny to white children presently enrolled in that school the right to continue to attend it. A federal court may now enjoin a state school board from denying admission of Negro children to a specific state school building because of their race alone, but no federal court is authorized to take the assignment of children to specific state school buildings out of the hands of the state school officials and place it in the hands of Negro children.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

This Court has decided in these cases that an unconstitutional result is reached when a school board, acting under state authority, denies a Negro child admission (1) to a public school, (2) solely on account of the child's race. There are, however, many ways leading to a different and constitutional result, if after an "agonizing reappraisal" of its public school system the state should determine to continue to operate it. In North Carolina, for example, the result now declared unconstitutional by this Court would not arise if any of the following courses among others should be taken: (1) Assignment of white and Negro children to schools on the basis of residence alone; (2) Segregation of children in schools on the basis of sex, the basis of intelligence tests, the basis of achievement tests, or any other basis except race, provided only that the basis has a reasonable relation to the proper conduct of the schools or to the maintenance of the public safety, morals, health or welfare (See, Hodding Carter, "The Court's Decision and the South," Reader's Digest, September, 1954); (3) Discontinuance of the present state-wide school system and leaving to each county or community the decision as to whether it will have public schools operated on the one or the other of these bases. See, Hodding Carter, "The Court's Decision and the South," supra. It is submitted that the choice to be made between these or other methods leading to a constitutional result is for the State of North Carolina.

II

IF THIS COURT HAS THE AUTHORITY TO ISSUE A DECREE REQUIRING THE ADMISSION FORTHWITH OF NEGRO CHILDREN TO SCHOOLS OF THEIR CHOICE WITHIN THE LIMITS OF NORMAL GEOGRAPHIC SCHOOL DISTRICTING, IT IS NOT REQUIRED TO DO SO, BUT IN THE EXERCISE OF ITS EQUITY POWERS CAN PERMIT A GRADUAL ADJUSTMENT FROM THE EXISTING SCHOOL SYSTEM TO A SYSTEM NOT BASED ON COLOR DISTINCTIONS.

This Court's decision on the merits in these cases gives rise to a question of equity power for which no precise precedent has been found by the Attorney General of North Carolina, or, apparently, by any of the distinguished counsel representing the parties to these cases. The public schools and resulting social structure of North Carolina, and of at least eleven other states, rest, as a house rests upon a sill, upon this Court's former interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, now reversed. If there has been any other judicial decision so affecting fifty million people, that decision has not been found. As the editor of the Saturday Review (October 9, 1954, page 9) has said: "This historic decision cannot be considered apart from the laborious overhaul of a whole social apparatus which it may require." Consequently, the discussion of this Court's equity powers in the formulation of the remedy to be afforded the plaintiffs must proceed from analogies which are exceedingly remote.

The nuisance and anti-trust cases, to which the attention of the Court has previously been directed by the briefs of other counsel, involved huge investments by many people. However, the confusion likely to result from dividing even so vast an enterprise as was the American Tobacco Company pales into insignificance when compared with the uncertainties confronting the people of North Carolina, and other southern states, as a result of the decision on the merits of these cases. Thus, the decrees approved in anti-trust and nuisance cases throw but a flickering light on the problem here. Nevertheless, they do direct attention to the flexibility of equitable remedies and to the fundamental principles which should guide the Chancellor in the exercise of his unusual powers.

In United States v. American Tobacco Company, 221 U. S. 106, 31 S. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663 (1911) this Court affirmed the finding by the district court that the defendant was an illegal combination in restraint of trade. It did not, however, order its immediate dissolution, pointing out that to do so would endanger the public interest and property rights of innocent persons. The Court said:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "In view of the considerations we have stated, we leave the matter to the court below to work out a compliance with the law without unnecessary injury to the public or the rights of private property." (p. 188)

In the similar and contemporaneous case of Standard Oil Company v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619 (1911) the Court likewise instructed the district court to allow a reasonable delay in carrying out the decree of dissolution "in view of the magnitude of the interests involved and their complexity" and "in view of the possible serious injury to result to the public." In Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1, 65 S. Ct. 1416, 89 L. Ed. 2013 (1945) the Court also recognized that the fashioning of a decree in an anti-trust case is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the Court, saying, "A full exploration of facts is usually necessary in order properly to draw such a decree." In United States v. United States Steel Corporation, 251 U. S. 417, 40 S. Ct. 293, 64 L. Ed. 343 (1920), the Court recognized the propriety of making a distinction in the drafting of a decree between the case of persistent, systematic, lawbreakers masquerading under legal forms, and an organization which the Court found to be a violation of law but also found to have been developed in good faith, saying that in such cases "the public interest is of paramount regard."

In International Salt Company v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 68 S. Ct. 12, 92 L. Ed. 20 (1947) the Court said with reference to the framing of a decree to compel compliance with the Anti-Trust Act:

> "The framing of decrees should take place in the district rather than in appellate courts. They are vested with large discretion to model their judgments to fit the exigencies of the particular case." (p.400)
> ACCORD: United States v. U. S. Gypsum Co., 340 U. S. 76, 95, 71 S. Ct. 160, 95 L. Ed. 89.

In Alexander v. Hillman, 296 U. S. 222, 56 S. Ct. 204, 80 L. Ed. 192 (1935), this Court said:

> "Treating their established forms as flexible, courts of equity may suit proceedings and remedies to the circumstances of cases and formulate them appropriately to safeguard, conveniently to adjudge, and promptly to enforce substantial rights of all parties before them."

In his Equity Jurisprudence, 14th edition, section 28, Story says:

"But Courts of Equity (as compared with courts of common law) are not so restrained. Although they have prescribed forms of proceeding, the latter are flexible, and may be suited to the different postures of cases. They may adjust their decrees so as to meet most if not all of these exigencies; and they may vary, qualify, restrain, and model the remedy so as to suit it to mutual and adverse claims, controlling equities, and the real and substantial rights of all the parties. Nay, more; they can bring before them all parties interested in the subject matter, and adjust the rights of all, however numerous; whereas Courts of Common Law are compelled to limit their inquiry to the very parties in the litigation before them, although other persons may have the deepest interest in the event of the suit. So that one of the most striking and distinctive features of Courts of Equity is that they can adapt their decrees to all the varieties of circumstances which may arise, and adjust them to all the peculiar rights of all the parties in interest; whereas Courts of Common Law (as we have already seen) are bound down to a fixed and invariable form of judgment in general terms, altogether absolute, for the plaintiff or for the defendant."

Pomeroy emphasizes the same flexibility of equitable remedies and the discretion which the Chancellor may and should exercise in formulating his decrees, saying in section 1338 of the fifth edition:

"In determining whether an injunction will be issued to protect any right of property, to enforce any obligation or to prevent any wrong, there is one fundamental principle of the utmost importance, which furnishes the answer to any question, the solution to any difficulties which may arise.—The general principle may be stated as follows: Wherever a right exists or is created, by contract, by the ownership of property or otherwise, a violation of that right will be prohibited, unless there > are other considerations of policy or expediency which forbid a resort to this prohibitive remedy." (Emphasis added. See also, Sections 60 and 109.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Perhaps the statement of these principles most pertinent to these cases is found in a letter from Lord Hardwicke to Lord Kames, quoted by Pomeroy in Section 60 of his treatise. Lord Hardwicke said:

> "Some general rules there ought to be for otherwise the great inconvenience of jus vagum et incertum will follow. And yet the Praetor must not be so absolutely and invariably bound by them as the judges are by the rules of the common law. For if he were so bound, the consequences would follow that he must sometimes pronounce decrees which would be materially unjust, since no rule can be equally just in the application to a whole class of cases that are far from being the same in every circumstance." (Emphasis added.)

In United States v. American Tobacco Company, 221 U. S. 106, 31 S. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663 (1911), the Court found that the defendant was an unlawful combination in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, but in order not to cause undue hardship to innocent investors it allowed for its dissolution what it believed to be a reasonable time under all of the circumstances. A much longer time will be required to change one of the bases of a social order believed by many millions of people to be necessary to their well being, and which they and their fathers have built in reliance upon an interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment affirmed and reaffirmed by former decisions of this Court.

In the exercise of its equity powers, which these plaintiffs have invoked, this Court is not required to consider these plaintiffs, and others similarly situated, to the exclusion of others not similarly situated. It may frame its decree so as to preserve both the rights of the plaintiffs and the peace of the United States. These cases, by reason of the numbers of people affected, the nature of the schools involved, and the great variety of local conditions which must be taken into account, are completely distinguishable, as to the appropriateness of the remedy, from Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 70 S. Ct. 848, 94 L. Ed. 1114, Sipuel v. University of Oklahoma, 332 U. S. 631, 68 S. Ct. 299, 92 L. Ed. 247, and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 70 S. Ct. 851, 94 L. Ed. 1149. It is not necessary in order to grant these plaintiffs and others similarly situated their constitutional rights that the public school system of North Carolina be subjected to grave danger of destruction. Even if it were, this Court may and should stay its hand because of the greater interest of the Negroes, Indians and white people of North Carolina, alike, in the maintenance of good public schools.

III

IF THIS COURT HAS THE AUTHORITY TO ISSUE A DECREE REQUIRING THE ADMISSION FORTHWITH OF NEGRO CHILDREN TO SCHOOLS OF THEIR CHOICE WITHIN THE LIMITS OF NORMAL GEOGRAPHIC SCHOOL DISTRICTING, IT SHOULD NOT DO SO, IF SUCH A DECREE IS TO BE A PATTERN TO BE FOLLOWED IN OTHER CASES ARISING IN OTHER STATES AND OTHER SCHOOL DISTRICTS.

In its opinion of May 17, 1954, this Court recognized the variances between the cases now before it and cases which may arise, saying:

> "(B)ecause of the great variety of local conditions, the formulation of decrees in these cases presents problems of considerable complexity."

The problems and their complexities are multiplied many times if consideration is given to all the schools of a single state. If all of the states now educating white and Negro children in separate schools are to be brought within the contemplation of the decree, even though they cannot be reached directly by it, the problems and their complexities become infinite and their solution in a single decree impossible.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The diversity which the Court has recognized exists not only between state and state, but also between regions and communities within each state. Indeed, the differences between parts of a single state are often more pronounced than those between two states, each considered as a whole by averaging the differences to be found within its borders. If the public schools and the public peace are to be preserved for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and others, whether similarly situated or not, the decrees to be entered in the district courts in these cases must be framed to fit the conditions of Clarendon County, South Carolina, and Prince Edward County, Virginia, not some illusory community existing only in the imagination. Only a court conversant with conditions in these counties, including those not shown in the present records before this Court, and granted wide discretion can tailor a decree to fit those conditions.

It may well be true that to remand these cases without undertaking to supply the courts of first instance with specific standards to guide their further proceedings will mean a generation of litigation before an acceptable substitute can be found for the existing school systems in all of the southern states. Mr. Justice Jackson so suggested in the course of the oral argument of these cases at the October Term, 1953. But, standards, which do not fit the conditions in which a decree is to operate, do not guide. They only lead into confusion. Many of our principles of law and of our philosophy of government were hammered out through not one, but many generations of litigation. A generation of litigation is far preferable to the destruction of a social order which is the product of many generations of free men and women striving together for their mutual advancement. A generation of litigation is preferable to a generation of bitterness and strife between neighbors outside of the courts, to a generation of chaos inside the schoolroom, or a generation with no public schools at all.

It is, therefore, suggested that these cases should be remanded to the district courts with directions to frame decrees with respect to the admission of the Negro plaintiffs to public schools based upon facts and conditions which may be found to exist at such time. The Court should direct that the district courts should enter no final decrees until further hearings have been conducted and full consideration given to all the many factors which will be involved in adjusting to the revolutionary change in the operation of the public schools which this Court now requires. This would necessarily involve an important time element, available teaching staffs, adequate school buildings and equipment, and compliance with applicable local laws respecting the administration of these public schools as well as all other essential elements constituting the legal and practical aspects of school administration.

IV

A DECREE WHICH MAY BE WORKABLE UNDER CONDITIONS PREVAILING ELSEWHERE MAY HAVE GRAVE AND FAR REACHING CONSEQUENCES IF APPLIED TO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF NORTH CAROLINA.

A.

DIVERSITY BETWEEN NORTH CAROLINA AND OTHER STATES

The diversity in local conditions which this Court has recognized in these cases is of course most pronounced as between southern states and northern and border states, although there is no such thing as a typical southern state in this respect. As has recently been stated in the Saturday Review:

> "The only single Southern attitude—in which he (the Southerner) can find no difference from the rest of the country—is that he wants to live in a white society. It is not this desire that differentiates him from his fellow-Americans, but the peculiar circumstances of his total society, and the hereditary conditioning of his historical > circumstance. Other sections have never faced the problem of a mixed society. Whenever a community has accumulated a density of colored population the problem has been tacitly evaded by the creation of 'black belts,' as in New York and Chicago. Where individual Negroes formed any sizable percentage of a school, even in the excellent public-school system of New York, families who could afford to immediately moved their children to private schools or moved themselves to suburbs." Clifford Dowdey, A Southerner Looks at the Supreme Court, the Saturday Review, October 9, 1954, page 10.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

At least four major differences distinguish North Carolina from most of the states outside the South: The number of Negroes in proportion to white people, the intermixture of white and Negro homes throughout rural areas, the general reaction to this Court's present interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the number of Negro teachers employed.

No state outside of the South has a population of which as many as 20% are Negroes. See, Appendix, Exhibits 4 and 5. Thirty-five states have populations in which less than 8% are Negroes. Thirteen states have populations in which less than 1% are Negroes. Even if every other condition were precisely the same, the intermixture of one Negro child with 99 white children in North Dakota is obviously a far different problem for a school administrator from the problem of commingling 71 Negro children with 29 white children in Northampton County, North Carolina, or 45 Negro children with 55 white children in Mississippi.

Kansas, whose statute has been held unconstitutional in these cases, has among its population less than one Negro for each 25 persons. This fact alone would make it far easier for the Board of Education in Topeka to commingle white and Negro children than for the school boards in Clarendon County, South Carolina, or Prince Edward County, Virginia, to do so. The disruption of the public schools in Milford, Delaware, as a result of the state's undertaking to commingle eleven Negroes in a formerly white high school, pursuant to this Court's opinion, has become a matter of common knowledge, but in all of Delaware there are only 13 Negroes to every 87 white people. Even the border states of Kentucky and West Virginia have fewer than one Negro to 13 white people. Thus, even in these two states the commingling of white and Negro children in the public schools presents a far different problem from that which would be encountered by the school boards in most counties of North Carolina.

This, however, is not the only difference between the northern and border states on the one hand, and North Carolina, and other southern states on the other hand. The northern states which have the largest Negro populations are New York, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and New Jersey. In these states the Negro population is almost entirely an urban population. In the North, as in the South, Negroes who live in cities are not scattered throughout those cities but are concentrated principally in certain areas through the natural tendency of people to live in close proximity to other people like themselves. As a result, school district lines can be drawn so that there are relatively few Negro children in certain schools and relatively few white children in other schools. For the residents of those areas, North and South, the problem presented by the opinion of this Court in these cases is largely academic in nature. For most of the people who live in North Carolina the Court's opinion cannot be complied with so easily and, therefore, the questions presented are not academic but are questions, the answers to which must be found in the confusion of people required to change a public school system which is a vital part of their society. This is true because most North Carolinians, white and colored, do not live in cities but live in rural areas where the residences of white and Negro neighbors are interspersed.

A distinction of major significance in this connection between the northern states and North Carolina is that in the northern states the opinion of this Court in these cases was generally approved, whereas in North Carolina the opinion conflicts with deep seated convictions and has been generally regarded as extremely unfortunate. Of course, this Court may not allow its decisions as to the interpretation of the Constitution to be guided by public opinion, but, in determining the decree to be issued, a court of equity is not required to shut its eyes to reality, especially when the victims of an unwise decree will be children. The experience of our nation, during the period when the Eighteenth Amendment was in effect, demonstrates that a law cannot be successfully enforced by civil authorities when even a substantial minority of the people in a community believe it infringes upon their natural liberties. A court of equity may and should proceed cautiously in formulating a decree which undertakes to require the overwhelming majority of the people in one-third of the Union to change a basic principle upon which their public school systems have been built.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Another important aspect of the problem to be considered in North Carolina is that "the South is the land of opportunity for the Negro teachers." U. S. News and World Report, August 27, 1954, p. 35. North Carolina with very nearly the same Negro population as New York, employs five Negro teachers for every Negro teacher employed by New York. New York with 6 Negroes out of every 100 persons in its population, employs fewer than 2 Negroes for each 100 school teachers. North Carolina, with one Negro out of every 4 persons, employs more than one Negro teacher out of each four teachers. U. S. News and World Report, supra, pp. 36-37.

A distinguished Negro editor has said:

> "No place in the world do Negroes own and control as much as do those in the South. Atlanta is without question the Negro capital of the world. It is the center of Negro culture, education, business, and finance. And both Negroes and whites live, work, and operate business without either being conscious of the other's race.
>
> "During the past 2 years I have spent more time in the South than I have in my office, and I have interviewed thousands of Negroes in all walks of life and I have found very few who favor mixed schools. They want their own schools, but equal facilities.
>
> "Despite all of the hullaballoo about the liberal East and North, no Negro has been made head of a State college or university. Down South the woods are full of Negro college and university presidents. Down in Texas a Negro college president of a State school gets $15,000 a year.

"What Negroes need to refresh their memories on is the fact that just a few years ago we were raising Cain because colored kids in the South were being taught by white teachers. We wanted them taught by Negroes. As Negroes qualified, Negro teachers replaced white teachers until now Negro teachers have completely taken over.

"Not too long ago Negroes went into court and demanded equal facilities in our schools. The courts ruled that they were right. All the Southern States embarked upon a school-building program never heard of before in the history of our Nation. And this effort to give Negroes equal school facilities is an honest one.—

"I have never contended that the South is a utopia, but I do contend that it offers the Negro his greatest opportunity. Last week as I looked at the Negro schools in St. Petersburg and Tampa, Fla., I felt proud of my race. Nowhere in the world do they have more beautiful schools than do the Negroes in Florida, Georgia, North and South Carolina, and the building program is not yet complete." Editor Davis Lee, Newark (N.J.) Telegram, as quoted in the Congressional Record, June 11, 1954, pp. A4335-A4336.

With reference to Negro teachers, the U. S. News and World Report of August 27, 1954, also said:

"Negro teachers in the South, thousands of them, are to lose their jobs when segregation ends in public schools. If they are to go on teaching, the North will have to give them jobs. But openings there will be scarce, if present use of Negro teachers is any criterion. It is a problem that causes real concern among school officials. Even in the North, objections often are raised when Negroes are assigned to teach white children." (p. 35.)

128 out of 131 school superintendents in North Carolina believe they would find it impracticable to use Negro teachers in mixed classes. See, Appendix, Exhibits 6 and 7, Question 11. A court of equity in formulating its decree should consider the effect of the decree upon Negro teachers as well as the effect upon Negro pupils.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The diversity of conditions between North Carolina and every other state in the Union, North or South, and between one part of North Carolina and another, cannot be fully presented to this Court without full hearings and litigation directly concerning schools in North Carolina, in which hearings the people of North Carolina have an opportunity to present evidence as to their own sociological, psychological, and educational conditions. However, for the purpose of demonstrating that these differences exist and are so great as to require different implementation of the Court's decision in these cases, a short account of the North Carolina school system and of its development is set forth in this brief. The people of North Carolina, both white and Negro, take a justifiable pride in the public school system which they have created, and have steadily improved, under statutes and administrative practices in conformity to the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment approved by this Court for sixty years, and by the Congress and the courts of the states since the Amendment was ratified in 1868.

B.

THE EXISTING NORTH CAROLINA PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM

North Carolina, today, is educating more Negro children and employing more Negro teachers than any other state in the Union. She is educating them in a state-wide school system, which means that, except insofar as local tax supplements provide additional benefits, every child in North Carolina, regardless of race, residence or economic status, studies the same subjects and uses the same textbooks. The length of the school term is the same throughout the State and is the same for white children as for Negro children. This has been so for ten years.

Except where there are local tax supplements in effect, every teacher in North Carolina, having the same training and experience, and engaged in the same type of teaching, receives the same salary. As a result of this, and of social and economic conditions outside of the schools, the teaching profession offers more financial inducement to highly qualified Negroes than it offers to white men and women of equal qualifications. For this reason the Negro teachers remain in the teaching profession longer, and receive salary increments based on experience. Consequently, the average salary of Negro teachers in North Carolina is greater than the average salary of white teachers in North Carolina, and has been so for ten years, or almost an entire public school generation. As a consequence of the same economic factor, the average Negro teacher in North Carolina has had more college training than has the average white teacher in North Carolina. This advantage in favor of the Negro schools has also existed for several years. Ashmore, The Negro and the Schools, p. 158.

Since the change in North Carolina from diverse county systems of public school education to a state-wide system, small rural schools have been consolidated into large schools, centrally located within the school district. The State furnishes to every child free transportation to and from those schools in state owned and operated school busses. The result of this consolidation program has been the replacement of the small, dilapidated, frame schoolhouse with large, modern, well-equipped, brick school buildings, more adequately staffed with better teachers teaching a more adequate curriculum. The cold biscuit in a paper sack has been replaced by a hot lunch in a well-equipped school cafeteria. The filthy, outside privy has been replaced with sanitary toilet rooms. Expenditures per pupil have increased far beyond the change in price levels. North Carolina today spends on its public schools 3.9% of its total income, being surpassed in this respect by only four other states in the Union, and being far ahead of the states of New York, Massachusetts, Michigan, Illinois, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Ashmore, The Negro and the Schools, pp. 115, 144-145.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

C.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE NORTH CAROLINA PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM.

This North Carolina school system, in which the Negroes have so great an interest, is not the result of an eleventh hour attempt to comply with the "separate but equal" doctrine approved by this Court in 1896. It is the result of over a century of devotion to and sacrifice for the education of both white and Negro children. It is an achievement of white and Negro neighbors working together in a peaceful, friendly state. It is an achievement in which both the white and Negro people of North Carolina take a justified pride, and which would not have been possible without their adherence to their belief in the doctrine of separate but equal schools.

North Carolina's firm belief that separate schools for the races will train both white and Negro children to live together in mutual respect and friendship, while mixed schools in North Carolina will cause racial conflicts is the result not of emotions and prejudice, but of sober, earnest thought by those who have known and lived in North Carolina, and who have desired to see her children educated so as to be prepared to demonstrate to all the world that two races as fundamentally different as the Anglo-Saxon and the Negro can live side by side in freedom, peace, and mutual respect. Experience has demonstrated the soundness of that belief. There is peace and friendship between white and Negro North Carolinians today which all North Carolinians desire to preserve, and which if properly used by the State Department will, we believe, prove to be a more effective answer to Communism, at home or abroad, than will a decree of this Court which proclaims equality but destroys the conditions precedent to an actual equality of opportunity to learn.

Whether or not this Court is willing to "turn the clock back" and consider the history of public education in North Carolina or the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, the attitude of North Carolina on this question can at least be better understood when it is realized that it has a long history of public schools operated on a segregated basis.

North Carolina was the one southern state which had a well-established system of public schools long before the Civil War, and has believed firmly in public education from the earliest days. In its Constitution of 1776, North Carolina provided for schools with salaries of the teachers to be paid by the public. In 1839 the finances of the state were in sufficiently good condition to permit this dream to be realized. Like the schools in the northern states, those established in North Carolina prior to the Civil War were open to white children only. Their establishment and development shows the great interest and faith which the people of North Carolina have had in public education from earliest times. By 1859 the school population of North Carolina was 230,000 and of these children 155,000 were enrolled in the public schools. There were then 2,758 public schools in operation in the state, and the average monthly salary paid to the teachers was higher than in Connecticut, New Hampshire, Ohio, Wisconsin, or Illinois. Knight, Public School Education in North Carolina, page 180. Even in the dark days of 1863, the public school system in North Carolina was maintained and fully 50,000 children were enrolled. Knight, Public School Education in North Carolina, p. 182. Although the fall of the Confederacy resulted in the loss of the Literary Fund, which was the mainstay of the public school system, and, therefore, brought about a temporary disorganization of the school system, the interest of the people of North Carolina in public education continued without abatement and was immediately extended to include the education of the newly freed Negro children.

After North Carolina had rejected the Fourteenth Amendment, its State Government was taken from the hands of her people and reconstituted in accordance with the wishes of the then majority of Congress. As a result, on July 2, 1868, the amendment was ratified in the name of North Carolina by a Legislature so chosen and constituted. On July 2, 1868, Governor Holden recommended its ratification in a message to this Legislature reading as follows:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"Executive Department of North Carolina
Raleigh
July 2, 1868

"Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

"Allow me to congratulate you on the auspicious circumstances under which you have assembled. Our heartfelt gratitude is due to Almighty God for the suppression of the Rebellion, the preservation of the Union, the just and liberal principles on which it has been reconstructed, and the assurance that we have a future peace and tranquility. The first business to be performed by the Legislature will be the ratification of the Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as the Fourteenth Article, proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I respectfully recommend the immediate ratification of this Article.

Very respectfully,
W. W. Holden."

The Amendment was ratified the same day. Four months later the same governor wrote to the same Legislature as follows:

"Executive Department
Raleigh
November 17, 1868

"To the Honorable, the General Assembly of North Carolina:

"Gentlemen:

"It is proper that at your first regular session under the new Constitution, I should lay before you 'information on the affairs of the state,' and recommend to your consideration such measures as may be deemed expedient.

"The people of the state have reconstructed their government on the basis of equal rights of all.—

"I recommend, in the most earnest terms, that the General Assembly during its present session provide for a general and uniform system of public schools. The schools for the white and colored children should be separate, but in other respects there should be no difference in the character of the schools, or in the provision made to support them.—

> "We have indeed a free Republic, in which every man in nearly every state, is fully the equal of every other man in political and civil rights. We have no distinctions founded on color or race, save those which are social in their character, but every one is free under the law to make his own way in life, and to earn a good name for himself and his children. The Union is over us all, states as well as people. There can be no appeal from its authority.—This government is in the hands of its friends and will be administered by them. The government of North Carolina is in the hands of its friends, and of the friends of the national government, and will be administered by them.—
>
> Very respectfully > your obedient servant,
> W. W. Holden."
>
> (Emphasis added.)

Thus, the subsequently impeached governor of North Carolina recommended to the Legislature which he called, "the friends of the national government," both that it ratify the Fourteenth Amendment and, after the amendment was ratified, that it set up a system of separate schools for the races. The same Legislature, "the friends of the national government," did both.

In his inaugural address, two days after the Fourteenth Amendment had been ratified by the Legislature pursuant to his recommendation, Governor Holden said:

> "It does not follow, nor does the Constitution require, that the white and colored races shall be educated together in the same schools. It is believed to be better for both and more satisfactory to both, that the schools should be distinct and separate."

This Legislature contained 38 Radicals (Republicans) in the Senate and 80 in the House. There were only 12 Conservatives (Democrats) in the Senate and 40 in the House. Knight, Public School Education in North Carolina, p. 231.

Less than two weeks after the amendment had been ratified, the House adopted by a vote of 91 to 2 a resolution proposed by Representative Bowman, Republican Chairman of the Committee on Education, reading as follows:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "That it is the duty of this and of all future General Assemblies of North Carolina to provide for and continue a system of free public schools for both races, but at the same time to provide that the white and colored children of the state, shall be taught in separate schools." House Journal, 1868, p. 54.

The resolution was adopted by the Senate by vote of 26 to 1. Senate Journal 1868, pp. 237-239.

While Senator Sumner's Civil Rights Bill to compel mixed schools was pending in Congress in 1874, Mr. Alexander McIver, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, was called upon for his opinion as to the probable effects on the public schools in North Carolina if the bill became a law. He replied:

> "No legislation in favor of mixed schools has ever been attempted in this State. Public sentiment on this subject is all one way. Opposition to mixed schools is so strong that if the people are free to choose between mixed schools and no schools, they will prefer the latter. The friends of education would therefore deprecate and most sincerely deplore any congressional legislation which might tend to force mixed schools upon the people." Knight, Public School Education in North Carolina, p. 254.

At the same time Dr. Barnas Sears, General Agent of the Peabody Board, who had resigned the presidency of Brown University in Rhode Island to accept this position, reported to his board on the subject. That board, in 1867, at the time of the establishment of the trust by Mr. Peabody of Massachusetts, included in its membership General Grant, Admiral Farragut, Mr. Hamilton Fish of New York, Mr. George W. Riggs of Washington, Bishop Charles McIlwaine of Ohio, Mr. Robert Winthrop of Massachusetts, and other northern and southern gentlemen equally interested in the welfare of the colored people and the education of all the people in the southern states, the overwhelming majority being from the North. As a result of the board's study of Dr. Sears' report it unanimously adopted in 1874 a resolution reading as follows:

> "The prospects and hopes of the public systems of edu-

Microcard Editions
An Indian Head Company
A Division of Information Handling Services
5500 S. VALENTIA WAY
ENGLEWOOD, COLORADO TEL. NO. 303-771-2600

CARD 18

> cation in the South will receive a serious, if not fatal blow, from any legislation which should make such systems of education maintainable only upon the scheme of 'mixed schools' as the organization requisite for such public education."
> Proceedings of the Peabody Board of Trustees, Volume I, Page 411; Knight, Public School Education in North Carolina, p. 255.

Thus, in North Carolina, while the Fourteenth Amendment was being debated and ratified, and in the years immediately following its adoption, the Carpetbagger, the northern gentleman, the Scalawag and the southern gentleman were in complete agreement on two things: (1) The Fourteenth Amendment did not prevent the state from establishing separate schools for the white children and the Negro children; (2) The establishment and continuation of such separate schools was necessary and desirable.

The overwhelming majority of North Carolinians today, notwithstanding their respect for this Court, are still in agreement on both of those points. Appendix, Exhibits 6, 7, and 8. That is the reason a decree of this Court wholly acceptable, and even welcomed in another state, may well destroy public education in North Carolina.

A Convention to propose amendments to the North Carolina Constitution of 1868 was called by the General Assembly of 1875, pursuant to a referendum vote of the people. The Convention was composed of 120 delegates. The delegates were almost evenly divided between the two major political parties—Democratic and Republican.

The Journal, page 105, shows a resolution was introduced providing that the children of the white and colored races should be taught in separate public schools.

The Journal, page 130, shows that a substitute resolution was offered in the exact language that was afterwards adopted, viz., "and the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate public schools; but there shall be no discrimination in favor of or to the prejudice of either race." The foregoing was offered as an amendment to Article 9, Section 2, of the State Constitution of 1868 and afterwards in the Convention was known as Ordinance No. 28, and is a part of the present State Constitution.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It is noteworthy that W. T. Faircloth, a delegate from Wayne, and afterwards a Republican Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, and Albion W. Tourgee, a Carpetbagger and Superior Court Judge and a delegate from Guilford County, each voted for the resolution.

The statement is sometimes made that the people of the northern states do not object to the race problem being solved by the southern states, but they want the southern states to start doing something about it. The answer, both in general and so far as schools are concerned, is that North Carolina started doing something about it in 1868 and has continued to do something about it for 86 years. The record of the separate schools of North Carolina in those years is as follows:

PUBLIC SCHOOL ENROLLMENT

(Source: Superintendent of Public Instruction of North Carolina.)

YEAR	WHITE		NEGRO
	Population of School Age (6-20 years)	Enrolled In Public Schools	Population of School Age (6-20 years)	Enrolled In Public Schools
1874	242,768	119,083	127,192	55,000
1884	314,293	167,059	189,988	111,239
1895	403,812	245,413	217,437	128,150
1905	469,646	325,290	226,976	148,821
1915	540,410	418,902	260,987	187,448
1925	643,572	559,396	297,911	250,438
1935	759,308	616,314	340,490	276,334
1945	717,390	562,621	331,218	250,205
1951	773,003	636,505	345,280	273,272
1952	774,709	641,081	337,827	273,188
1953	792,043	652,622	339,636	276,401

TEACHERS

(Source: Superintendent of Public Instruction of North Carolina.)

YEAR	NUMBER		ENROLLMENT PER TEACHER		AVERAGE ANNUAL SALARY
	White	Negro	White	Negro	White	Negro
1884	.....	.....	.....	.....	$ 69.58	$ 64.85
1895	.....	.....	.....	.....	75.73	67.19
1905	7,005	2,682	46.4	55.5	148.22	105.10
1915	10,584	3,291	39.6	57.0	285.59	149.66
1925	16,986	5,355	32.9	46.8	835.11	455.41
1935	16,159	6,497	38.1	42.5	620.93	415.31
1945	17,392	7,142	32.4	35.0	1,294.34	1,304.46
1950	19,924	7,567	31.4	35.5	2,535.24	2,628.69
1951	20,560	7,835	31.0	34.9	2,807.74	2,910.26
1952	20,885	8,031	30.7	34.0	.....	.....

HIGH SCHOOL GRADUATES

(Source: Superintendent of Public Instruction of North Carolina.)

YEAR	WHITE	NEGRO
1925	8,246	564
1930	13,457	1,687
1935	18,547	2,826
1940	25,576	4,504
1945	21,981	4,948
1950	24,226	6,259
1951	24,288	6,524
1952	24,930	7,110
1953	26,386	7,848

These accomplishments of a single state's educational program, making use of separate schools for the races, vindicates the wisdom of the agreement reached in 1868 by Carpetbagger, Scalawag, Confederate veteran, and northern phil-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

anthropist on the proposition that if there is any slight denial of individual liberty inherent in the separate school system, it is greatly outweighed by the benefits to all the people from a public school system free from racial hatred and strife, and shows that the chief beneficiaries of this system have been the Negro people.

D.

THE FUTURE OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN NORTH CAROLINA IF IMMEDIATE INTEGRATION IS DIRECTED BY THE COURT

The people of North Carolina know the value of the public school. They also know the value of a social structure in which two distinct races can live together as separate groups, each proud of its own contribution to that society and recognizing its dependence upon the other group. They are determined, if possible, to educate all of the children of the State. They are also determined to maintain their society as it now exists with separate and distinct racial groups in the North Carolina community. They strongly oppose creating conditions in the public schools which tend to amalgamize the white and Negro races.

This Court has never held that the United States Constitution requires any state to educate any child. Neither has this Court ever held that the education of children must be conducted in schools attended by children of both races. In its opinion of May 17, 1954, this Court said only that segregation of children in public schools deprives the children of a minority group of equal educational opportunities, and then only when the segregation is solely on the basis of race.

Clearly, justice demands that a state, which has evolved a public school system in conformity to this Court's previous interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, and which has in good faith floated bond issues for many millions of dollars and invested the proceeds in school properties, be allowed to choose between constitutional alternatives in calmness and after mature deliberation. A court of equity is not required to compel such a state forthwith to revamp its entire public school system under the threat of contempt citations, nor is it required to compel such state to select that alternative which the Court might choose.

The Legislature of North Carolina is the only body which can determine the policy to be followed in North Carolina in this matter. There has been no session of the North Carolina Legislature since the opinion of this Court in these cases was issued. Thus, there is no one now authorized to state what method North Carolina will adopt in order to reach its dual objectives of education for every child and maintenance of racial integrity in accordance with the United States Constitution as now interpreted by this Court.

The people of North Carolina firmly believe that the record of North Carolina in the field of education demonstrates the practicability of education of separate races in separate schools. They also believe that the achievements of the Negro people of North Carolina demonstrate that such an educational system has not instilled in them any sense of inferiority which handicaps them in their efforts to make lasting and substantial contributions to their state. A social order which is the product of three centuries, and a public school system which is the product of one century of conformity to the Constitution as interpreted by this Court and by Congress, cannot be transformed overnight into an entirely different social order and educational system notwithstanding the great respect which the people of North Carolina have for constitutional government and for this Court.

At least the following dangers will result in North Carolina from a decree requiring immediate intermixture of white and Negro children in the public schools throughout North Carolina: (1) Public schools may be abolished; (2) If the public schools are not abolished, the presence in the same classroom of white children and Negro children may well bring about daily confusion, physical conflicts, ridicule of one group by another, and other conditions which will make it difficult for children to study and teachers to teach; (3) If public schools are not abolished, parents financially able to do so may send their children to private schools, and public schools will come to be regarded as a dole to paupers, repulsive to everyone, black or white, having that pride and self respect essential to good citizenship in a democracy; (4) Conflicts in the schoolroom, on the playground, and between parents and teachers may lead to racial bitterness in a community and bring to North Carolina the bloody race riots which have disgraced cities and states where justifiable racial pride among both Negroes and white people has been ignored.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

That these are not figments of imagination, but are clear and present dangers is the opinion of the overwhelming majority of North Carolina school superintendents (Appendix, Exhibits 6 and 7) and North Carolina police officers (Appendix, Exhibit 8).

E.

DIVERSE CONDITIONS WITHIN NORTH CAROLINA

(a) Distribution of Negro Population.

According to the United States Census of 1950, almost exactly one-fourth of North Carolina's population of 4,061,929 are Negroes. Approximately 30,000 are Indians, for whom the State now maintains schools separate and apart from either the schools for white children or the schools for Negro children. The racial loyalties of the Indians of North Carolina are as strong as those of either of the other races, perhaps stronger. The Indians will be as resentful of any compulsory integration of their children with the children of the other races as will be the people of either the white or the Negro race. The overwhelming majority of the white people of North Carolina are of English or Scotch descent and are native-born North Carolinians. The absence in North Carolina of sizable minorities of white people of non-English origins results in a race consciousness and a race pride among the people of North Carolina much more clearly defined than that to be found in states with large metropolitan areas populated by many racial and subracial groups.

However, the one million Negroes and three million white people in North Carolina are not scattered evenly throughout the State. See Appendix, Exhibit 2. In the extreme western part of the State there are relatively few Negroes. The 1950 census shows that Graham County, for example, has 6,665 white residents and only 10 Negroes.* At the other extreme is Northampton County, in the northeastern part of the State, with 18,189 Negroes and only 10,182 white residents. There are nine counties in North Carolina (Northampton, Warren, Hertford, Bertie, Halifax, Hoke, Gates, Edgecombe, and Martin) which have more Negro residents than white residents. Eight of these are contiguous and lie in the northeastern part of the State next to the Virginia border, the ninth (Hoke) being near the South Carolina border in the south central portion of the State. On the other hand, there are twenty-seven counties in the State in which the Negro population is less than 10% of the total. These counties are mountain counties in the far western portion of the State with the exception of Randolph County, in the Piedmont area, and Dare County, on the coast. Twenty-one counties, most of which lie in the Piedmont section, which is the most industrialized part of the State, have Negro populations varying from 10% to 25% of the total, and forty-three counties, lying principally in the east and central portions of the State, have Negro populations varying from 25% to 50% of the total.

While the proportion of Negro children and white children enrolled in the public schools does not follow precisely the division of the total population by counties, obviously the far western counties of North Carolina have very few Negro school children in their schools, the Piedmont counties have more, the eastern and southern counties have even more, and the greatest enrollment of Negro children in the public

---

* The census appears to be in error at this point, since inquiry of officials of Graham County discloses that there are no Negroes residing in that county and none have resided there for many years, if ever.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

schools occurs in Hoke County and in the eight northeastern counties of Northampton, Warren, Hertford, Bertie, Halifax, Gates, Edgecombe, and Martin.

It is not correct to assume that a county in which there are but a few Negroes will be a county in which there is little race consciousness, or that the county in which there are many Negroes is a county in which there are dangerous racial tensions and antipathies under the present social structure and school organization. The scarcity of Negroes in a given locality may indicate racial antagonisms so deep and severe that the Negroes prefer to live elsewhere. However, it is quite apparent that the intermixing of white children and Negro children in the same schoolroom presents a far different problem in a county where there are 10 Negroes to 6,665 white people from that which it presents in a county in which the two races are equally numerous, or in a county in which there are 18,000 Negroes to 10,000 white people. It could well be that the 10 Negroes in Graham County, for example, might include only one of school age. Granting that the racial loyalties and antipathies are as strong in the one county as in the other, it is obvious that the admission of one Negro child to one of the schools in Graham County would not create the administrative and instructional problems which would arise from an attempt to mix in schools all over Northampton County the children of 18,000 Negroes and 10,000 white people. A decree which would be an annoyance in Graham County could well bring disaster in Northampton.

(b) Retarded children.

In North Carolina, as elsewhere, (Report of the Second Regional Conference, State Board of Education and Chief State School Officers, Atlanta, Georgia, September 5-7, 1954, p. 36) achievement tests and intelligence tests taken by the Negro children and the white children in the same counties show the average white child attained a substantially higher rank than the average Negro child, although there were many instances of individual Negroes who showed remarkably superior intellect and equally superior achievement. No doubt, the explanation of this fact is a complex one. It seems certain that the explanation goes far beyond the schoolroom since, as shown above, the Negro children in North Carolina have been receiving their training in the schools from higher paid teachers than have the white children. Whatever the explanation, the fact remains.

A study of the ages of the children in the North Carolina schools in the year 1949-1950, the last year for which such figures are available shows that in the elementary schools 1.69% of the white children in school were under the normal age for their respective grades, 80.84% were of normal age for their grades, 10.71% were one year over age, 4.47% two years over age, 1.59% three years over age, 0.52% four years over age, and 0.18% five years over age. Among the Negro children, 3.42% were under age, only 62.63% were of normal age, 15.70% were one year over age, 9.18% were two years over age, 4.99% three years over age, 2.45% four years over age, and 1.63% five years over age. Thus, one white child out of six was retarded, as compared with one Negro child out of three. See, State School Facts, published by the North Carolina Department of Public Instruction, January, 1952.

The same study shows that in the high schools 4.31% of the white children were under normal age as compared with 8.82% of the Negroes under normal age. 78.70% of the white children were normal age for their respective grades whereas only 57.87% of the Negro children were of normal age for their respective grades. 11.94% of the white children were one year over age as compared with 18.64% of the Negro children who were one year over age. 3.69% of the white children and 8.89% of the Negro children were two years over age. 1.01% of the white children and 3.94% of the Negro children were three years over age. 0.24% of the white children and 1.31% of the Negro children were four years over age. 0.11% of the white children and 0.53% of the Negro children were five years over age. Thus, in high school also, one white child out of six was retarded as compared with one Negro child out of three.

Obviously, it would create more numerous and more serious administrative and instructional difficulties to put in the same classrooms with white children the thousands of Negro children in Northampton County, one-third of whom are retarded, than it would cause to put into the classrooms of Graham County a single Negro child or even two Negro children, even if both of them should happen to be in the retarded one-third.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(c) Urban and Rural Distribution of Negroes.

Not only are the counties and sections of North Carolina different in the matter of the ratio of the Negro population to the total population, but they also differ in that the eastern half of the State, in which the overwhelming preponderance of the Negro population resides, is predominately an agricultural area. It is in this section primarily that the farming is done by the tenant farming system. In these eastern counties of the State the Negro population is primarily a rural population. Likewise, the white population of these counties is primarily a rural or small town population. In the Piedmont area, with its relatively smaller Negro population, manufacturing is concentrated. Farms, generally, are operated by the owner and his family. The Negro population of these counties tends to concentrate in cities and towns. In Southern cities and towns, just as in the North, residential segregation prevails apart from law. In these cities and towns there are schools now attended separately by white and Negro children. The Negro school building is located in the Negro section of the town. The white school building is located in the white section of the town. Normal geographic school districting will normally result in a continuation of separate schools for the separate races in such a community. There will, of course, be a few families of one race living in an area generally occupied by families of the other race. Most of these may be expected to prefer to cross the district line so as to attend the school they have been attending, and this would not violate any decision heretofore made by this Court. But even if such voluntary crossing of the district line is not permitted, the problem will not be nearly so difficult from an administrative and instructional point of view in cities and towns as it will be in rural communities, because in the cities and towns it will be akin to that in counties with only a few Negroes. Therefore, the problem of mixing white children and Negro children in the public schools in North Carolina will present a far different problem in the industrial Piedmont area from that presented in the rural, agricultural, eastern half of the State, where the overwhelming majority of North Carolina's one million Negroes live. A decree which would be an irritant in a city could completely disrupt the rural schools of the same county.

F.

THE NORTH CAROLINA SCHOOL BUS SYSTEM

The opinions expressed by school superintendents and police officers (Appendix, Exhibits 6, 7 and 8) indicate that the mixture of the races in school busses is the most difficult problem confronting the school authorities in North Carolina as a result of this Court's opinion of May 17, 1954.

The State of North Carolina in recent years has carried on an intensive program of consolidation of schools for the purpose of improving the quality of the schools and providing a more extensive curriculum. Small rural schools, both elementary and high school, have been merged into large schools, with modern buildings and equipment, offering increased educational advantages to the white and Negro children in rural areas. This has necessitated the transportation of the majority of all the school children in North Carolina by school bus.

The State of North Carolina operates 7,200 public school busses. It transports to and from school each day 452,000 children, which is approximately one-ninth of the total population of the State. Over 6,000 of these busses are driven by high school students. No adult now rides on most of them. Approximately 2,000 are now used for the transportation of Negro children, 5,000 for the transportation of white children, and 85 are used for the transportation of Indian children. Practically every school bus in the State is crowded beyond its normal seating capacity. The busses travel over all kinds of country roads. Children in the first grade and in the high school ride on the same bus. To require that

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Negro children and white children be commingled forthwith on these buses, without adult supervision and police protection, is to invite conflicts on the bus, which will make riding on them so hazardous few parents will consent to their children's using them. This is a substantial danger a court of equity may well consider in formulating its decree.

CONCLUSION

The people of North Carolina have evolved a school system which, while far from the goals they have set for it, is an excellent school system. It is a school system in which children, in all parts of North Carolina and of all races, receive substantially equal opportunities for an education preparing them to assume the responsibilities of citizens under a constitutional government. It is a school system for which there is no presently available substitute in North Carolina. If it is destroyed or seriously impaired, generations of children of North Carolina will be severely handicapped, and the Negro children will be the greater losers.

As Mr. Clifford Dowdey, writing in The Saturday Review, said:

> "It is the gradation, the variation of necessary adjustments, which makes the execution of the Court's decision in the South anything except an abstraction on the road to equality. The human conditioning of environments being what it is, and individual circumstances varying as they do, it would look at this moment as if the historic decision might create historic chaos—unless, in October, when the Court listens to representatives of the locally affected scenes, it truly considers the real problems of the Southern society in which the Negro lives. Otherwise there will be a definite roadblock in the Negro's sorrowful journey toward his mortal dignity and full citizenship."
> Clifford Dowdey, The Saturday Review, October 9, 1954, p. 38.

It is respectfully submitted that in view of the good faith with which the people of North Carolina have evolved their present excellent school system through the sacrifice of four generations, in reliance upon this Court's interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, the people of North Carolina are entitled in simple justice and equity to the entry of such a decree in these cases as will not seriously impair or destroy their public schools.

HARRY McMULLAN
Attorney General of North Carolina

T. WADE BRUTON
Assistant Attorney General of North Carolina

RALPH MOODY
Assistant Attorney General of North Carolina

CLAUDE L. LOVE
Assistant Attorney General of North Carolina

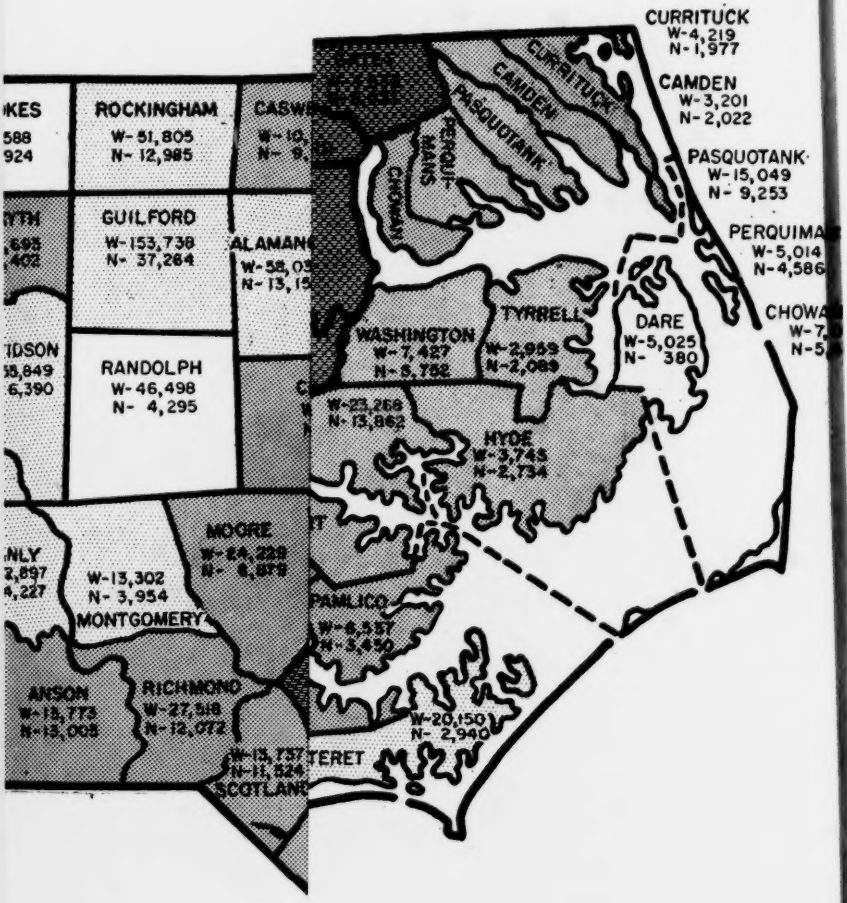
I. BEVERLY LAKE
Assistant Attorney General of North Carolina

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

EXHIBIT 1

'OPULATION B



FOLD OUT TO LARGE TO BE FILMED

EXHIBIT 2

TABLE I

North Carolina Population By Counties And Races, 1950

County	Total Population	White Population	Negro Population	% White	% Negro
Alamance	71,220	58,038	13,159	81.49	18.48
Alexander	14,554	13,521	1,021	92.90	7.02
Alleghany	8,155	7,887	268	96.71	3.29
Anson	26,781	13,773	13,003	51.43	48.55
Ashe	21,878	21,599	277	98.72	1.27
Avery	13,352	13,148	204	98.47	1.53
Beaufort	37,134	23,268	13,862	62.66	37.33
Bertie	26,439	10,628	15,809	40.20	59.79
Bladen	29,703	17,474	12,163	58.83	40.95
Brunswick	19,238	12,204	7,031	63.44	36.55
Buncombe	124,403	109,126	15,228	87.72	12.24
Burke	45,518	42,116	3,383	92.53	7.43
Cabarrus	63,783	54,024	9,735	84.70	15.26
Caldwell	43,352	40,354	2,992	93.08	6.90
Camden	5,223	3,201	2,022	61.29	38.71
Carteret	23,059	20,150	2,904	87.38	12.59
Caswell	20,870	10,942	9,922	52.43	47.54
Catawba	61,794	56,196	5,594	90.94	9.05
Chatham	25,392	17,251	8,135	67.94	32.04
Cherokee	18,294	17,978	290	98.27	1.59
Chowan	12,540	7,072	5,465	56.40	43.58
Clay	6,006	5,939	66	98.88	1.10
Cleveland	64,357	50,284	14,063	78.13	21.85
Columbus	50,621	33,448	16,705	66.08	33.00
Craven	48,823	32,996	15,804	67.58	32.37
Cumberland	96,006	69,131	26,417	72.01	27.52
Currituck	6,201	4,219	1,977	68.04	31.88
Dare	5,405	5,025	380	92.97	7.03
Davidson	62,244	55,849	6,390	89.73	10.27
Davie	15,420	13,267	2,150	86.04	13.94
Duplin	41,074	25,890	15,179	63.03	36.96
Durham	101,639	67,816	33,781	66.72	33.24
Edgecombe	51,634	24,818	26,802	48.07	51.91
Forsyth	146,135	104,693	41,402	71.64	28.33

TABLE I (CONTINUED)

County	Total Population	White Population	Negro Population	% White	% Negro
Franklin	31,341	17,044	14,293	54.38	45.60
Gaston	110,836	95,950	14,850	86.57	13.40
Gates	9,555	4,532	5,021	47.43	52.55
Graham	6,886	6,665	10	96.79	0.15
Granville	31,793	16,946	14,841	53.30	46.68
Greene	18,024	9,634	8,386	53.45	46.53
Guilford	191,057	153,738	37,264	80.47	19.50
Halifax	58,377	25,349	32,988	43.42	56.51
Harnett	47,605	35,107	12,096	73.75	25.41
Haywood	37,631	36,801	826	97.79	2.19
Henderson	30,921	28,851	2,066	93.31	6.68
Hertford	21,453	8,591	12,860	40.05	59.94
Hoke	15,756	6,214	8,778	39.44	55.71
Hyde	6,479	3,745	2,734	57.80	42.20
Iredell	56,303	46,305	9,990	82.24	17.74
Jackson	19,261	17,796	411	92.39	2.13
Johnston	65,906	51,586	14,313	78.27	21.72
Jones	11,004	6,011	4,992	54.63	45.37
Lee	23,522	17,400	6,119	73.97	26.01
Lenoir	45,953	26,131	19,817	56.86	43.12
Lincoln	27,459	23,978	3,479	87.32	12.67
McDowell	25,720	24,279	1,438	94.40	5.59
Macon	16,174	15,813	354	97.77	2.19
Madison	20,522	20,329	188	99.06	0.92
Martin	27,938	13,858	14,077	49.60	50.39
Mecklenburg	197,052	147,079	49,923	74.64	25.33
Mitchell	15,143	15,094	49	99.68	0.32
Montgomery	17,260	13,302	3,954	77.07	22.91
Moore	33,129	24,229	8,879	73.14	26.80
Nash	59,919	34,489	25,405	57.56	42.40
New Hanover	63,272	43,430	19,804	68.64	31.30
Northampton	28,432	10,182	18,189	35.81	63.97
Onslow	42,047	35,365	6,620	84.11	15.74
Orange	34,435	25,779	8,597	74.86	24.97
Pamlico	9,993	6,537	3,450	65.42	34.52
Pasquotank	24,347	15,049	9,253	61.81	38.00
Pender	18,423	9,473	8,897	51.42	48.29

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

TABLE I (CONTINUED)

County	Total Population	White Population	Negro Population	% White	% Negro
Perquimans	9,602	5,014	4,586	52.22	47.76
Person	24,361	15,536	8,657	63.77	35.54
Pitt	63,789	34,273	29,503	53.73	46.25
Polk	11,627	10,118	1,504	87.02	12.94
Randolph	50,804	46,498	4,295	91.52	8.45
Richmond	39,597	27,518	12,072	69.50	30.49
Robeson	87,769	37,490	27,726	42.71	31.59
Rockingham	64,816	51,805	12,985	79.93	20.03
Rowan	75,410	62,538	12,846	82.93	17.03
Rutherford	46,356	40,675	5,678	87.74	12.25
Sampson	49,780	31,468	17,526	63.21	35.21
Scotland	26,336	13,737	11,524	52.16	43.76
Stanly	37,130	32,897	4,227	88.60	11.38
Stokes	21,520	19,588	1,924	91.02	8.94
Surry	45,593	42,984	2,605	94.28	5.71
Swain	9,921	8,370	139	84.37	1.40
Transylvania	15,194	14,442	746	95.05	4.91
Tyrrell	5,048	2,959	2,089	58.62	41.38
Union	42,034	32,544	9,469	77.45	22.53
Vance	32,101	17,488	14,602	54.48	45.49
Wake	136,450	96,409	39,949	70.66	29.28
Warren	23,539	7,901	14,817	33.57	62.95
Washington	13,180	7,427	5,752	56.35	43.64
Watauga	18,342	18,114	226	98.76	1.23
Wayne	64,267	37,142	27,090	57.79	42.15
Wilkes	45,243	42,521	2,707	93.98	5.98
Wilson	54,506	32,462	22,036	59.56	40.43
Yadkin	22,133	21,035	1,097	95.04	4.96
Yancey	16,306	16,121	182	98.87	1.12

Source: Population data from the U. S. Bureau of the Census, 1950.

EXHIBIT 3

TABLE II

NORTH CAROLINA COUNTIES BY PERCENTAGE OF NEGRO POPULATION, 1950

I. Counties with over 50% Negro population

COUNTY	% WHITE	% NEGRO
Northampton	35.81	63.97
Warren	33.57	62.95
Hertford	40.05	59.94
Bertie	40.20	59.79
Halifax	43.42	56.51
Hoke	39.44	55.71
Gates	47.43	52.55
Edgecombe	48.07	51.91
Martin	49.60	50.39

II. Counties with 25% to 50% Negro population

COUNTY	% WHITE	% NEGRO
Anson	51.43	48.55
Pender	51.42	48.29
Perquimans	52.22	47.76
Caswell	52.43	47.54
Granville	53.30	46.68
Greene	53.45	46.53
Pitt	53.73	46.25
Franklin	54.38	45.60
Vance	54.48	45.49
Jones	54.63	45.37
Scotland	52.16	43.76
Washington	56.35	43.64
Chowan	56.40	43.58
Lenoir	56.86	43.12
Nash	57.56	42.40
Hyde	57.80	42.20
Wayne	57.79	42.15
Tyrrell	58.62	41.38
Bladen	58.83	40.95
Wilson	59.56	40.43
Camden	61.29	38.71
Pasquotank	61.81	38.00

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

TABLE II (CONTINUED)

COUNTY	% WHITE	% NEGRO
Beaufort	62.66	37.33
Duplin	63.03	36.96
Brunswick	63.44	36.55
Person	63.77	35.54
Sampson	63.21	35.21
Pamlico	65.42	34.52
Durham	66.72	33.24
Columbus	66.08	33.00
Craven	67.58	32.37
Chatham	67.94	32.04
Currituck	68.04	31.88
Robeson	42.71	31.59
New Hanover	68.64	31.30
Richmond	69.50	30.49
Wake	70.66	29.28
Forsyth	71.64	28.33
Cumberland	72.01	27.52
Moore	73.14	26.80
Lee	73.97	26.01
Harnett	73.75	25.41
Mecklenburg	74.64	25.33

III. Counties with 10% to 25% Negro Population

COUNTY	% WHITE	% NEGRO
Orange	74.86	24.97
Montgomery	77.07	22.91
Union	77.45	22.53
Cleveland	78.13	21.85
Johnston	78.27	21.72
Rockingham	79.93	20.03
Guilford	80.47	19.50
Alamance	81.49	18.48
Iredell	82.24	17.74
Rowan	82.93	17.03
Onslow	84.11	15.74
Cabarrus	84.70	15.26
Davie	86.04	13.94
Gaston	86.57	13.40

TABLE II (CONTINUED)

COUNTY	% WHITE	% NEGRO
Polk	87.02	12.94
Lincoln	87.32	12.67
Carteret	87.38	12.59
Rutherford	87.74	12.25
Buncombe	87.72	12.24
Stanly	88.60	11.38
Davidson	89.73	10.27

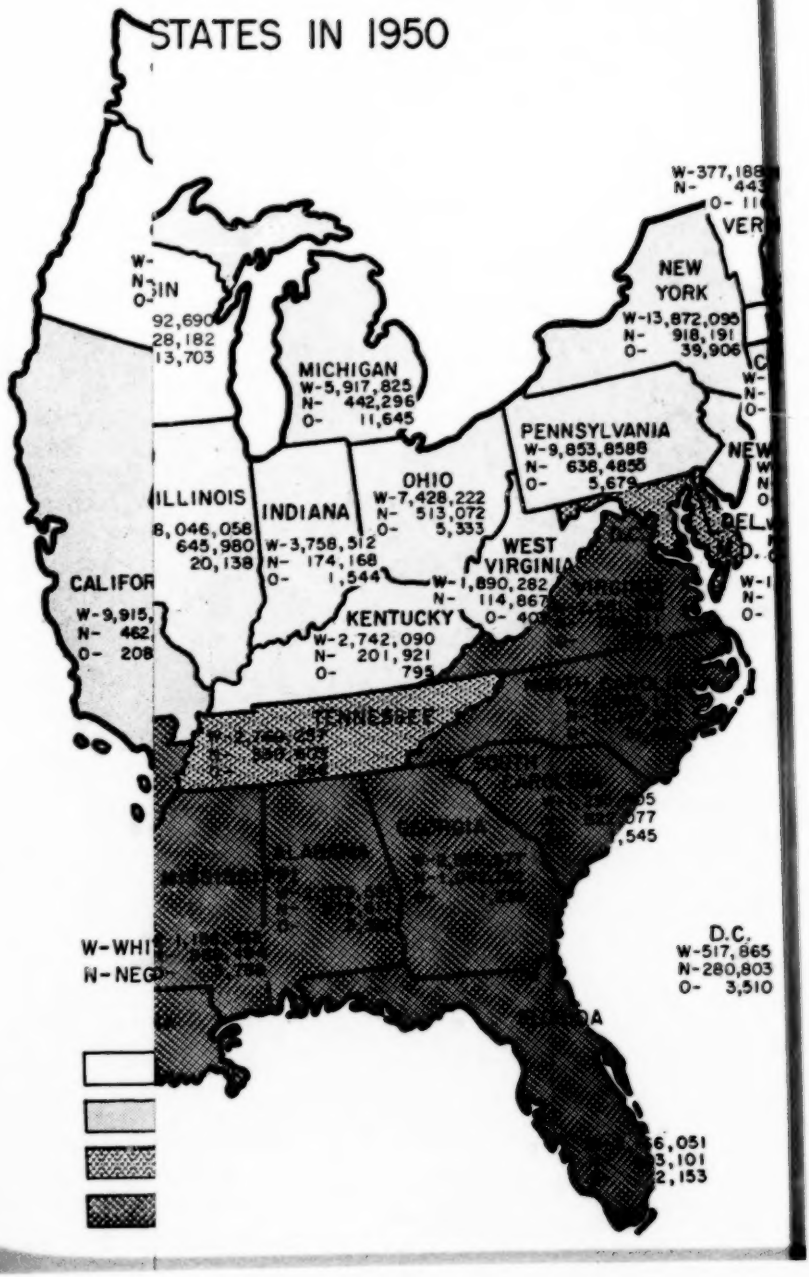
IV. Counties with less than 10% Negro population

COUNTY	% WHITE	% NEGRO
Catawba	90.94	9.05
Stokes	91.02	8.94
Randolph	91.52	8.45
Burke	92.53	7.43
Dare	92.97	7.03
Alexander	92.90	7.02
Caldwell	93.08	6.90
Henderson	93.31	6.68
Wilkes	93.98	5.98
Surry	94.28	5.71
McDowell	94.40	5.59
Yadkin	95.04	4.96
Transylvania	95.05	4.91
Alleghany	96.71	3.29
Haywood	97.79	2.19
Macon	97.77	2.19
Jackson	92.39	2.13
Cherokee	98.27	1.59
Avery	98.47	1.53
Swain	84.37	1.40
Ashe	98.72	1.27
Watauga	98.76	1.23
Yancey	98.87	1.12
Clay	98.88	1.10
Madison	99.06	0.92
Mitchell	99.68	0.32
Graham	96.79	0.15

Source: Population data from the U. S. Bureau of the Census, 1950.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY



FOLD OUT TO LARGE TO BE FILMED

EXHIBIT 5

TABLE III

STATES BY PERCENTAGE OF NEGRO POPULATION, 1950

State	Total Population	% Negro	% White	% Other Races
Mississippi	2,178,914	45.27	54.55	.17
South Carolina	2,117,027	38.83	61.10	.07
District of Columbia	802,178	35.01	64.55	.44
Louisiana	2,683,516	32.88	66.95	.16
Alabama	3,061,743	32.00	67.92	.08
Georgia	3,444,578	30.85	69.11	.04
North Carolina	4,061,929	25.78	73.44	.77
Arkansas	1,909,511	22.34	77.59	.07
Virginia	3,318,680	22.12	77.79	.09
Florida	2,771,305	21.76	78.16	.08
Maryland	2,343,001	16.47	83.44	.09
Tennessee	3,291,718	16.12	83.85	.03
Delaware	318,085	13.71	86.10	.19
Texas	7,711,194	12.68	87.23	.09
Missouri	3,954,653	7.51	92.44	.05
Illinois	8,712,176	7.41	92.35	.23
Michigan	6,371,766	6.94	92.88	.18
Kentucky	2,944,806	6.86	93.12	.02
New Jersey	4,835,329	6.59	93.30	.11
Oklahoma	2,233,351	6.52	91.00	2.48
Ohio	7,946,627	6.45	93.48	.07
New York	14,830,192	6.19	93.54	.27
Pennsylvania	10,498,012	6.08	93.86	.05
West Virginia	2,005,552	5.73	94.25	.02
Indiana	3,934,224	4.43	95.53	.04
California	10,586,223	4.37	93.66	1.97
Kansas	1,905,299	3.84	95.99	.17
Arizona	749,587	3.46	87.32	9.22
Nevada	160,083	2.69	93.64	3.67
Connecticut	2,007,280	2.66	97.26	.07
Rhode Island	791,896	1.76	98.12	.12
Massachusetts	4,690,514	1.56	98.32	.12
Colorado	1,325,089	1.52	97.85	.62
Nebraska	1,325,510	1.45	98.18	.37

TABLE III (CONTINUED)

State	Total Population	% Negro	% White	% Other Races
Washington	2,378,963	1.29	97.37	1.34
New Mexico	681,178	1.23	92.52	6.25
Wyoming	290,529	0.88	97.76	1.36
Wisconsin	3,434,575	0.82	98.78	.40
Oregon	1,521,341	0.76	98.41	.83
Iowa	2,621,073	0.75	99.18	.07
Minnesota	2,982,483	0.47	99.03	.50
Utah	688,862	0.40	98.26	1.34
Montana	591,024	0.21	96.79	3.00
Idaho	588,637	0.18	98.77	1.05
New Hampshire	533,242	0.14	99.82	.04
Maine	913,774	0.13	99.68	.19
Vermont	377,747	0.12	99.85	.03
South Dakota	652,740	0.11	96.29	3.60
North Dakota	619,636	0.04	98.19	1.76

Source: Population data from the U. S. Bureau of the Census, 1950.

EXHIBIT 6

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL AND QUESTIONNAIRE TO COUNTY AND CITY SUPERINTENDENTS OF SCHOOLS WITH TABULATIONS OF ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS FROM 8 TO 18 INCLUSIVE

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION

RALEIGH

October 5, 1954

County and City Superintendents
Greetings:

In the school segregation cases pending for re-argument in the Supreme Court of the United States, beginning December 6, this State has accepted the invitation of the Court to appear amicus curiae and file a brief containing answers suggested by this State to the two questions formulated by the Supreme Court to be considered at that time. The first question is: "Would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice?" The second question is: "May this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

We enclose three copies of a questionnaire which we are sending to county and city superintendents throughout the State as to what may happen at the time steps are taken to compel integration in the public schools, which is necessarily a matter of opinion. We would like to have your opinion, based upon your own knowledge and observations and such information as you have been able to obtain in conference with school and other officials and others in your administrative unit, in answer to the questions contained in this questionnaire, to assist us in presenting our brief and argument in the Supreme Court.

It is important that nothing be done to intensify feelings on this subject. For that reason, we request that you do not discuss this questionnaire with anyone except in a confidential way.

"YES" and "NO" answers are requested to most of the questions in order that we may get results of the questionnaire in composite and tabulative form. Please be sure to furnish these answers if you can with such other and further explanations as you think should be made. Promptness in your reply is extremely important as time is very limited. Please give this your immediate and preferred attention and mail two copies of the questionnaire with your answers by October 11 to Harry McMullan, Attorney General, Raleigh, North Carolina.

There will be no disclosure of the names of the various superintendents answering this questionnaire. The results of the tabulation only will be made public by probably being included in the brief to be filed with the Supreme Court.

Yours very truly,
s/ Chas. F. Carroll
Chas. F. Carroll
State Superintendent Public Instruction
Harry McMullan
Attorney General

QUESTIONS FOR SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS

1. Name of administrative unit: .....
   (county, city)
2. What is the total 1954 enrollment? .....
   a. White enrollment?.....
   b. Indian enrollment?.....
   c. Negro enrollment?.....
3. How many schools are there in your unit?.....
   a. White?.....
   b. Indian?.....
   c. Negro?.....
4. How many teachers and principals in your unit?.....
   a. White?.....
   b. Indian?.....
   c. Negro?.....
5. How many school busses are operated?.....
   a. White?.....
   b. Indian?.....
   c. Negro?.....
6. How many of the schools in your unit, now used exclusively for white children, could accommodate any substantial number of Negro children without displacing any white children?.....
7. How many of the schools in your unit, now used exclusively for Negro children, could accommodate any substantial number of white children without displacing any Negro children?.....
8. In the event the Supreme Court of the United States shall decree in the pending school segregation cases that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice in your county or city administrative unit, and if Negro children in substantial numbers elect to attend the public schools heretofore exclusively operated for white children, do you have reason to believe that white school children and their parents would peacefully accept this decision and attend such mixed schools? (Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—7 No—158 D.K.—1

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.

9. If your answer to Question No. 8 is "No," do you have reason to believe that the attempt to integrate the public schools in your administrative unit will seriously interfere with and impair your ability to conduct these schools for the year 1955-56?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—147 No—13 D.K.—1
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
10. Would immediate mixing of the races in the public schools in your administrative unit cause serious complications in the operation of school busses serving your schools?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—126 No—25 D.K.—1
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
11. In the event of immediate integration of your schools, would you find it practicable to use Negro teachers in mixed classes?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—3 No—162 D.K.—
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
12. In the event of immediate integration of your public schools, would you have any serious difficulties in securing a sufficient number of properly trained white school teachers to teach in mixed schools?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—137 No—23 D.K.—4
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
13. In the event of immediate integration, would you have any reason to believe that the mixing of the races in the public schools of your unit would create serious problems of discipline in these schools?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—150 No—13 D.K.—2
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
14. Would such an integrated program seriously affect the extra-curricular activities in the schools in your administrative unit?

(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—148 No—16 D.K.—1
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.

15. Would, in your opinion, such immediate integration of the races cause parents in large numbers to withdraw their children from such schools?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—142 No—20 D.K.—2
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.

16. Is there such difference in the average attainments between white and Negro children as to seriously impair instruction in mixed schools?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—140 No—22 D.K.—3
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.

17. Would, in your opinion, white children or their parents elect to attend any school heretofore conducted for Negro children?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes— No—165 D.K.—
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.

18. In the event that the Supreme Court should decree that there should be a gradual adjustment brought about from the existing segregated system of public schools to a system not based on color distinction, and provided that sufficient length of time were allowed for such gradual adjustment, would the schools of your unit be better able to cope with the problems presented by such a decision?
(Answer "Yes" or "No") Yes—151 No—9 D.K.—5
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.

Name and Position of person answering this questionnaire:

....
Name Position

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

EXHIBIT 7

A

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 8 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "In the event the Supreme Court of the United States shall decree in the pending school segregation cases that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice in your county or city administrative unit, and if Negro children in substantial numbers elect to attend the public schools heretofore exclusively operated for white children, do you have reason to believe that white school children and their parents would peacefully accept this decision and attend such mixed schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(4427) N(26)
"I believe that the majority would accept the decision reluctantly, but a very substantial minority would fight such a decision to the limit."

W(6724) N(1827)
"A large portion of the people would probably tolerate mixing of children but there would be strong protests, much unhappiness, and many disturbing incidents. A small portion of the people would not accept the decision at all unless force were used."

W(3281) N(811)
"If a large number of Negro children should elect to attend any one white school here, the white people would rebel. We have one situation here where Negroes, because of transporttation, would go in large numbers to a white school."

W(1051) N(441)
"Integration would not be unanimously accepted. Should the county take the Negroes from our attendance area, the unit would be seriously affected unless other children were assigned to this area."

W(2301) N(1702)
"There would be riots, boycotts, and other serious disturbances. It will take a minimum of 25 years to bring about desegregation."

W(2262) N(1835)
"Individual members (all of them) on our School Board say that it will not work here."

W(2432) N(1661)
"The health and moral standards and intellectual abilities are inferior in our Negro children to those of the white children."

W(3534) N(646)
"Our people, in my opinion, would rebel against any immediate plan of integration. Those inclined to accept the mandate of the Supreme Court would be overwhelmed by the others."

W(1710) N(1208)
"If children attend the schools nearest to where they live there will be a minimum of trouble."

W(2256) N(1506)
"Violence will be inevitable and swift."

W(1523) N(1455)
"Parents have expressed their opinion very freely on this subject, and very few are willing to send their children to nonsegregated schools."

W(3375) N(2733)
"All schools are accommodating from 25 to 50 per cent more students than their reasonable capacity; therefore, no room for additions."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1795) N(194)
"The change factor here, if nothing more, would be sufficient to prohibit peaceful acceptance. I do not mean to say that there would be acceptance otherwise."

W(3256) N(1455)
"Children and parents would not peacefully accept this decision and attend mixed schools."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"From all that I have heard in this county, practically nobody is of the opinion that the Supreme Court's decision can be put into effect at this time."

W(17,926) N(7984)
"Judging by the telephone calls and the conversations provoked, I expect some very unhappy developments."

W(1878) N(0)
"I believe a majority would comply reluctantly, not peacefully, however."

W(8578) N(3442)
"My only reason for answering No is based on the number and frequency of questions asked by white parents about the Supreme Court decision."

W(2117) N(1172)
"In my opinion any considerable mixing of the races in the public schools here would bring complete chaos to the educational program in the community."

W(2398) N(875)
"Judging by what is happening elsewhere."

W(2812) N(1868)
"Precedent: Threatened action of patrons of one of our schools few years ago when one child of reputed and alleged mixed blood sought entrance."

W(2603) N(7753)
"I do not believe that children and parents in this area, which is so heavily populated by Negroes, would accept peacefully a decision that they must attend mixed schools. Neither race is prepared or willing to accept the decision."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"This question should be expanded to include Negroes and Indians and by the very nature of the parents and children they absolutely would refuse to accept the idea of mixed schools. Our problem is tri in nature, or even actually quadrangular because we have whites, Negroes, Indians and a fourth group that neither race will claim, and the very instinctive nature of the people will make this possible task prohibitive."

W(5120) N(1683)
"Definitely No.—Our white patrons would strongly protest entrance of Negro children into the white schools. Many of them would keep their children out of school. A few would allow their children to attend with reluctance."

W(3295) N(1900)
"Many of our parents have indicated that they are seeking to get the compulsory school attendance law repealed in the next session of the General Assembly to enable them to teach or have their children taught at home. One and two teacher private schools will appear throughout our communities. If force is attempted to integrate rapidly, violence will occur, in my opinion."

W(6253) N(50)
• "There will be considerable resentment."

W(1132) N(118)
"Many people, because of tradition and prejudice, will not

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

peacefully submit to mixed schools."

W(3901) N(777)
"Rural white and textile whites will not easily mix with Negroes."

W(2795) N(1111)
"I believe that this change would be too drastic to be accepted without serious dissatisfaction and without challenge to constituted authority."

W(6487) N(2276)
"We have only one white school with any space left. There is a much more modern Negro school one block from it."

W(696) N(157)
"We have many people who would accept integration, but we have many who would violently oppose it. This latter group would be composed almost wholly of people who could not send students to private schools."

W(3228) N(2515)
"Recent experiences in border states, where there is but a sprinkling of Negro students, indicate the strife that will accompany integration in the South. Problems that have arisen in the border states would doubtless be greatly multiplied in the South."

W(1408) N(2212) I(230)
"Almost all white children would stay at home. Most of the Negro children would do likewise. I have heard Negro parents say they would not allow their children to attend mixed schools as trouble would arise."

W(3494) N(4163)
"An example of the attitude of the people occurred last winter in the School District. I am not proud of it, but it did happen. The colored high school at ..... had a good glee club, and the colored principal asked the white principal about bringing them over to the white school to sing at the chapel program. The invitation was extended to the colored school and the white principal made an announcement to the children about the program. The children thought nothing about it, but the parents descended on the principal and school board almost in mob violence; so the invitation had to be retracted. This occurrence opened my eyes, and I am just giving you this as an example of what did occur. I think it would be much worse should integration be attempted."

W(552) N(371)
"I have not heard any parent express a willingness to send their children to school where the Negroes are attending."

W(1755) N(1030)
"No one has expressed himself in favor of integration, but the general consensus is against integration. Some high school children have been sent to private schools this year."

W(2460) N(2597)
"I do not know whether you would call it prejudice, but under present conditions the white people will not submit peacefully to this change."

W(3270) N(409)
"Answer based on belief that some of our people would object strongly enough to create a difficult problem."

W(3919) N(2223)
"Practically all of our people feel that such a decision would not be accepted peacefully."

W(9127) N(257)
"Some of the parents might accept it, but others would not under any circumstances, law or no law. Some of these mountain people have definite opinions. Even some of the best informed people have expressed a very bitter attitude."

W(3885) N(74)
"My opinion is that although there might not be any violence

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

there would be considerable disturbance which would result in a very unhappy and unhealthy situation, especially for the Negro children."

W(9783) N(2305)
"During the month of August we had telephone calls from parents protesting the mixing. People thought the order was effective for the current year."

W(4224) N(66)
"Probably a portion of the parents and children in the urban areas would accept the Negroes, but I doubt that those in the rural areas would."

W(2774) N(3036)
"Expressions already made indicate there would be intense feelings and disturbances."

W(1826) N(1190)
"Our adults would not peacefully accept the decision because: 1. They feel that the Negroes are as well housed as the white children. 2. They think that the Negro children are insanitary and unhygienic. 3. They think that such a social disturbance should not have been thrust upon them so suddenly. 4. They consider the decision an infringement of local and state rights."

W(2905) N(798)
"I think there would be ranging from some to quite considerable oral protests and complaints. If properly presented by school authorities I do not believe there would be any physical violence. Some, but not a considerable number of white children be held out, withdrawn or strike. This I believe would be temporary."

W(2297) N(397)
"This problem would perhaps not be quite so serious in ..... as in some other places, due to the fact that our Negro population is small and concentrated entirely in one district."

W(1937) N(928)
"Neither parents nor students are ready or willing to have mixed schools."

W(1139) N(750)
"I base my answer upon comments and statements I have heard white people make."

W(7416) N(148)
"In view of the small number of Negro children in this county, resistance might be less violent than in other counties."

W(4165) N(3107)
"The attitude of the majority of the people is one of watchful waiting. Insofar as I can tell there is no desire on the part of the great majority of the Negro pupils and parents to have the schools integrated. There is a determination, quiet at present on the part of a big majority of the white people to maintain separate schools regardless of the cost."

W(1130) N(811)
"I am of the opinion that parents of white children will do some drastic before they will allow their children to be immediately integrated with Negro children."

W(2577) N(148)
"Only one white elementary school in my unit would ever be involved. Some of the parents and some of the children would resist such a move just as they have in Washington, D. C.; Ohio; Maryland; and other places where it has been tried."

W(4068) N(27)
"Some parents would accept the decision peacefully, perhaps the majority. A few would organize resistance and would take their children out of school. Many parents would want to send the children to schools in the county that would be free of Negroes."

W(9983) N(4822)
"The spirit of harmony, developed since the days of Aycock,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

was rudely disrupted by a racketeer group that started an 'equalization' suit 4 years ago. They found the schools so nearly equal in facilities that an advisor stated 'you can lose this suit.' It was withdrawn from Court but not before this group had succeeded in arousing racial bitterness and distrust. In a speech to county officials this group boasted that 'regardless of how equal we find facilities in your county —you haven't a chance to win.' They boasted that the Court was with them all down the line. Confidence in Federal justice was severely shaken."

W(1778) N(619)
"In my opinion, this would result in an armed riot with possible blood shed on both sides."

W(3250) N(1288)
"It was rumored that on September 13, 1954, Negro children would go to the ..... School for enrollment. White people from all over ..... County were at or near the school on that date. Patrolmen, the sheriff, and policemen were present. No Negro children appeared and nothing happened but the feeling was running high for three days. The news had spread to all parts of the county and many were ready to come to the place of the scene if needed. I am sure that violence would have occurred if any Negro children had shown up for entrance. Many parents kept their children at home for these three days for fear of a riot. At our request, we had no publicity in the papers about this."

W(1835) N( ) I(393)
"Our people have provided equal schools for both colored and white and they feel that it is best for the white and colored children to go to their own schools."

W(3388) N(329)
"We have six white schools in ..... County. Two of these schools, ... and ..... school districts have no Negro children. Negroes are not allowed to move into these two communities. Our ..... school would have 55 Negro children, and there is an unwritten law in the ..... school district that does not permit the sun to set on a Negro in that community. Our ..... school would have 75 Negro children and the entire community of one thousand whites are strongly opposed. Our ..... school would have 30 Negro children, strongly opposed by the whites. The rest of our 329 Negro children enrolled in ..... County would be enrolled in the ..... school in which our one Negro school is located. That would place a total of 169 in the ..... School. Not a single person in the ..... community has stated they would go along with integration."

W(1831) N(235)
"We believe both races would be highly resentful."

W(1787) N(1575)
"Many citizens tell me that it can never happen here. The disturbances which are occurring in Delaware; Baltimore; Maryland; Washington, D. C.; and other places seem to indicate that integration can be accomplished only by force."

W(3738) N( )
"I believe there will be incidents which could be serious, particularly if complete integration is attempted suddenly."

W(4781) N(715)
"Geographical location of Negro children, with some few exceptions, would make the Negro school the logical one for them to attend."

W(2272) N(2638)
"Great disturbances would occur."

W(1000) N(675)
"I am afraid integration will bring about a great deal of trouble to this community which now has splendid race relations."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1270) N(1090)
"My opinion is based upon comments of parents and high school pupils."

W(638) N(721)
"If you think other areas have had a rough time, you don't know anything as to what would happen here."

W(6468) N(4337)
"The situation in Washington, Maryland, and Delaware is only a slight breeze compared to the storm we shall have here. It is my opinion that there will be bloodshed."

W(1571) N(2236)
"Because of recent remarks and definite stands on this question by all white parents and citizens in this community with exception of a few ministers."

W(2694) N(1492)
"Those parents and school students who have talked to me have expressed opposition to having the children of Negro and white parents attend the same school."

W(1821) N(428)
"I believe that it would take time. However, I do not believe we would have any Negroes who would want to change unless outside persons interferred."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"It is my opinion that white children and white parents will not accept school attendance in the same buildings in ..... County."

W(3137) N(2210)
"I believe there will be trouble."

W(7175) N(6916)
"Time for public opinion to adjust itself to integration will be necessary and that will take more than one, or two, or three years."

W(13,996) N(1604)
"Remember the ..... case. In certain sections of the county it will be worse. If the local School Board, the State School Board and the State as a whole couldn't operate buses at ....., how can they keep them going this time?"

W(2125) N(15) I(113)
"Parents have expressed their feelings on this matter and say they will not allow their children to attend public school with the colored people."

W(8112) N(2177)
"All answers have been given after consultation with Board of Education and District School Committeemen."

W(3330) N(2681)
"Our hope is in 'schools of their choice.' We have outlined new boundaries and in each case it will be a ratio of 95 to 5. We suggest the minority attend the school of their choice."

W(2629) N(953)
"The feeling on the part of our school patrons is that excellent facilities have already been provided in the Negro school to take care of their needs. For the most part, our Negro citizens live in the general vicinity of their own school."

W(2342) N(2685)
"It is my considered opinion that the people of ..... County will not peacefully accept integrated schools, now or at any time in the foreseeable future."

W(5284) N(All colored children in the county are transported to a consolidated school in the ..... city Unit.)
"The total colored school population in the county is approximately 150. This would range from 1 to 20 pupils to be distributed in 10 white schools each. The percentage of colored children against the whites in any one school would be so low that it would make a very unfair hardship on the colored child to make the necessary adjustments. The same would apply to transportation problems."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(2409) N(562)
"The patrons of our schools are very determined that we not have mixed schools."

W(6631) N(313)
"They will not accept it. Some will stop their children. In some cases there might be violence."

W(1926) N(533)
"I believe the parents of children in the lower grades would be prone to accept but not those of children in the upper grades. There are many parents, although not in majority, who would not initially accept this arrangement but might in the future."

W(15,551) N(410)
"I do not believe that the decision of the Supreme Court will be willingly followed by the people in this section."

W(1550) N(107)
"Many of our mountain people are given to taking the law into their own hands and settling their emotional differences violently."

W(8661) N(3624)
"There is extreme feeling about this matter on the part of a militant minority—parents and teachers."

W(675) N(764)
"Even discussion of the possibility brings very strong emotional reaction. There was, and still is, strong opposition to those connected with the building program in which approximately 2/3 of the money was spent on Negro schools. With 'better' Negro buildings available there would be a possibility of violent reaction to Negroes attempting to enroll in white schools."

W(2379) N(4469)
"It will take an army to enforce segregation in ..... County at this time. I am afraid that riots and bloodshed will result. You cannot change the customs and traditions of people over night."

W(999) N(1062)
"Integration of the races is not desired by either the whites or the Negroes in this Eastern North Carolina community."

W(5542) N(3469)
"The answer is based on comments made by many patrons."

W(4083) N(2344)
"The people have no idea of accepting a decision of integrating the schools."

W(8331) N(4023)
"Do not feel the public would accept such a change without a strong fight—maybe not then."

B

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 8 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "In the event the Supreme Court of the United States shall decree in the pending school segregation cases that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice in your county or city administrative unit, and if Negro children in substantial numbers elect to attend the public schools heretofore exclusively operated for white children, do you have reason to believe that white school children and their parents would peacefully accept this decision and attend such mixed schools?"

The W, N or I followed by numerals indicate the white,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Negro or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(2796) N(782)
"In my opinion, about 75% of the people, if they had to, would accept it peacefully, even though it would be very distasteful to them. The others will likely withdraw or complain and fight the action—gradually this will likely give way to submission."

W(3669)
"Our situation is not typical of the state. We have only 8 colored children and they are now being transported to ..... They could be absorbed by the schools at ..... without difficulty, if we can trust what the white children say. The P.T.A. of 200 members, expresses this same opinion."

W(1392) N(604)
"We have relative few Negroes in this area, and the majority of the younger people have no racial prejudices."

W(4112) N(55)
"Majority of Negro children prefer to attend the Negro school."

W(14,452) N(2,475)
"Consultation with a substantial number of Negro patrons indicates that very few, if any, Negro children would elect to attend white schools."

W(11,458) N(4,441)
"This I do not know. The problem is unquestionably an explosive one, but our Polio Hospital School has been integrated since 1948. Our newest and finest Hospital is integrated. Our Social Agency Council is non-segregated. A Negro has been elected Councilman, and another Negro has been appointed a member of the Board of Education."

C

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 9 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "If your answer to Question No. 8 is 'No,' do you have reason to believe that the attempt to integrate the public schools in your administrative unit will seriously interfere with and impair your ability to conduct these schools for the year 1955-56?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(2577) N(148)
"As stated above, only one of five elementary schools would ever be affected in any way. At some future date, some of the Negro pupils may ask to come to the white school for certain vocational courses. I do not believe this will happen soon."

W(4068) N(27)
"All the Negro children of the county live in ....., except two of school age. These two would probably want to attend school here. Only one school in our county would have Negro children in it."

W(1679)
"No Negroes in ..... County."

W(638) N(721)
"I think we can handle our local situation with support at state level."

W(2125) N(15) I(113)
"We have only 22 colored students—8 high school and 14 elementary. Elementary children would attend their own school because it is located in the center of the colored district. The colored high school pupils would not care to attend our white high school. They are transported to ..... County to a colored high school there."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(2629) N(953)
"I have little reason to believe that our Negro patrons desire admission into the white schools. It is further my belief that unless outside influence and pressure is brought to bear upon our Negro citizens, little trouble need be anticipated."

W(15,551) N(410)
"We are transporting high school children from ..... County to ..... We have two elementary schools that are as well equipped as the white."

W(4427) N(26)
"The small number of Negro children in the county tends to minimize the scope of the problem. Only one school would be materially affected. If Question 9 is made to apply to that one school only, the answer would be 'yes'."

W(1051) N(441)
"From an administrative standpoint of students, teachers, and principals, no; parents could seriously interfere with our ability to conduct the schools for 1955-56."

W(8578) N(3442)
"Possibly No, if careful study is made in redistricting."

D

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 9 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "If you answer to Question No. 8 is 'No,' do you have reason to believe that the attempt to integrate the public schools in your administrative unit will seriously interfere with and impair your ability to conduct these schools for the year 1955-56?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(6724) N(1827)
"Since Negro children are as well, if not better, provided for in our schools than the white children, we do not see that it would be an advantage to the Negro children to mix them with whites. The people would say that such a decision would be arbitrary and without justification. The intimate and personal relationships which exist between pupils and teachers and between teachers and parents would be broken down. There would be conflicts in the area of social relationships. By mixing children, we would sacrifice many of the things which make for quality of public education for a mythical goal which is commonly termed 'equality'."

W(3281) N(811)
"Unless the process is a very gradual one, the results will be detrimental to both white and colored."

W(2796) N(782)
"Yes, if integration must take place by then. A gradual program begining with the primary children only might be effected without too much serious interference."

W(2262) N(1835)
"Some of the ..... Club members have told that they simply will not allow their children to attend school with Negroes."

W(2432) N(1661)
"Any abrupt change would seriously interfere in operation of our schools."

W(2373) N(4419)
"If many Negro children entered the difference would create a great problem."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(9619) N(7122)
"We should have more time for our folks to become emotionally ready for integration in the public schools."

W(3534) N(646)
"The most popular candidate for our current race for school trustees is an outspoken, radical opponent of integration, even though he has done very little for our schools in the past and has never been actively affiliated with school progress."

W(1710) N(1208)
"We have no extra classroom space."

W(2256) N(1506)
"Attendance will fall off very sharply as well-to-do parents send children to private schools. Truancy will become a very great problem—other parents will not try hard to make children go to school."

W(1523) N(1455)
"Many white parents have said they would not send their children to integrated schools. Negroes have told us they would keep their children at home rather than risk having them get into trouble with white children or parents. Another problem would be objections to using Negro teachers to teach white pupils. Very few white parents would tolerate this situation. Children in this unit usually offer no discipline problem, but I do not believe the Negro teacher could handle white children."

W(3494) N(4163)
"I think that it would mean that only the Negro children would attend the public schools. From the experience noted above, it is evident that the white people do not intend to go with Negroes. The Negroes will go to the white schools if they are ordered to do so, though I do not think many of them really want to go to the white schools. If integration is ordered, it is my sincere opinion that it will mean the end of the public school system. I do not think that I would have the nerve or the fortitude to withstand the embarrassments and insults that would be hurled at me. I think that the strain will take its toll of superintendents."

W(552) N(371)
"You can not administer a school system without the support of the majority of the people. In this instance, it appears that all the white people and 98% of the Negroes of this county are opposed to integration."

W(6211) N(1837)
"..... County recently—the last 4 years—has gone 'all out' to bring the building program and equipment up to, or to surpass, that provided for the white race. The County now has only 3 Negro Schools:
1. ..... with 24 elem. teachers and 11 H.S. teachers
2. .....with 12 elem. teachers
3. ..... with 10 elem. teachers
Approximately $515,000 has been put in these buildings with equipment in the last 2 years. The white race will feel that the Negro race has as good as they have, and that the Negro race should be satisfied with their own schools—that both races would thus be better off with separate schools."

W(1755) N(1030)
"Some petitions outside of school circles have been circulated against integration. It is not general knowledge but one such meeting (against integration) has been held."

W(2460) N(2597)
"I just would not know how to suggest the mixing of the races in this county with any peace."

W(3665) N(22)
"Considering the fact that we have only a small number of Negro students, I find considerable feeling against integration."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(9127) N(257)
"Having only a small number makes the problem even more difficult. It would not be safe for the minority group. As we are situated, there would not be over fifty colored children in any one school. These in school with several hundred white children would be in danger for a long time to come. We have already had evidence of this by children on buses passing each other clashing. It would be bad for even the colored children."

W(1987) N(1303)
"The situation resulting would be disastrous."

W(9783) N(2305)
"The pattern set by schools in the states north of our state will likely to be followed in North Carolina."

W(2774) N(3036)
"In order to conduct schools properly any administration would need a large percentage of cooperation from parents and pupils. We would not have this!"

W(2297) N(397)
"At the present time every classroom is filled and any integration would simply mean the swapping of pupils as between the races."

W(1937) N(928)
"Absenteeism, strikes and riots would be the order of the day."

W(3273) N(875)
"All my energies will be taken up keeping the peace."

W(2603) N(7753)
"It is my opinion that an attempt to integrate the public schools in this administrative unit would prevent the operation of schools in the year 1955-56. There would be such widespread disorder, and perhaps even violence, as to cause operation of schools to be impossible."

W(4548) N(916)
"Definitely—all schools in our units are filled to capacity or overflowing. Any transfer of pupils would seriously affect those schools having increases. For example, our schools in the eastern part of our unit have no Negro population. Parents now living in our more thickly populated centers have said they would move to the eastern section. This would create a demand on the limited facilities of those small schools that we could not care for."

W(2812) N(1868)
"Yes—emphatically."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"I believe this answer to be totally unbiased, that neither myself nor any living human being can conduct our schools on an integrated or partially on an integrated basis for the school year 1955-56 and I believe if it is a decision of the Supreme Court that this be commenced within the foreseeable future, our only alternative would be to close the doors of every school. The racial lines are drawn by the very inherent nature of our people and certainly these barriers cannot be removed, regardless of the efforts that may be exerted by the Supreme Court, local school board or local school people."

W(5120) N(1683)
"It would probably result in reduced appropriations on the local level. It might slow down our building program. It would reduce attendance. It would cause general confusion. There might be a reign of terror. Such an attempt would be loaded with the explosive ingredients of the atom."

W(3295) N(1900)
"In the school districts where the Negro pupils exceed the white pupils in number, the cultural, moral, and general

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

educational achievement of the Negro pupils is less than that of the white pupils and less than that of Negro pupils in districts where they constitute a small percentage of the total pupil population. In my opinion the white parents in those districts where Negro children are more numerous than white children will not send their children to integrated schools next year. Attempts to use force will, in my opinion, create violence. Some program to provide gradual integration spread out over a period of many years seems essential to maintain a semblance of efficiency in public schools."

W(1132) N(118)
"Time spent in the solution of problems of integration, the loss of morale, and the loss of a high degree of the public support of schools, would certainly interfere with the successful operation of the schools."

W(6253) N(50)
"People here have not been able to convince themselves that this should be done."

W(1878)
"But I do not believe it would create an impossible situation."

W(755) N(522)
"I believe that an attempt to integrate the public schools in this year for the 1955-56 year would result in such an emotional reaction that the normal conduct of the schools would be practically impossible."

W(17,926) N(7,984)
"Too often people are saying 'See what is happening in Delaware, Maryland, Ohio and West Virginia'."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"While I cannot predict with any great degree of certainty as to what will take place, I am positive in my thinking that there will be rebellion, and that it will take years to overcome the conditions that will cause such. If rebellion comes, and there are serious consequences, it may take years to overcome the results of such consequences."

W(3256) N(1455)
"Many parents have expressed themselves that they will remove their children from school."

W(1795) N(194)
"At present—with the advice of architects, professional School Survey persons and our School Board—together with all available money, we will not have sufficient white classroom space in 1955-56 under our present program."

W(3901) N(777)
"Integration will be difficult at any time. With all white and Negro school buildings now crowded, mixing the races with pupils necessarily thrown together in crowded conditions would seriously increase difficulty of integrating."

W(2795) N(1111)
"The emotional climate of the integrated schools would make it difficult to administer them effectively, in my opinion."

W(6487) N(2276)
"Very few of our parents of white students are ready to accept integration. The citizens living in areas where the average income is low, and where there are Negro residential sections, seem to harbor more resentment on mixing the races than better informed parents in higher economic areas."

W(696) N(157)
"I think attendance would be seriously impaired, that community-school relationships would be completely disrupted, and that student discipline might be destroyed."

W(3228) N(2515)
"Schools accomplish results through a co-operative effort with the community in which they are located. Arguments and strife which would doubtless accompany integration would obviously set our school program back many years and destroy much of what has been accomplished in improved race relations of recent years."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1408) N(2212) I(230)
"Not only during the year 1955-56, but all during the foreseeable future. Our people have been most cautious and conservative in their statements. But it needs only an overt act to blow things up. A good illustration of the way our people feel. This week, a prominent citizen made this statement. "Just last week I guaranteed a $93.00 hospital bill for my daughter's cook. For some reason the Welfare Dept. could not help her. I didn't want her to die even though I had never seen her but one time. I didn't mind helping her out, but I'll be damned if my grand children are going to school with her children."

W(7416) N(148)
"The people of this county would not accept integration in 1955-56."

W(4165) N(3107)
"If the situation described in No. 8 should develop it would mean that for every Negro pupil admitted to a now white school that an equal number of white pupils would be forced to attend a now Negro school. This would lead to boycotts, demonstrations or perhaps worse. A militant police program of enforcement would be required for a number of years. Educational opportunities for both races would suffer."

W(1130) N(811)
"I don't believe that an integrated school can be conducted in this unit now, nor for years to come."

W(9983) N(4822)
"(1) Negro schools are organized to take care of their racial needs, e.g. bright, average and low mentality groups are given courses of study quite different in academic levels. Integration would call for a drastic change of this organization very detrimental to the Negro.

(2) The white schools would either have to lower their standards or fill our primary grades with over-age Negro children. (A chart showing this situation is available.)

(3) At the high school level at least 40% of the Negro students would be dropped according to even the lowest provision of adjusted courses in the white school.

(4) The difference in attitudes, accent, viewpoints, rate of physical growth, mentality, or in other words, Race, makes the experiment one unprecedented in history. Egypt integrated her peasants with about the same percentage of Negro that we have. They, however, did this over a period of many centuries, producing the modern fellaheen."

W(1778) N(619)
"I do not believe that we could operate the schools at all with integrated classes during the 1955-1956 school year."

W(1571) N(2236)
"With the large number of Negro children in this county and the attitude of the vast majority of white citizens against integrated schools, no one will be able to conduct our schools satisfactorily, if at all. There would be 'violent reaction' to any move to integrate ..... County Schools."

W(6468) N(4337)
"It will be impossible to have such schools or to administer such schools. The Army would experience trouble in conducting such schools."

W(1270) N(1090)
"Most of the people I have talked with do not believe the schools should be mixed."

W(1000) N(675)
"The impact will be too great. No decision can change the customs and feelings of people which have been a part of them for years in so short a time."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(2272) N(2638)
"Public relations and the resistance of white patrons, pupils and teachers to integration would make administration an almost impossible task."

W(3738) N( )
"This answer is given with the understanding that schools would be seriously affected and my ability to administer them likewise affected if complete integration is to be attempted in toto and without such being done gradually."

W(1787) N(1575)
"In some schools there would not be classroom space if segregation is abolished and Negro children admitted to schools previously operated for white children only. If the Negro high school students now attending the ..... county ..... School at ..... are integrated at ....., there would not be classrooms for them."

W(1831) N(235)
"Both races will object with vigor. Many children will quit school. Many others will be in and out so much that it will be most difficult to conduct a satisfactory program."

W(3388) N(329)
"The people in ..... County will not accept an integrated public school system. It just won't work here. The ratio percentage of Negro children to white children is only about 8%, but this fact hasn't meant anything to the average citizen when I attempted to explain that our Negro school child problem was quite simple as compared with other areas in North Carolina, and more especially the deep South."

W(3250) N(1288)
"Our school busses and our classrooms are crowded. For the school year 1955-1956, we would be faced with an impossibility."

W(999) N(1062)
"The trouble that is now being experienced in Ohio, West Virginia, Delaware and the District of Columbia is indicative of the feeling that exists over this matter, and the feeling in Eastern North Carolina where we have almost equal numbers of whites and Negroes is even more intense than it is in these border and Northern states."

W(2379) N(4469)
"It will take an army to enforce segregation in ..... County at this time. I am afraid that riots and bloodshed will result. You cannot change the customs and traditions of people over night."

W(675) N(764)
"Even discussion of the possibility brings very strong emotional reaction. There was, and still is, strong opposition to those connected with the building program in which approximately 2/3 of the money was spent on Negro schools. With 'better' Negro buildings available there would be a possibility of violent reaction to Negroes attempting to enroll in white schools."

W(8661) N(3624)
"Many teachers would quit (white). Attendance would be poor (white and Negro). Antagonistic feelings and attitudes would seriously impair the program."

W(1550) N(107)
"I personally believe that should the action be state-wide, we would not have too much trouble."

W(1821) N(428)
"The race relations are excellent now. No problem as it now stands."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"I believe that if integration is perfected in our public schools in ..... County that our white children will not attend school in 1955-56. Our parents and children are not ready for integration."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(3137) N(2210)
"I do not believe either race is ready for integration."

W(7175) N(6916)
"Two problems that cannot be solved so quickly:

1. White population cannot be brought to accept it by 1955-56.
2. Building facilities and organization sufficient to handle situation will not be ready in 1955-56."

W(9335) N(1587)
"People are quite well pleased with our schools as they are, both white and Negro. I'm sure it would create a great deal of turmoil if integration of the races were attempted."

W(3330) N(2681)
"We have many people from all areas who are not willing to accept integration yet. If it has to come, it seems that a gradual introduction would be best."

W(5284) N(All colored children in the county are transported to a consolidated school in the ..... City Unit.)
"The sentiment at the present among our colored population in the various communities of the county is that they prefer to continue under the present set-up."

W(2409) N(562)
"Our Negro population is very happy with the present set-up as their school facilities are as good as the white children have. We would have no trouble if outsiders will leave the Negroes alone."

W(6631) N(313)
"I think it will seriously disorganize the schools. Neither race in this county wants to go to the same schools. They are satisfied as it is now. Ninety-five per cent of the colored would vote to keep it as it is now."

W(1926) N(533)
"1. Do not believe enough white teachers can be employed to fill positions.
2. Do not believe white patrons will send children to school under Negro teachers.
3. Building locations are wrong for an integrated program.
4. Resentment by certain groups to integration."

W(8331) N(4023)
"Public would lose interest in public education. Would not vote bond issues or tax levies for the continued advancement of schools—attendance would be less regular—compulsion would be impossible."

W(4083) N(2344)
"The Negroes want to attend their schools, and we all believe there will be no decision preventing the democratic method of choosing the school they are to attend. If the people are given a choice in choosing their school, there will be no problem in ..... County. The whites will attend theirs, and the Negroes will attend theirs; yet they can be given the information that they have a legal right to integrate."

E

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 10 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

> "Would immediate mixing of the races in the public schools in your administrative unit cause serious complications in the operation of school busses serving your schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(4068) N(27)
"We only have about twenty-seven (27) Negro grade school

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

and fifteen (15) high school children and most of them would be in walking distance of the school."

W(2795) N(1111)
"We do not operate school busses at present. I would think that bus transportation problems would be even more difficult to deal with than classroom or building problems."

W(6487) N(2276)
"Negro high school students from this and other counties are transported to our Negro High School."

W(11,458) N(4441)
"Bus loads would be affected little, if at all."

W(3330) N(2681)
"We have only two, from a completely white housing area."

W(1926) N(533)
"Negro buses bring in mostly county students which would then go to county schools."

W(2125) N(15) I(113)
"Only one colored bus and it carries the high school students to ..... County colored high school."

W(2629) N(953)
"The only buses operating in our schools are those transporting high school students residing in the rural areas into our unit. The ..... County Schools do not operate a secondary school for Negroes."

W(1550) N(107)
"In our case all Negroes could be transported on one bus. They are segregated in two small communities not too far apart."

W(2297) N(397)
"No white pupils are transported."

W(3885) N(74)
"Provided buses continue to operate as now. At the present time we are operating only one bus for the Negroes and this bus could continue for the same purpose."

W(3270) N(409)
"Our buses cover a small geographic area for white children and a much larger area for Negro children."

W(6724) N(1827)
"Negro children do not live in areas now being served by busses for white children and white children do not live in areas now being served by busses for Negro children."

W(6253) N(50)
"Not enough would be affected."

F

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 10 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "Would immediate mixing of the races in the public schools in your administrative unit cause serious complications in the operation of school busses serving your schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(1523) N(1455)
"Our most serious problem would be the operation of non-segregated busses. Teachers would not be present to supervise and it is the opinion of our Board of Education that school transportation would have to be abolished. If so, this would abolish our school system."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(2256) N(1506)
"At present our busses are being driven by 16, 17, and 18 year old children. They are incapable of driving safely when racial fights and arguments are going on behind them—and this will happen."

W(2432) N(1661)
"Routing and serving overcrowded schools for both races would complicate our present districting."

W(3375) N(2733)
"Both white and Negro children, as well as their parents, prefer that they be permitted to go to their own schools."

W(1051) N(441)
"This seems to be the area from which you hear so much complaint."

W(2398) N(875)
"Only Negroes are brought at present in County buses. Could this segregated bus be continued?"

W(3898) N(2681) I(5746)
"We have three races in our county. There is very little apparent disposition or sentiment in either of the races to mix the school population on busses or in schools."

W(1878)
"This would be an impossible situation unless adult bus drivers were employed to maintain discipline."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"There may be greater complications on account of necessity of children being packed close together. Practically all of our busses are loaded to capacity, including standing room."

W(3256) N(1455)
"This would create a greater problem than in the school room, because on the bus there is no supervision."

W(1795) N(194)
"Already operating on 'Overloads,' to white schools."

W(4548) N(916)
"Busses operating to the two centers of population of the unit travel the same routes. All busses, negro and white, are loaded to seating capacity. A mixing of the races on these busses would result in serious trouble."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"In our situation we have a total of 17 busses. Nine are hauling white children; eight are hauling Negro children, and it is my belief that the reaction of mixing the races on the busses would result in neither of the busses arriving at their destination, and I further believe that these busses would be destroyed by a combination of student and people reaction."

W(5120) N(1683)
"Due to the close bodily contact of children in school, white children would refuse to ride the same busses with Negro children. If ever forced to enter the same busses, the situation would become explosive."

W(3295) N(1900)
"The operation of busses on an integrated basis will constitute one of the greatest problems of integration. At the school the principal and teachers may be able to maintain order. The student drivers whom we employ to drive busses will not be able to cope with the problem that will arise on the routes."

W(1132) N(118)
"Personal contact on over-crowded busses would cause more problems than would result in classrooms under teacher supervision."

W(3494) N(4163)
"I think that this perhaps presents the biggest problem. If I were a parent, either white or colored, I do not think I would let a child of mine attempt to ride a school bus unless there were an officer of the law in charge of the bus."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(552) N(371)
"White and Negro children will not mix peacefully in this county, any more than oil and water."

W(6211) N(1837)
"Principals say that the most serious problem would be that of the busses. They say now that 90 per cent of disciplinary problems arise from bus transportation."

W(1755) N(1030)
"Parents and pupil comments."

W(2460) N(2597)
"The most of the trouble we have on busses is where one or two families are not on the best of terms. You are going to raise this to the "N" parents, when you add negroes."

W(9127) N(257)
"Most all busses would have a few colored children. The minority would be in constant trouble."

W(3885) N(74)
"At the present time we are operating only one bus for the Negroes and this bus could continue for the same purpose."

W(9782) N(2305)
"Comments from parents indicate that we may expect trouble."

W(4224) N(66)
"It would not so far as the physical or numbers of pupils per bus is concerned, but it would be a very serious social problem."

W(2774) N(3036)
"Lack of adult supervision on buses would make the situation there more unacceptable than in classrooms. We have heard many expressions of this nature."

W(1826) N(1190)
"It seems that buses would have to transport white, Negro and Indian children in the same bus. With buses crowded, this would invite trouble from children and adults. It would be almost impossible to secure bus drivers if 2 or 3 races were allowed to ride same bus. Race prejudices would be manifest in violence."

W(1937) N(928)
"Whites would stay home rather than ride with Negroes."

W(1270) N(1090)
"My answer here is based on comments I have heard from parents and pupils."

W(8661) N(3624)
"In many instances Negro children would not be permitted to ride; if so, white children would not. Doubt if drivers could be secured."

W(675) N(764)
"Adequate supervision could not be provided. I could not take responsibility for what would happen. The situation is too explosive."

W(999) N(1062)
"It would necessitate the riding of Negro tenant children and white landlord children on the same bus and our people are not ready for this radical change without causing serious complications."

W(3250) N(1288)
"All is well at present. All busses are loaded to capacity. Why cause confusion by changing from the best to the worst?"

W(3388) N(329)
"Since we have only one Negro school in ..... County, and

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

that is located at ..... in the exact center of the county, and to this school we haul all Negro children out of every school district in the county, with the exception of two, there would be a few colored children on all of the 44 busses in this county with the exception of seven. It just won't work."

W(1831) N(235)
"Separate buses are presently crowded, and require more coverage of area than could be successfully done with an integrated program."

W(1787) N(1575)
"A superintendent in New York State once told me that many fights occurred between Negro and white pupils there while riding the school buses. There will be many more here for a long time."

W(1778) N(619)
"School busses are of necessity under limited supervision because teachers seldom ride the busses. We could not successfully transport both races together."

W(1130) N(811)
"This is where our most serious complications would begin."

W(1408) N(2212) I(230)
"The white people will come nearer letting the children sit together in school than they will ride on the same busses."

W(696) N(157)
"Many families will not, under any circumstances, put white children on a bus where the races are mixed."

W(9983) N(4822)
"The friction, flare of tempers, and family feuds are bad enough on the crowded busses. If the racial problem were added, racial hatred would develop faster than for any other one phase of the amalgamation process decreed by the court. This county has Negroes on every bus line."

W(4910) N(2638)
"I fear serious trouble would result. Strikes, fights, and other mass resistance, I fear would occur."

W(1000) N(675)
"More trouble will occur on busses than anywhere as less adequate supervision is available."

W(6468) N(4337)
"It would mean the end of free transportation to school. White families would boycott school busses. In my opinion, the Legislature would abolish free school bus service making it necessary for each family to provide transportation. The poor of neither race would get to school."

W(1571) N(2236)
"White parents would seriously object to mixing pupils on school busses."

W(4781) N(715)
"City busses transport white children. Public school bus transports Negro children. Present city busses would not adequately serve Negro children."

W(638) N(721)
"White and colored children just aren't going to ride together—that is, not without serious trouble."

W(1821) N(428)
"Would complicate the routing, timing, and general transportation problems."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"I am sure that mixing of the races in our unit would complicate school bus operations to the extent that it would be impossible."

W(3137) N(2210)
"I believe the white children would refuse to ride, and I believe it would take force to make some of them agree to ride."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(7175) N(6916)
"There would certainly be trouble between the races at this time."

W(9335) N(1587)
"We could serve all the children, but I think complications would develop in trying to transport both races on the same bus."

W(2342) N(2685)
"It is my opinion that student drivers can no longer be used if it becomes necessary to eliminate our dual transportation system."

W(15,551) N(410)
"With present buses loaded, unable to increase bus loads."

W(8331) N(4023)
"Would make an almost unbearable situation."

W(4083) N(2344)
"One of the most serious problems connected with integration."

W(5542) N(3469)
"Considerable re-routing would likely be necessary. White and colored children would likely not get along well on same bus."

G

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 11 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

"In the event of immediate integration of your schools, would you find it practicable to use Negro teachers in mixed classes?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(1051) N(441)
"The Negro personnel here is above the average in training."

W(2905) N(798)
"I believe it would be practicable to use Negro teachers if Negro children are in the majority."

W(6487) N(2276)
"We have some very fine Negro staff members. If I had children I would feel they were very fortunate to be taught by these superior teachers, but I doubt that many of our parents are ready to accept them as yet."

H

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 11 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

"In the event of immediate integration of your schools, would you find it practicable to use Negro teachers in mixed classes?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(4427) N(26)
"Even those parents who might accept integration as being inevitable would absolutely defy any attempts to used colored teachers in mixed classes."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1490) N(1784)
"Not practical from a standpoint of administration."

W(2301) N(1702)
"This simply cannot be done in our part of the state."

W(6724) N(1827)
"The protests would be more violent with regard to placing white children under a Negro teacher than they would be with regard to mixing white and colored children."

W(3281) N(811)
"Our people will not agree to this. It will take a long time before this could happen here."

W(2256) N(1506)
"The public will not permit it."

W(2432) N(1661)
"The average Negro teacher would be an inferior teacher when placed in a mixed situation."

W(5120) N(1683)
"White parents would not like for their children to be disciplined by Negro teachers. White children would resent Negro teachers. White children under Negro teachers would become objects of ridicule by pupils fortunate enough to have white teachers."

W(3295) N(1900)
"Under the existing machinery set up for electing teachers it is doubtful if any of our committees will elect Negro teachers for mixed classes."

W(1132) N(118)
"Our people would not accept Negro teachers at this time or in the foreseeable future."

W(1392) N(604)
"There is a general public feeling that Negro teachers are not properly trained for the work."

W(6253) N(50)
"People here will not accept the Colored teacher."

W(8578) N(3442)
"No, unless the classes are predominantly Negro."

W(1795) N(194)
"Immediate integration or otherwise—there will probably be many factors available, other than race or color, for failure to recommend a Negro teacher for a white or mixed school."

W(3256) N(1455)
"The white parents would not allow colored teachers to teach their children."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"Right now I am positive that such would not work in this county, and that there would be no way of enforcing it."

W(2398) N(875)
"It would depend on the school, I think. Negro teachers would be used only in the schools that are now Negro schools."

W(1878)
"Our Board would not employ Negroes to teach mixed classes."

W(17,926) N(7984)
"White parents are not ready to accept Negro teachers."

W(4548) N(916)
"Our white parents will not accept Negro teachers for their children."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"I think the use of Negro teachers as instructional or administrative personnel would, out of absolute necessity, be even farther in the future than total integration. The former is at this time impossible and the latter totally impossible."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(2774) N(3036)
"We answer 'no' to the practicability, because observations made on numerous occasions have been to the effect that Negro teachers would not be acceptable with white parents and pupils—also, that Negro teachers would not be elected in the first place."

W(1826) N(1190)
"The scarcity of white teachers may force this to be done, and it is possible that it may work in classes made up of the primary age."

W(1937) N(928)
"Whites would not stand for it."

W(2297) N(397)
"Our people simply would not accept Negro instructors at the present time."

W(3885) N(74)
"In my opinion any white students would not attend mixed classes taught by Negro teachers."

W(8900) N(272)
"We have only 9 Negro teachers in our unit and I doubt if they would be accepted."

W(3494) N(4163)
"No, but you would have to do it due to shortage of white teachers."

W(6211) N(1837)
"I do not believe that a Negro teacher would be employed to teach white children under present law."

W(1755) N(1030)
"Both parents and teachers have expressed themselves to this effect."

W(2460) N(2597)
"I just believe the white children would make teaching so unpleasant that the teacher would leave the room."

W(3919) N(2223)
"Except where Negro students would be in great preponderance."

W(9127) N(257)
"I never expect this to take place in this county for years and years to come. We would not have any class in which a majority would be colored. The majority will control right or wrong."

W(9783) N(2305)
"Comments from parents have indicated objections to the practice."

W(4224) N(66)
"Our people absolutely will not accept Negro teachers."

W(696) N(157)
"I would not, under any circumstances, recommend a Negro teacher to teach white children in this town in the foreseeable future."

W(9983) N(4822)
"(a) Too many Negro teachers have been indoctrinated in ideas repulsive and antagonistic to the white race. I would not want to be responsible for what would happen if white pupils carried home some of the statements of Negro teachers. (b) Many Negro teachers have obtained high certificates without corresponding ability and knowledge. The ease with which higher degrees have often been obtained is a National disgrace.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(c) Negro teachers have been accustomed to teaching pupils of much lower mental ability and achievement. It would be a great tragedy for the white race to have to fall to their level of experience. It is so much easier to fall than to climb."

W(1139) N(750)
"I would not dare employ a Negro teacher to teach white children in this community."

W(3901) N(777)
"White children would not attend school taught by Negro teachers now; with small and gradual integration, this might be possible—But not now."

W(3228) N(2515)
"White parents and some teachers would not accept it."

W(7416) N(148)
"Negro teachers would, under all circumstances, be unacceptable to white children."

W(4068) N(27)
"We have a surplus of white teachers in our county and only one Negro teacher certified to teach. This teacher holds a "B" certificate."

W(2795) N(1111)
"I believe that there would be difficulty in administering discipline and conducting instruction in most instances."

W(1778) N(619)
"It would not be practical to place Negro teachers in mixed classes. Parents of white children would not send their children to school. Older children would rebel."

W(1130) N(811)
"Whites will refuse to send their children to Negro teachers."

W(4165) N(3107)
"There is no logical reason to believe that the situation here would be different from that which has existed throughout the years in the non-segregated areas of this nation. The majority race which has controlled and will continue to control employment policies will not permit it."

W(1550) N(107)
"We have several sections of each grade in our school and a Negro teacher in only one or two sections would seriously hamper grade distribution."

W(1270) N(1090)
"We have white parents who will not let their children be taught by Negro teachers."

W(8661) N(91)
"Bad enough to have mixed classes."

W(675) N(764)
"White parents do not want them. I have hesitated about permitting Negro supervisors to visit in white schools because there is some feeling against Negroes going into white schools except as janitors or repairmen."

W(999) N(1062)
"The majority of white patrons would demand white teachers for their children. I believe that most Negro children prefer Negro teachers."

W(3250) N(1288)
"No principal would be able to operate a school under these circumstances because he could not be mentally happy. Whose children would be placed in this classroom? None of our white people will agree to this. Our principals would resign to work in other fields at less salary. Our white children would stay at home."

W(3388) N(329)
"There is no place for a Negro teacher in ..... County white schools. There would not be enough Negro children in any one grade in any one school to give a majority of Negro children in the classroom that would justify the employment of a Negro teacher. Our Negro agriculture and home economics teachers would not have a job because the three white high schools, ..., ... and ..... all have vocational agriculture and home economics teachers. There would be only a few colored children in each of the six departments. There would actually be a saving in school personnel through integration of seven teachers."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1831) N(235)
"I do not think Negro teachers would be competent to teach white children. Their basic understanding and concepts are different and their standards are different."

W(1787) N(1575)
"Most white parents and children will object to Negro teachers teaching white children."

W(2272) N(2638)
"We have many well qualified Negro teachers, but using them under these conditions would just make matters worse."

W(1000) N(675)
"They would not be able to maintain discipline. White parents and white children will not accept them as teachers."

W(10,805) N(6468)
"Our schools would follow the pattern of the North. The only difference being we would have even fewer Negro teachers, if any."

W(1571) N(2236)
"White parents would not permit Negro teachers to teach their children."

W(638) N(721)
"We aren't employing any Negro teachers until the last white is used up."

W(1821) N(428)
"Integration would have to be slow."

W(2571) N(1559)
"Except where a large majority of the classes were Negroes."

W(2409) N(562)
"Our white patrons might finally submit to mixed classes, but they will never send their children to school to be taught by Negro teachers."

W(6631) N(313)
"White committeemen would resign before they would elect them. We would have very few colored children in any class."

W(11,458) N(4441)
"I do not believe Negro teachers will be accepted as yet. This conclusion is based upon what has happened in the North and West."

W(3330) N(2681)
"We do not believe that white children will accept Negro teachers yet. The problem of discipline will be bad."

W(1926) N(533)
"White patrons would not send children to school."

W(2125) N(15) I(113)
"Only one colored teacher in the county."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"I do not believe that white parents will allow Negro teachers to teach their children."

W(3137) N(2210)
"The few parents who might agree to integration would oppose Negro teachers teaching their children."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(7175) N(6915)
"When public opinion accepts integration of pupils it will probably accept some good Negro teachers in mixed classes."

W(9335) N(1587)
"I don't believe white parents would agree to have their children taught by Negro teachers."

W(8331) N(4023)
"This is one choice the public would demand."

W(5542) N(3469)
"Answer based upon comments made by parents."

I

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 12 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

> "In the event of immediate integration of your public schools, would you have any serious difficulties in securing a sufficient number of properly trained white school teachers to teach in mixed schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(3669)
"No; that is, any more than we are already having."

W(14,452) N(2475)
"This is my present opinion. I could be wrong."

W(1051) N(441)
"Most teachers work for a living and because of the satisfaction from a job well done, we think they would continue to teach."

W(6211) N(1837)
"We could get teachers. Camp ..... Marine wives would be available."

W(2774) N(3036)
"Applications from older teachers and former teachers now married in community this past year were much more numerous than open positions. This source would be explored in event of the above."

W(2905) N(798)
"It would be little if any more difficult than now. Unfortunately too many of our teachers teach of necessity for this reason mixed classes will not matter. For those who teach from choice because they like children and have chosen teaching as an avenue for civic service the color of the child will make no difference."

W(4068) N(27)
"Only one school would have Negro children in it. Teachers that objected to teaching them could be used in the other schools."

W(7416) N(148)
"The answer is no because in this unit the number of Negro teachers is not appreciable. It is qualified in that we have difficulty in finding white teachers any way."

W(1550) N(107)
"We have at present only four Negro teachers out of fifty-four."

W(999) N(1062)
"At present we have difficulty in securing enough properly trained white teachers to teach in our all white schools, but a Negro high school principal told me that integration of the races would be another Pearl Harbor. He says that many white teachers would return to the schools rather than see

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Negro teachers teach their children. I believe he is right. If so, we could find a supply of white teachers."

W(3388) N(329)
"I have a few white teachers who have expressed to me their willingness to teach a mixed group if absolutely necessary but I have many teachers who now say that they will leave the profession if they have to teach Negro children."

W(1270) N(1090)
"We get an unusual number of applications for teaching in ..... at present. I can't say what the situation would be if the schools were mixed."

J

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 12 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "In the event of immediate integration of your public schools, would you have any serious difficulties in securing a sufficient number of properly trained white school teachers to teach in mixed schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(2256) N(1506)
"Negro teachers for white children will not find acceptance in areas with considerable Negro population. The legislatures will be likely to reduce requirements so that more white teachers will become available. Also, as the need becomes acute, salaries will rise, thus bringing many newcomers into the profession. So white teachers will shortly be available."

W(1523) N(1455)
"A number of qualified white persons have indicated they would come back into the profession, yet we do not have enough of such to replace all Negro teachers."

W(3534) N(646)
"Our local white teachers, of long experience and influence, have expressed a feeling to resign if this should happen."

W(9619) N(7122)
"We could probably secure teachers because the city pays a good supplement. We cannot now secure enough good white teachers to fill our vacancies."

W(2262) N(1835)
"Some of the white teachers have told me they will quit teaching if forced to teach Negroes."

W(2796) N(782)
"Many of the white teachers now teaching would stop if they had to teach colored children."

W(3281) N(811)
"My opinion is that many of our white teachers would resign. Since we already have a shortage, this could create a very bad situation."

W(6724) N(1827)
"It is all that we can do to secure qualified white teachers for white children now."

W(1490) N(1784)
"We have serious difficulties as it is."

W(545) N(652)
"White teachers not available."

W(4427) N(26)
"Already a problem, it would be intensified by integration. I have heard teachers remark that if and when integration came they would leave the teaching profession."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1795) N(194)
"I have white vacancies now, in white schools and no qualified white teachers available. The above would overload further."

W(3256) N(1455)
"A large percentage would drop out. A large number is married and do not have to teach for a living—they would drop out of the profession."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"We have great difficulty in securing enough white teachers for the white schools. There is a surplus of Negro teachers in this area. We employ the best of the latter. Most of them are not strong teachers."

W(2398) N(875)
"I do not think any white teacher would go to Negro schools (at present Negro). I think they would, most of them, teach in the present schools even with integrated classes."

W(1132) N(118)
"A serious shortage of white teachers already exists and some now teaching will leave the profession rather than teach in mixed schools."

W(3295) N(1900)
"The present supply of adequately trained white teachers is insufficient to teach the white children in the presently segregated schools. The additional white teachers that would be needed for mixed classes are not currently available."

W(7118) N(5259)
"If these were formerly all white schools and the proportion of Negro pupils relatively low, perhaps not. If they were formerly Negro schools, I do not believe white teachers would teach in them at all."

W(5120) N(1683)
"Many white teachers would refuse to teach Negro children.

This condition added to the present shortage of white teachers would create a very serious situation."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"If immediate integration is effected in our public schools, the loss of white teachers and the refusal of the people to allow Negro teachers to serve as instructional personnel would close the schools entirely."

W(4548) N(916)
"We have 30 Negro and 156 white teachers. Our difficulty at present is securing white teachers from the limited supply."

W(2603) N(7753)
"There is at present a severe shortage of properly trained white teachers. I believe that many of those now teaching would discontinue teaching and that many who may be preparing to teach would not enter the profession."

W(17,926) N(7,984)
"Cannot keep vacancies filled now. Anything that makes teaching less desirable will be disastrous."

W(1878)
"Perhaps 20% of our teachers have indicated they would resign from the profession."

W(3885) N(74)
"At the present time it is difficult to secure a sufficient number of trained white teachers for the white schools and it would be even more difficult to secure white teachers for mixed schools."

W(1937) N(928)
"Can't find sufficient number of properly trained white teachers as it is now."

W(3494) N(4163)
"I do not think that it would be possible to find a sufficient number of white teachers. I am sure that the husbands of many of the married teachers would make them stop if colored children were placed under them. I have heard many white teachers state that they would not attempt to teach a class of mixed races."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1755) N(1030)
"Some teachers have expressed themselves to the effect that they would leave the profession."

W(2460) N(2597)
"We can not get enough for the white schools now so I can not see where the extra teachers are coming from to teach an integrated room."

W(9127) N(257)
"Some teachers would accept it, but for many years to come many of the teachers would not. We have many teachers who do not have to teach. They are married and do not have to teach for the money. They are doing it for love of the work and profession. They would stop immediately. Right now we are short five teachers and many are just filling in. We would have a real problem."

W(1987) N(1303)
"We believe that 20% of our white teachers would leave."

W(2297) N(397)
"It is now difficult to secure properly trained teachers for strictly white schools."

W(9783) N(2305)
"We do not have sufficient number of properly trained white teachers to teach in the white schools now."

W(3228) N(2515)
"Some white teachers would drop out of teaching in public schools and go to private schools; it would doubtless be increasingly more difficult to persuade young people to prepare to teach."

W(1139) N(750)
"I find it difficult to find teachers (white) now. Many of them will seek other employment if integration comes."

W(9983) N(4822)
"(a) The salary schedule does not attract teachers.
(b) They have too many other attractive fields to choose.
(c) It is the popular fad—inspired by communistic and anti-public education and religious groups—to harass and annoy teachers.
(d) Teacher certification prevents the use of many college graduates who did not take the required 'education' courses.
(e) The out-of-State teacher who would enter our State has difficulty qualifying in North Carolina."

W(1408) N(2212)
"We have trouble getting properly trained white teachers to teach in all white schools at the present. It would be an impossibility to staff the whole system with white teachers who were properly trained. It might be possible to staff the schools with white people, who are not teachers. I do not know."

W(2577) N(148)
"I am crossing my bridges only as I come to them. I have not discussed this with any of my teachers, because I believe the least said the better. My guess is that no teacher wants to have a mixed group."

W(696) N(157)
"This is purely my personal opinion. This small school system has been more fortunate in relation to teachers than many systems, particularly rural areas. However, I have now some very competent teachers who would likely quit teaching rather than teach mixed classes."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(6487) N(2276)
"Our Negro and white principals have been meeting jointly for years, and it seems to work very well, but our Negro and white teachers do not mix as well. I doubt that our white teachers would accept Negro childen in their classrooms at this time."

W(4165) N(3107)
"The answer 'yes,' based on the present teacher certification requirements. There is reason to believe that a modification of the requirements would relieve this situation to some extent."

W(1778) N(619)
"At the present time, the white teachers would not teach Negro children."

W(2795) N(1111)
"The 'yes' answer is my opinion for immediate integration; time and gradual adjustment might improve this difficult situation."

W(3901) N(777)
"Scarcity of competent white teachers."

W(1571) N(2236)
"Not available now."

W(638) N(721)
"To the same extent that we have difficulty in securing sufficient number now."

W(1835) N(—) I(393)
"It's hard to find qualified white teachers for all white schools. Many of our teachers would not teach in mixed schools."

W(3738) N(None)
"Such is not possible now. Injecting the racial issue and resulting tension would make it harder to secure the proper people."

W(8661) N(3624) I(91)
"Shortage now."

W(5050) N(303)
"We have difficulty now. Any pupil increase would make the problem more serious."

W(675) N(764)
"We have difficulty in getting enough for our white schools. Some whom we have persuaded to come in might refuse to teach with Negroes."

W(3250) N(1288)
"Too many of our white teachers would resign. Our young white people who might go into the teaching profession would not be interested. The Negro teachers would take over."

W(1831) N(235)
"Many white teachers would leave the field to avoid the complex problems of a social and disciplinary nature. Much chaos would naturally result and the rewards of teaching are not sufficient to keep many of our teachers on the job."

W(1787) N(1575)
"We are having difficulty securing enough properly trained white teachers now."

W(2272) N(2638)
"It would be probably impossible. Then too, I believe that many white teachers would refuse to teach mixed classes."

W(1000) N(675)
"We are all having trouble now in securing well trained white teachers. It will be much more difficult if Negro teachers are employed in white schools. As long as employment can be had elsewhere, young people will not go into the profession and most of those who now can retire will do so."

W(6468) N(4337)
"We are unable to get them for white schools now. Our

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

troubles would be multiplied. The source of white teachers which is very inadequate, would decrease."

W(9335) N(1587)
"1. They aren't available.
2. Some of them probably would refuse to teach mixed classes."

W(2342) N(2685)
"Unquestionably, integration of the schools would aggravate further the task of securing satisfactory teaching personnel for our schools. Some white teachers would leave the profession, affecting further the shortage of white teachers."

W(8669) N(644)
"There is at present a shortage of trained white teachers. Some of our white teachers would not teach mixed groups."

W(5284) N(All colored children in the county are transported to a consolidated school in the ..... School Unit.)
"Inasmuch as there is a shortage of qualified white teachers now, and with the prospect of withdrawals due to integration, I think the shortage would become more acute."

W(6631) N(313)
"We have difficulty now and while some of our white teachers would be willing to teach in mixed schools, some would not. It would make our present shortage more acute."

W(11,458) N(4441)
"We are having difficulty already. Integration would certainly accentuate the problem."

W(3330) N(2681)
"I feel that our present teachers, the greater part at least would accept mixed classes. To find additional teachers will be very difficult."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"I believe that it would be difficult for us to secure sufficient number of properly trained white teachers to teach in mixed schools. We have very few extra white teachers in our area from which to draw in cases of emergencies at present. Teachers will have to become more plentiful if greater demands are met."

W(1926) N(533)
"Many of present white teachers would leave the profession and it is difficult to find properly trained white teachers for white students at the present."

W(3137) N(2210)
"We are having trouble as it is, but I am sure if we had immediate integration we would not be able to secure a sufficient number of properly trained white teachers to teach in mixed schools."

W(8331) N(4023)
"We would lose those teachers now teaching to help out—also those who feel extremely bitter about the decision."

K

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 13 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

> "In the event of immediate integration, would you have any reason to believe that the mixing of the races in the public schools of your unit would create serious problems of discipline in these schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(2125) N(15) I(113)
"I say no because we have so few colored students. It could be that we would have trouble with the white students, because they would resent them."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(11,458) N(4441)
"Young people are less prejudiced than adults. Any problems are more likely to emanate from parents than from pupils."

W(3669)
"Answer is based on what our pupils say. However, in practice, the situation could be quite different. What the reaction would be actually when three colored high school pupils are thrown in with 340 white is difficult to foresee. The colored pupils may not be beaten up but they would probably feel out of place to the extent that they would drop out of school."

W(1826) N(1190)
"No, unless outside agitation caused it."

W(1550) N(107)
"I believe our students would accept the situation once they realize it is inevitable."

L

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 13 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "In the event of immediate integration, would you have any reason to believe that the mixing of the races in the public schools of your unit would create serious problems of discipline in these schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(2432) N(1661)
"Evidenced by inter-racial conflicts this year that have never occurred before."

W(3375) N(2733)
"Many of these problems can possibly be worked out on a time basis, but to be forced to go immediately into them would, in all probability, bring about difficulty of adjustment."

W(1051) N(441)
"In high schools the reaction is more noticed than in elementary schools."

W(2256) N(1506)
"(1) Fist fights daily, on class, in corridor, on campus. (2) All elections on racial lines—no Negroes will be able to win. (3) Moral tone between the two races is at a distinct variance. Morals are not a real necessity to perhaps a majority of colored race. White people do not share this point of view."

W(2262) N(1835)
"This is my honest opinion after listening to adults. Many of them are leaders in the Church and Community."

W(2796) N(782)
"If older students are integrated, there will naturally result serious disciplinary problems. Should the integration begin in the primary grades, there would not likely develop many serious disciplinary problems within the school itself."

W(3281) N(811)
"This would be true on the high school level. In the primary grades, no."

W(4427) N(26)
"It appears to me that such problems are the inevitable consequence of integration in any system."

W(6724) N(1827)
"You cannot force social relationships upon people. Normal social activities now carried on by schools, such as class dances and parties, would be impossible. Colored children would have a tendency to resent and reject control by white

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

teachers and white children would not accept correction from colored teachers. An accusation of unfairness would be made in most instances when it became necessary for colored children to be disciplined. If Negroes are permitted to force their way into the white schools, they will have a tendency to attempt to use the same tactics in freeing themselves of the normal controls which are necessary in schools. Such a situation is reported to exist in California and other areas where children are now mixed."

W(1795) N(194)
"Different standards of conduct?
Different standards of moral responsibility?
(If a Negro child is corrected or punished (disciplined) you are, at once on the defensive?")

W(3256) N(1455)
"The trouble would start with the parents and carry over to the students into the school."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"In sections of this county, we have difficulty between the races if the children use the same bus stops even though they they get on separate busses. Our best solution under present conditions is to have these students to congregate at separate places, and to keep them separate."

W(2398) N(875)
"Judging by what is happening elsewhere."

W(6253) N(50)
"Among the children themselves."

W(3295) N(1900)
"Immediate integration will bring some problems of discipline in the classrooms. The greater the problems of discipline will be created in the cafeterias and extra-curricular activities such as athletics, glee clubs, and physical education activities."

W(5120) N(1683)
"There would be incidents frequently which would be very difficult to handle. All activities of a recreational or social nature would be filled with incidents and very explosive. We could conduct 'classes' provided we could have enough special police officers posted at the right places to keep order before and after school and at recesses. Every school of 300 would require at least two such officers."

W(420) N(333)
"We would have serious trouble."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"I think the matter of guiding public reaction and maintaining order or affecting discipline would be impossible and I believe in all sincerity that chaos would engulf our school district."

W(2812) N(1868)
"Definitely!"

W(4548) N(916)
"Definitely—disciplinary problems would increase."

W(17,926) N(7984)
"Hazing and 'ganging up' on the unwanted will be at a maximum in my judgment."

W(1878)
"Discipline problems would be numerous in the elementary schools, possibly not many problems at the high school level. Our high school pupils are well conditioned in discipline."

W(1937) N(928)
"I am afraid that fighting and rioting would get out of hand."

W(3885) N(74)
"It would be practically impossible to secure the cooperation

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

of the parents in the matter of maintaining discipline should there be immediate integration."

W(9783) N(2305)
"The pattern of strikes by students in other states would be followed in this area."

W(2297) N(397)
"I do not believe that white children would immediately accept integration without serious objection. However, I believe that children would come nearer doing so than adults."

W(9127) N(257)
"In time this could be overcome, probably. But from all evidence now, I can see serious problems arising from the angle of white and colored. Both would create problems for each race."

W(2460) N(2597)
"I am satisfied that the large boys and their parents would resort to violence."

W(3494) N(4163)
"Both races would be at a disadvantage. I think there could be no extra-curricular activities, except possibly in athletics, and I doubt it even here. Perhaps the many athletic contests viewed by visitors to all sorts of contests where Negroes are playing and seeing so many Negroes on TV in baseball, basketball, football, and boxing might cause the impact to be less in athletics. All class plays, banquets, dances, and activities of this nature would be suspended."

W(4224) N(66)
"This would be an influence from the homes which would be rather difficult to cope with."

W(5928) N(777)
"Particularly in the high schools."

W(2774) N(3036)
"Comments and even threats support the above answer."

W(3270) N(409)
"The problems would be much more serious than the numbers involved would indicate."

W(1130) N(811)
"This would be one of our most serious problems."

W(2577) N(148)
"How serious I do not know, but it certainly would create some problems of discipline."

W(696) N(157)
"I have no doubt but that discipline problems would arise. Many of the objections to integration are based on deep feeling not just spur-of-the-moment behavior. Some students would come to school, if compelled to attend, with the intention of making trouble and with the tacit encouragement of parents."

W(6487) N(2276)
"There continues to be considerable antagonism between teen-agers of the two races. I doubt if this can be attached to either race. It seems to be largely a mutual feeling."

W(4165) N(3107)
"It would mean the elimination of most of the school sponsored social activities that are now carried on in the schools of both races. These activities are important factors in building and maintaining pupil morale and school spirit."

W(1778) N(619)
"Riots."

W(3228) N(2515)
"Serious problems would arise in all grades, particularly on the high school level. Adult prejudice would perhaps be the greatest factor."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(9983) N(4822)
"(a) Sexually the Negro race develops much earlier than the white race. Court records of recent weeks show Negro 6, 7 and 8 years olds guilty of sex offences. This situation would 'blow the top' off the lid when the white parents learned of the difference in standards of sex behavior.
(b) The over-age Negroes are easy victims of dope vendors, et cetera because they crave money to keep up with the white boys. Northern Superintendents tell us this is a major problem in mixed schools. We may expect the racketeer to move in as he has in northern mixed schools.
(c) The white pupil of low mentality, on par with the Negro, would most violently resent being classified with him in classes. The result would be obvious to any Principal."

W(1408) N(2212) I(230)
"I was a teacher and principal for 19 years. I do not believe that there was a day of those 19 years that, at least, 2 little boys didn't get in a fight. If the races are integrated, the boys will fight, not because one was white and one was black, but because they were little boys. Each would go home and tell about the fight. Then the fathers would go hunting for one another, and your race riots would start."

W(2795) N(1111)
"I believe that prejudices that are stronger among adults than among children would seriously interfere with the school program. In addition, parents whose minds are open would be seriously concerned by the possibility of controversy, disturbances, enforcement of the strict discipline that would be necessary, and by the possibility of physical injury to children through internal or external agitation."

W(3901) N(777)
"Although for years the relations between races have greatly improved and is continuing to improve gradually, and forced mixing would seriously interfere with the improving relations between races. Good folks get along all right with good folks regardless of color; forcing a mixture of races in or out of schools simply gives opportunity for the wrong people regardless of race to make trouble."

W(1675) N(675)
"They have never before been together in any form of activities. Therefore, they are not prepared for such a thing. There will be trouble where it is begun."

W(6468) N(4337)
"I am sure it would be impossible to maintain discipline. Several of our principals who can earn a living doing something else have stated they would not undertake it. They would resign and leave it for others to attempt. These are our best and most capable principals."

W(3807) N(2236)
"Due to strength of both groups, race hatred and bitterness would soon develop."

W(638) N(721)
"Fights, cuttings, mob action would employ all of our time. Our Negroes do not want to come to white schools and the whites aren't going to have them."

W(1835) N(None)
"A great many of our parents are determined that their white children will not attend mixed schools."

W(8661) N(3624) I(91)
"Best example is where it is now being tried."

W(999) N(1062)
"What is now happening in the Northern and border States would be multiplied in Eastern North Carolina."

W(3388) N(329)
"The children in all probability would behave in their relationship to other children in the way they were instructed at home. Ordinary problems of discipline in the schools could be taken care of without too much trouble. The new type problems of discipline would be something that we would have no experience as a precedent in coping with."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1270) N(1090)
"My answer is based on my knowledge of and experience with high school boys and girls."

W(675) N(764)
"The maturity and achievement level, in general, are so different that integration would be difficult. There is some friction from 'advanced' pupils being in the same grade with all members of the same race."

W(3250) N(1288)
"In all the grades, both elementary and high school, there would be bedlam! Moral and immoral together would make a poor combination. The immoral generally win out. In the first place, the white people in ..... County will not send their children to a mixed school."

W(2272) N(2638)
"Prejudice of races in patrons, pupils and teachers would, in my opinion, make the problem of discipline unbearable."

W(13,996) N(1604)
"In some areas."

W(8669) N(644)
"Most of the trouble would come from the influence of the parents on the students."

W(663[illegible]) N(313)
"Neither race wants it and when people of either color are forced into a situation they resent, trouble usually follows."

W(3330) N(2681)
"In the following areas:
1. Lunchrooms
2. Toilets
3. Social contacts"

W(1926) N(533)
"Not in the lower grades but there would be disciplinary problems in upper grades due to adult influence."

W(2629) N(953)
"Perhaps gradual integration could be worked without serious problems of discipline, however, immediate integration would thrust upon both races a new world for which they are totally unprepared."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"It is my opinion that it will be many years before children of mixed races will be able to attend school under the same roof peaceably."

W(3137) N(2210)
"When the white child is punished, I am afraid in many cases the friends and relatives will take the law in their own hands. When the Negro child is punished, and it is believed to be wrong, the relatives and friends will appeal to the courts on the grounds of discrimination."

W(2342) N(2685)
"54% of ..... school children are Negro, 46% white. Mixing of the races in schools would present serious problems in the area of school management. Assignment of children geographically, irrespective of race, would leave white in the minority in some school situations. Prejudice and hostility would be engendered on both sides."

W(14,452) N(2475)
"It would certainly cause problems. Their seriousness is hard to forecast."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(5542) N(3469)
"It is believed that Negro children will not be accepted in a friendly way by white people."

W(8331) N(4023)
"Especially in High School."

M

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 14 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

> "Would such an integrated program seriously affect the extra-curricular activites in the school in your administrative unit?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(7416) N(148)
"This is a qualified 'no' and the reason is due to the small number of children."

W(2577) N(148)
"Not seriously, because only a very small number of Negro children would be involved. Possibly 15 Negro children in a school of 400. Zoning as we now practice it for white children would keep them from entering any other school."

W(2905) N(798)
"Negro children would probably be given or have less opportunity for participation especially for positions of leadership."

W(6253) N(50)
"Not enough involved to affect this item seriously."

W(11,458) N(4441)
"Only social functions would be materially affected. We have few of those. The ones we have would have to be eliminated or modified."

W(3330) N(2681)
"We have few 'extra' activities. Possibly the athletic team might give some difficulty."

W(1926) N(533)
"Not unless strict integration is imposed initially."

N

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 14 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "Would such an integrated program seriously affect the extra-curricular activities in the schools in your administrative unit?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(6724) N(1827)
"There are many people who would accept the mixing of children in school classes who would not accept under any circumstances the mixing of children where 'sex,' marriage, and boy-girl relationships are involved. The mixing of children would be a divisive force among students and would cause disruption of any extra-curricular activities."

W(4427) N(26)
"Again, answer applies primarily to the one school seriously affected. In the area of inter-school athletics, this problem could be troublesome in all schools."

W(2796) N(782)
"Social activities such as junior-senior dances would be seriously affected and would likely be dropped as school-sponsored activities. Athletics and sports will probably work out all right."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(2262) N(1835)
"I do not believe that the high school white youth will mix with Negroes (at least not yet)."

W(1051) N(441)
"Mostly in high school. In music and athletics, it would help the extra-curricular program. Clubs and social activities would create a problem."

W(2301) N(1702)
"In an integrated program, all extra-curricular programs would have to be eliminated."

W(1523) N(1455)
"Social functions, probably athletic programs, class activities, would have to be curtailed or completely eliminated."

W(3534) N(646)
"We would be forced to eliminate all socials to avoid violence. It is doubtful of the continuance of athletics for sometime."

W(9619) N(7122)
"Many extra-curricular activities sponsored by the schools are of a social nature and controlling these would present some serious problems. It will be difficult to control integration in the classrooms and shops, to say nothing of the extra-curricular program."

W(1132) N(118)
"In about the same degree as it would affect all other school activities."

W(3295) N(1900)
"White people in our area are nearly unanimous in their desire to maintain racial integrity, socially and biologically. If there is immediate integration, such extra-curricular activities as dramatics, so-called 'Junior class plays and Senior class plays' in high schools, and Junior-Senior class banquets will have to be abolished. Athletics might survive."

W(6253) N(50)
"Not enough involved to seriously affect in this item."

W(2398) N(875)
"This would require complete revision."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"If an attempt is made to force integration, and any degree of success is achieved, I believe that all extra-curricular activities would be abolished since there would be no participation without force on the part of white students."

W(4711) N(1455)
"Extra curricular would come to a standstill and be abandoned."

W(1795) N(194)
"What about school parties, dances, etc.? Athletics (dressing rooms, toilets), Glee Club, Band (uniforms), Trips, (buses), School Plays?"

W(1878)
"Except in the field of athletics. Integration would not work at their banquets and proms."

W(17,926) N(7984)
"We make much of our home room, club and class social activities. With both races in the school these social activities will be at a minimum or not exist."

W(2603) N(7753)
"For the same reasons that there would be serious discipline problems."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(4548) N(916)
"This would probably be affected to a lesser degree than any other phase of school life, yet it would create unnecessary problems."

W(2812) N(1868)
"Yes, I think such activities would have to be curtailed or discontinued."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"Not only would such an integrated program seriously affect the extra-curricular activities, but it would dissolve the program of extra-curricular activities and at the same time deactivate what is commonly known as the public schools and all of the educative processes that are characteristic at the present time of this school district."

W(7118) N(5259)
"It would completely eliminate most social functions."

W(5120) N(1683)
"Extra-curricular activities would have to be abolished where there are Negroes in large numbers. It is the 'social element' involved in extra-curricular activities which would be so explosive. The old southern family proverb, 'You can work with them, but you can't play with them,' applies here."

W(4224) N(66)
"Both races would be at a disadvantage. I think there could be no extra-curricular activities, except possibly in athletics, and I doubt it even here. Perhaps the many athletic contests viewed by visitors to all sorts of contests where Negroes are playing and seeing so many Negroes on TV in baseball, basketball, football and boxing might cause the impact to be less in athletics. All class plays, banquets, dances, and activities of this nature would be suspended."

W(2774) N(3036)
"Objections have already been made to this phase of the program. In fact, the prospect of any social integration is alarming to white patrons of our communities."

W(6211) N(1837)
"Markedly so. Would eliminate extra-curricular activities and social aspects of high school program—at least for some years. This is the opinion of principals."

W(1987) N(1303)
"It is our belief that all extra-curricular activities would have to close."

W(9127) N(257)
"We have never seen discrimination such as would exist if they were put together. The few colored children would not get a chance."

W(2460) N(2597)
"I believe pupils would have to understand each other fairly well to work on any of the extra-curricular activities. This means understanding each other socially. Not many of our older pupils could do this."

W(3885) N(74)
"At the present time the Negro students participate in extra-curricular activities in their own school. Should they attend a mixed school, the white children, in all probability, would not accept the Negro children as participants in extra-curricular activity."

W(9783) N(2305)
"Considerable difficulty would follow in the social activities, athletic program and other extra-curricular activities."

W(1937) N(928)
"Whites will not mix socially with Negroes."

W(5928) N(777)
"Negroes would not be chosen to participate in extra-curricular activities."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1139) N(750)
"Dances, Proms, Banquets, etc., would be discontinued by our schools. Parents would demand this be done."

W(1130) N(811)
"Extra-curricular activities would be hampered even more than co-curricular activities."

W(696) N(157)
"Extra-curricular activities are often social in nature, and even those whites who would not object to being in a formal class with Negroes are not willing to enter into any social situations with them. In fact, they have no intention of doing so."

W(6487) N(2276)
"Integration would terminate some extra-curricular activities, particularly those of a social nature. There exists considerable anxiety on the part of parents of white girls about their safety and welfare."

W(4165) N(3107)
"The difficulty of supervision would lead to the elimination of many activities and the curtailment of others."

W(3228) N(2515)
"The school could not sponsor social activites, including folk dancing and similar activities. Junior-Senior banquets and school dances would have to be abolished."

W(1408) N(2212) I(230)
"Everything other than the baccalaureate and graduation exercises would have to be discontinued. Bus trips to Washington, Raleigh, Chapel Hill, Durham, to any college, Jr.-Sr. Banquet, Jr.-Sr. Prom, Junior or Senior Play, any dance, class picnic or party in fact, anything even bordering on the social would have to be cut out."

W(2795) N(1111)
"The many phases of a good extra-curriculum program include social, cultural, personal, and small-group activities. A radical and sudden change in the pattern would make it difficult to administer effectively most, if not all, extra-curricular activities, in my opinion."

W(3901) N(777)
"In athletics some occasional trouble would arise. In all other group activities an integrated program would encounter trouble whether in day or night time."

W(9983) N(4822)
"(a) The choice would be, racial amalgamation or no social activities.
(b) The Negroes' earlier physical development would give him a great advantage in athletics to the detriment of the white pupil.
(c) The racial characteristics of Negro music would be submerged and rendered less attractive in mixed groups, as happens in the north.
(d) Clubs, societies and travel groups would have to accept the Negro or the Negro would lose all that they now have of their own in agencies to develop leadership and self confidence. Now all Negro high school organizations have Negro leaders, (and they are excellent). The cases of leadership would be rare if amalgamation were attempted.
(e) Class meetings in homes of parents would be difficult to arrange."

W(1835) N(None) I(393)
"In a social way."

W(1571) N(2236)
"Race hatred and bitterness would soon develop."

W(6468) N(4337)
"It would not only seriously affect extra-curricular activities, it would bring an end to such activities. We would not be foolish enough to have a mixed audience of white and Negro parents to observe such an activity. Our graduation exercises

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

would be simply to hand the diploma to seniors on the last day of school and wish them well. A class party or dance would be out of the question. It would bring an end to all extra-curricular activities."

W(1000) N(675)
"All social activities of our schools would have to be discontinued."

W(2272) N(2638)
"I think it would affect the extra-curricular activities due to their nature, more than it would the regular curriculum. I believe that with integration it would be necessary to curtail greatly all extra-curricular activities."

W(3250) N(1288)
"In the Negro schools as they are now, leaders are selected and have a chance to lead. In a mixed school, these chances would fade out of the picture. They would be losing the chances they now have. This would seriously injure the Negro children and hamper the chances of all others."

W(675) N(764)
"They would probably be abolished since white pupils would refuse to participate, with rare exception. Actually, there would likely be no white pupils, or few, in the 'mixed' school."

W(1270) N(1090)
"Many of the extra curricula activities are social in nature. We would have to eliminate many of the activities as they are now."

W(3388) N(329)
"Actually this is what our people are concerned about. It is the extra-curricular, especially social activities in our schools that the parents are concerned about. What about your Junior-Senior proms? What about your football-basketball coca-cola parties? How would you handle your junior-senior banquets? How about cafeteria and lunchroom situations? This breaking down of the racial and social barriers and throwing the children together in intimate social and personal contact will lead to love and affection with inter-marriage. Then you have what Hitler said, 'A Mongrel Race'."

W(999) N(1062)
"It might not in the purely academic activities but it would in all of the social activities. Our people are not ready to accept mixed parties, dances, and other social activities."

W(1550) N(107)
"In the extra-curricular activities, music, athletics, and dramatics, there would be contact with the general public where controls are much more difficult than in regular classroom activity."

W(1787) N(1575)
"It would be most difficult to have any type of extra-curricular activities."

W(2342) N(2685)
"Integration of the races would require many changes in existing school organization, including the entire program of pupil activities."

W(9335) N(1587)
"I think the danger of real trouble would be greatest in what we consider the social phase of school life."

W(3137) N(2210)
"Extra-curricular activities are different. Individual differences would increase. In many instances, I believe the white children would refuse to accept the Negro children unless force was applied."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"If children of different races attend the same school, I believe that many problems dealing with extra curricular activities will be increased. It will take an extensive educational program and much time before Negro and white children will be able to carry on school activities in mixed groups."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(2409) N(562)
"We consider this one of the most difficult problems, with the most serious results, that we would have to face."

W(8669) N(644)
"It would definitely curtail all student activity that is based on voluntary student participation."

W(13,996) N(1604)
"All social events will be called off."

W(8331) N(4023)
"Would eliminate all social activities."

O

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 15 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

> "Would, in your opinion, such immediate integration of the races cause parents in large numbers to withdraw their children from such schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(2373) N(4419)
"Not permanently."

W(1132) N(118)
"Not in large numbers, but some would do so."

W(1878)
"Not in large numbers, but there would be several."

W(9783) N(2305)
"It is not believed that large numbers would withdraw but there would be some withdrawal of children who would be sent to private schools."

W(11,458) N(4441)
"I think there would be little withdrawal from the local schools. I anticipate that a number of people would request transfers where a sizeable percentage of Negro pupils has been enrolled."

W(2571) N(1559)
"We could anticipate a temporary withdrawal but absence of other school facilities would probably force the return of pupils to public schools."

W(3330) N(2681)
"They might for a few days or weeks. There is no place for many of them to go. Eventually they would return."

W(2629) N(953)
"I am quite certain that some parents would withdraw their children from mixed schools. I do not feel at the present time that the number would be large."

W(2795) N(1111)
"My 'no' answer is based on the small number and capacity of private schools in North Carolina where the public schools have been and are effective and upon the cost of instruction in private schools. I believe many parents would eventually make the change, withdrawing children from public schools, as quickly as conditions would permit."

P

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 15 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"Would, in your opinion, such immediate integration of the races cause parents in large numbers to withdraw their children from such schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(3494) N(4163)
"From what is now happening in Washington, D. C., Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, and West Virginia, I am sure that the parents in ..... County would not for a moment accept integration."

W(6211) N(1837)
"I believe that most parents would send their children to school, since they would have little alternative to do otherwise."

W(1755) N(1030)
"Many white parents have expressed themselves."

W(2460) N(2597)
"Our people are not prepared to accept integrated schools. I am curious to know how we can prepare them."

W(9127) N(257)
"In some schools. Take ..... for instance. This school covers a large area of the mountain section of our county. They are looking for an excuse to keep their children out, and do. Many would stay out. I have already been told in no uncertain terms that when Negro children come in the whites will go out."

W(2774) N(3036)
"We cannot anticipate the duration of the withdrawals, but it would require strict force to compel attendance."

W(1826) N(1190)
"Yes, if immediate. No, if gradual."

W(2297) N(397)
"Not in large numbers. Most parents would have no choice if their children are to attend school anywhere."

W(3885) N(74)
"Parents in large numbers are strongly opposed to the Integration to the public schools."

W(2301) N(1702)
"Parents have told me that they will start private tuition schools if the integration program is carried out now."

W(2262) N(1835)
"Several ..... Club members—good, solid, substantial citizens—have told me that they would pay any price to send their children to all-white private schools."

W(2796) N(782)
"Many who could afford it would send their children to private schools."

W(6724) N(1827)
"Sufficient evidence is coming to us from 'fringe' areas such as Delaware to indicate that parents would protest and withdraw their children from schools. If there are protests there, there could be violence in the deep south."

W(3281) N(811)
"This would happen at first, but later the children would return."

W(2398) N(875)
"Most would not stay away long. Those who could would send their children to private schools."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"I cannot conceive of there being enough law enforcement in this county to make the majority of the people send their children to integrated schools. Most of them will stop school.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

As many as can will either move their place of residence or send their children away from home to private schools."

W(3256) N(1455)
"Parents would withdraw their children from school."

W(1795) N(194)
"Financial ability considered—would either send to private school or take them out of school to avoid possible trouble or violence?"

W(420) N(333)
"A large number have voiced the opinion that they would send the children to private schools."

W(17,926) N(7984)
"Even the attempt at integration in the parochial schools in ..... has had that effect."

W(2703) N(7753)
"I have heard many people make this statement."

W(4548) N(916)
"They would move to those sections where there is no Negro population."

W(9983) N(4822)
"(a) In the north, few parents who can afford the cost of private schools send their children to mixed schools, if the percentage of Negroes is appreciable. Note: Please name a northern school system that has an acceptable or tolerable plan of mixed schools.
(b) Parents who are able move away from districts with mixed schools.
(c) Religious and private groups are already preparing space to take care of a major exodus from the public schools.
(d) Many parents are making plans for private school education for their children in case the integration takes place.

This would cause a social caste system that would be most un-democratic."

W(3901) N(777)
"Rural and textile people will not readily integrate; and urban people will not too readily do so. Most people regardless of race are pleased with present segregation basis."

W(1408) N(2212) I(230)
"Parents of both races would refuse to send their children to mixed schools. Quite a number of Negro parents in ..... County have stated that they would not send their children for fear of trouble."

W(3228) N(2515)
"It would probably lead to rapid growth of private schools."

W(4165) N(3107)
"Many parents who are financially able would send their children to private schools. This would mean the loss of the support for public education of a rather influential group of our citizens."

W(6487) N(2276)
"I have heard many parents say they would enroll their children in private schools, if possible, before they would allow them to attend classes in which there were Negro children."

W(638) N(721)
"If physical violence would not predominate and prevent integration previously."

W(1550) N(107)
"The issue might be used for a while as an excuse for a few who would just as soon their children stay at home. We have few families who could or would try to send their children to private schools."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(999) N(1062)
"A number of parents have already told me that they will send their children to a private school if non-segregation ever becomes a fact in the public schools. This would be a serious blow to public school morale if the well-to-do send their children to all white schools and the poorer classes have to send their children to non-segregated schools."

W(3388) N(329)
"The parents in withdrawing their children from school would not necessarily send them to another school. There would be a vast number who would take advantage of our unsettled situation to keep them out of school, thereby carrying out a latent wish always held by them. There are a few parents, not over 10% who would try to get their children into private or parochial schools. In our part of the country we do have Missouri Lutheran church schools."

W(3250) N(1288)
"The wealthy or those who could afford to do so would send their children to private schools. The poor whites would be at a great disadvantage. This would cause us to have the high grade and the low grade among the whites. India has enough of the caste system. We need to avoid this."

W(2272) N(2638)
"The reactions in West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland and the District of Columbia are only minor compared to the withdrawal of children from school by parents that would take place here."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"Statements by political and community leaders have indicated that there might be two elements of our population who would not withdraw their children from schools; these being, namely; the less fortunate whites and low-moral Negroes. My personal opinion is that our system of public schools would be destroyed and only those referred to above would attend school for the novelty created, and as soon as this became old to them, they would revert to their present mode of living where the attendance laws have to be constantly exercised at the present time."

W(7118) N(5259)
"The number would depend upon other facilities available. Some would perhaps withdraw them in the absence of any facilities unless forced by law to send them."

W(5120) N(1683)
"Nearly all parents of white children would withdraw their children from school at first, but some would later allow their children to attend with reluctance. The attendance laws could not be enforced. There would be demand for abolishing all compulsory school attendance laws. There would be agitation for reduced school appropriations and probably complete abolition of the public school system."

W(3270) N(409)
"I would consider 100 or more children to be large numbers."

W(1000) N(675)
"Private classes will be organized with some of our older and better teachers leaving the public schools for this type of work."

W(6468) N(4337)
"Poorly equipped private schools with poorly trained teachers would be the result. Our schools would lose the gains of forty years within a year. Some of our churches are now planning to establish private schools. The families with above average income would attend those. The children of the poor would attend no school at all."

W(1571) N(2236)
"Remarks by parents in recent conversations."

W(1835) N(None) I(393)
"In our district we already have one first to eighth grade

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

parochial school. If immediate integration is ordered, we will have many, many more children to attend these church schools."

W(1821) N(428)
"Only a few."

W(696) N(157)
"Even the large element of our ..... population which come here from Northern states would likely enter their children in private schools. There have been some meetings already in this area to consider forming a private school here. Some of those who have publicly endorsed integration in the name of 'equal rights,' etc., attended such a meeting. Some of my teachers were invited."

W(1130) N(811)
"They would either withdraw children or refuse to allow Negro children in now-all-white-schools."

W(1139) N(750)
"Feeling here, with our large percentage of Negroes, is bound to be greater than that displayed in Delaware, Baltimore, and Washington. Private schools would get some of our children from wealthier families. Others would boycott the schools."

W(2577) N(148)
"Some parents would withdraw their children and send them to another school or even move to another part of town."

W(7416) N(148)
"This might depend to some degree on the reaction in other localities."

W(4194) N(3378)
"We have had several parents who have said in the event of integration of the races that they would withdraw their children from public schools and send them to private schools.

Many of the white parents have said that they would do all in their power to prevent the mixing of the races."

W(2125) N(15) I(113)
"Many parents have stated that they will refuse to allow their children to attend school with the colored people."

W(8669) N(644)
"To attend private schools and other public schools that would not have any Negroes. (Some of our elementary school districts do not have any Negroes living in them.)

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"I have talked with many parents relative to the problems connected with integration of races in our public schools. I have not met the first parent that is willing to send his child to any school where other than white children are present. I am confident that our white patrons would withdraw their children from our schools."

W(3137) N(2210)
"As stated before, I believe the white children would walk out and it would take force to make them attend."

W(9335) N(1587)
"I've heard some say that."

W(15,551) N(410)
"It is my opinion that the enrollment in private schools would increase rapidly."

W(1926) N(533)
"All parents financially able to do so will send children to private schools. Many parents will have to be forced to send their children to school."

W(6631) N(313)
"Many will withdraw their children from such schools and organize private schools where they are able to finance it. Others will keep them at home."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(8112) N(2177)
"One private school has already begun operation."

W(8331) N(4023)
"Some would send to private schools others would use the issue as a basis for non-attendance."

W(5542) N(3469)
"I cannot predict what will happen."

Q

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 16 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "Is there such difference in the average attainments between white and Negro children as to seriously impair instruction in mixed schools?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(3168) N(3059)
"Equal school plant facilities will provide equal instructional program."

W(3901) N(777)
"I do not believe that ability of pupils in either race would have much influence in either segregating or not segregating."

W(3669)
"The small number of colored children to be absorbed would make little difference."

W(6253) N(50)
"Not enough affected."

W(2460) N(2597)
"I do not know how to answer. There is not as much difference as the white people think there is."

W(9127) N(257)
"I don't think so."

W(1826) N(1190)
"The range of achievement and intelligence may be some greater, but this would be no great handicap."

W(2297) N(397)
"The average attainment is somewhat lower in our Negro schools, but there is a wide variation in any grade and we have learned somewhat to teach pupils on their own level."

W(11,458) N(4441)
"The average is only about one to two grades. The spread in any regular grade is much greater than that."

W(2125) N(15) I(113)
"Our one colored teacher is a very fine teacher. Her pupils compare favorably with the white children, who have about the same opportunities."

W(8669) N(644)
"There is not as much difference in this county as in many others due to the fact that the Negro child in this county has had better educational opportunities than many of our white children. The average intelligence of our Negroes is above that of many other sections."

R

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 16 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

"Is there such difference in the average attainments between white and Negro children as to seriously impair instruction in mixed schools?"

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(2256) N(1506)
"We feel that Negro children are almost two grades behind white children; that is, the Negro 10th grader could not do the work of the white 9th grade and would have to be sent to the 8th."

W(3375) N(2733)
"The educational background of children has a tremendous influence on the level of the attainment in the various grades in any school system. The average educational level of Negro parents and homes is far below that of whites. That would have a tendency in the average case to set up serious difficulties of attainment at the various grade levels."

W(5074) N(1287)
"We have records covering 18 years and they show considerable difference. Our achievement records show Negro children are over 2 years behind whites by the time they reach 8th grade. These are continuous records—given and kept by trained testing persons."

W(4427) N(26)
"This question is debatable, but there is some evidence to the effect that average attainment differs between the races."

W(1523) N(1455)
"According to standard tests, the white children will average two years above the Negro children in achievement."

W(3534) N(646)
"Achievement scores of tests given to colored and white children in the 4th and 6th grades during 1953-54 showed differences as follows:

4th Grade—White children scored an average of 1.6 (nearly 2 years) higher than colored.
6th Grade—White children scored an average of .9 (full year) higher than colored.
On Grade Expectancy, white children scored an average of 1.4 (1 year, 4 months) higher than colored children in the 6th grade.
In the 2nd grade, white children scored an average of .8 (nearly a year) higher than colored children."

W(2373) N(4419)
"This is one of the major problems."

W(2262) N(1835)
"Our I. Q. Test records and achievement test records show a great gulf in the average ability of any given Negro group as contrasted with a similar grade, or group, of white children."

W(2796) N(782)
"In general, I do not believe the degree of excellence or attainment is found in the average colored school that is expected in white schools. If mixed, children of like grades would likely range even more than they do now in the individual schools. Proper classification of students will probably bring forth cries of 'discrimination'."

W(6724) N(1827)
"We have evidence from test records that the achievement of the average colored student is about two years below the average for white children."

W(3281) N(811)
"My observation in both white and Negro schools leads me to this conclusion."

W(9619) N(7122)
"Last year, a Stanford Achievement Test was given during the 7th school month to all the white and Negro children in the 5th and 7th grades of the city schools. The normal score for the average 5th grade child at that period in the school year should have been 5.7 (5 years and 7 months of school), and for the child in the 7th grade, 7.7. When these tests were scored and checked, we found the results indicated below:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Fifth Grade

	White	Negro
Median Chronological age	11 yrs. 2 mos.	11 yrs. 4 mos.
Median I. Q.	99	85
Median Achievement Level	5.8	4.6

Seventh Grade

	White	Negro
Median Chronological Age	13 yrs. 2 mos.	13 yrs. 4 mos.
Median I. Q.	98	85
Median Achievement Level	7.7	6.7

These test results indicate quite clearly that in these two grades the Negro children, while 2 months older than the white children in the same grade, have, on the average, lower intelligent quotients, and their grade achievement (the ability to do the work of a particular grade) is from a year (7.7 - 6.7) to a year and 2 months (5.8 - 4.6) below that of the white children of that grade."

W(1878)
"This answer is not based on observation; it is merely my own opinion."

W(2603) N(7753)
"Generally speaking, the attainment of pupils in a given grade is lower in the Negro schools than in the white schools."

W(17,926) N(7984)
"In the high schools the difference in grade level amounts, on the average, to 3-5 grades."

W(1795) N(194)
"Check the results made in ..... Tests (..... Co.). Levels of attainment at present would increase our problems? Please note—I am giving only a small number of reasons—with question marks, as no time allotted for proofs, etc. Many more valid reasons are applicable, I am sure."

W(3256) N(1455)
"It would seriously impair instruction and achievement. The requirements for promotion in Negro schools seem to be lower than those of the whites. This being true, it would seriously retard the achievement and the level of instruction several decades.

W(13,032) N(3557)
"We have had, down through the years, evidence to show that the Negro students are two or three grades behind the white students, on a basis of objective test results. The results show that the difference is greater, the higher in the grade level, even though the selection of the Negro students in the higher grades, due to the loss from schools of those who don't succeed in school, is decidedly in favor of the Negroes. There are greater differences in experiences, background, etc., than in the subject matter field between the Negroes and whites."

W(2398) N(875)
"Standard test scores do indicate from one to two years difference."

W(8578) N(3442)
"Almost any good test given anywhere in the State would substantiate this answer."

W(3295) N(1900)
"There is a difference in cultural achievement of white and Negro children largely because of environmental background. White children as a rule at a given age have larger vocabularies and have developed more concepts which enable them to learn new subject matter more rapidly. This information is factual and has been obtained from administering objective achievement tests."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(5707) N(1147)
"This answer based on test score given over a period of years."

W(7118) N(5259)
"The results of all standard tests which we give to both races show the average Negro pupil as two grades behind the average white pupil."

W(755) N(522)
"This reply is based upon the scores made by students on standard achievements given twice each year."

W(2812) N(1868)
"Test results and observations indicate conclusively that achievement of Negro children is below that of whites. Economic and social history have possibly been contributory factors. It is my opinion that the same comparison between white and Negro teachers would produce similar conclusions."

W(4548) N(916)
"The great majority of Negro children do not have the home background and mental ability to compete with white children of the same age. Some do have high intelligence and could compete most successfully."

W(5120) N(1683)
"Some of the Negro children could keep pace with the white children in scholastic attainment, especially those of mixed blood, but on the average, the ability of the Negro group would be much lower than the white. This would tend to accentuate the problem of maintaining a high standard of scholastic attainment."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"Not only is there a major difference in the average attainments between white and Negro children, there is a radical difference in hereditary and environmental backgrounds. The major percentage of our white people are what could be referred to as 'country gentlemen' and most have tremendous property holdings with Negroes and Indians serving as tenants and tillers of the soil. It would be in total violation of established tradition for Negroes, Indians and whites to associate on a compatible basis and I, in all sincerity, cannot foresee this barrier being removed wholly or partially within the present life tenure of our people."

W(2774) N(3036)
"Economic, social, educational, and cultural backgrounds make for a tremendous difference."

W(1937) N(928)
"Our achievement tests show about two years difference in achievement. The Negroes are that much lower than whites."

W(3885) N(74)
"Results of standard tests indicate average Negro child is below the average white child in scholastic attainments."

W(9783) N(2305)
"A study of results of achievement tests and mental ability tests indicates a wide difference in ability and achievement between the white and Negro children."

W(8900) N(272)
"At present, yes."

W(6211) N(1837)
"Supt. ..... of ..... got out an interesting study on this in the ..... schools."

W(5928) N(777)
"The Negro, from the fourth grade through the twelfth, will average two years below the white child in the age-grade."

W(4224) N(66)
"I frankly believe that the white children have far greater abilities to progress than Negroes; therefore, this would surely impair progress."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(3494) N(4163)
"Here is where we would really be criticized for discrimination, for I think that the average Negro eighth grade student would be from one to two years behind the white eighth grade student because of three reasons—(1) native intelligence, (2) poorer teachers, and (3) poorer school attendance on the part of the Negro. I think that we would necessarily have to call upon some impartial organization, such as NEA to test all the children for grade placement."

W(1755) N(1030)
"Standard Tests (mental achievement, readiness, etc.) and supervision clearly show this to be true."

W(2460) N(2597)
"I do not know how to answer—there is not as much difference as the white people think there is."

W(1778) N(619)
"In our administrative unit Negro children are retarded on the average two years as measured by any Standard Test we have given."

W(6465) N(1449)
"The 1950-51 Survey conducted by the North Carolina State Department of Public Instruction in ..... County found a wide difference in educational achievement between white and Negro school children in ..... County."

W(16,038) N(2,354)
"Our tests prove so."

W(2795) N(1111)
"My 'yes' answer does not refer to intellectual capacity when opportunities have been comparable for an extended period of time. However, a sudden or immediate integration would, I think, necessarily lower standards."

W(9983) N(4822)
"This is a major problem far beyond the conception of even the most extreme Southerner.

(a) The North has attracted the higher bracket in intelligence of Negro citizens.

(b) Negroes who become specialists, college professors, or pass Civil Service, go to centers of Negro and Government jobs. This has left the deep South with the average and below masses. These are, however, the most loyal and dependable American citizens of the race. (Anyone who would think of Washington, D. C. as the place to 'model' the racial integration program is too naive to be taken seriously in the solution of the Negro problem. For many decades all southern communities have been sending their top half (mentally) of the Negro race to Washington for Government jobs. Also, Raleigh, Durham, Greensboro, et cetera, would have a much larger percentage of high I. Q. Negroes than you would find in the typical southern town."

W(1408) N(2212) I(230)

"Five years ago a battery of tests was given to our Negro Supervisor to administer to the fourth and fifth grades. They are still on a shelf in her office. Why didn't she give them? She didn't want a comparison made with tests given to same grades in the white schools. It is my studied opinion, based on observation and checking school papers at random, that the Negro children in ..... County will rate at least 3 grades below the white children on the average. For additional confirmation see statistics from the ..... Schools that can be furnished by Superintendent ....., and the never-released report of the Educational Commission that made studies in several selected counties and cities."

W(3228) N(2515)

"Standard achievement test results in our local elementary schools show white pupils approximately a year above the national norm, while our Negro pupils are approximately two years below the norm. An average variance of three years in a given grade would work an extreme hardship on teachers and pupils alike."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(4165) N(3107)
"On a grade level of achievement it would mean that approximately 75% of the Negro pupils would be demoted one grade level."

W(6487) N(2276)
"Our Negro Supervisor has expressed the opinion that she feels it would be unfair competition for the Negro children to be in the same classrooms with whites. She based this statement on the fact that the Negroes have only had a relatively short educational history and that their background and opportunities have been more limited. She feels that there are some Negro children who could 'hold their own', but that the group as a whole could not."

W(696) N(157)
"Partially in upper grades."

W(1130) N(811)
"Negro principals in this unit agree that the average Negro school child is from two to five years behind the average white child in the same grade."

W(1139) N(750)
"Negro pupils are an average of two grades below white pupils. This was proved by an achievement test we gave all 6th grade pupils several years ago."

W(2577) N(148)
"In the upper grades, 7 to 12, there is about 2 years difference in achievement of the two races in each grade level."

W(1835) N(None) I(393)
"Enough difference to pose a problem."

W(638) N(721)
"About 1 grade level difference now, but rapidly approaching equal."

W(3388) N(329)
"We have in the past given tests recommended by the State Department on a county-wide basis and have discovered that there is at least a year and one-half to two years difference in the attainment in the same age and grade groups (I admit it has been three years since this comparative study was made). Our people believe that we will in our schools, pull the white child down to the Negro child, rather than bring the colored child to the white child's level. More than likely what would happen is that the Negro child and the white child would probably meet on the level somewhere between the top and the bottom—the white child down a little and the colored child up a little."

W(3250) N(1288)
"I have noticed that black birds do not associate with red birds. They live in the same big world and have the same opportunities. They just like to roost in different trees. The Maker perhaps arranged this. I have observed that the mental capacities of children of the white race are superior."

W(1000) N(675)
"Placement tests will have to be given the children in order to do the right thing for all children. This will mean that a large percentage of Negro children will be placed together even in white schools."

W(2272) N(2638)
"I think that the span of difference is great enough to seriously impair the instructional program."

W(1571) N(2236)
"Observation of work and tests made in white and Negro schools indicates that to classify them for successful teaching would develop such a great social problem that instruction would be greatly hampered."

W(675) N(764)
"Standard tests administered show that there are wide varia-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

tions between the groups. While there are variations within the races the 'spread' is magnified."

W(1270) N(1090)
"We gave standard tests last year (1953-54): White I. Q. average, 100. Negro I. Q. average, 80. The whole program of academic work would have to be adjusted downward."

W(1787) N(1585)
"The white pupils usually average about two grades above the Negro pupils according to standard tests when the upper grammar grades are reached."

W(1831) N(235)
"The teachers in the Negro schools and the children of same are both considerably lower in attainment."

W(8661) N(3624)
"Various tests (achievement) administered over the years show a marked difference in attainment between white and Negro children in the same grades."

W(2694) N(1492)
"The average I. Q. score in 1953-54 for the county as a whole was: White, 91.6; Negro, 82.0."

W(4781) N(715)
"Recent achievement tests show that Negro children are below white children here in attainment for each individual grade."

W(1821) N(428)
"But the gap is decreasing."

W(999) N(1062)
"Possibly 20% or 25% of the Negro children would fit into the pattern all right, but for the masses of Negro children they would be misfits. I am sure that an inferiority complex would develop if they were forced to mix with white children in their classes. This would result in a serious handicap for the Negro children."

W(3693) N(197)
"Standard tests reveal a difference of a whole year."

W(2571) N(1559)
"Annual testing program conducted for the past several years shows a variation in achievement becoming more pronounced with each successive grade. Average achievement of Negro pupils in the eighth grade is two years, four months below average achievement of white pupils in eighth grade (1953-54)."

W(6631) N(313)
"The colored would be in grades about one year behind the white ones. Mainly because of home conditions, lack of books and newspapers and general conditions."

W(1626) N(533)
"I believe this to be true in this school unit at present. With proper equipment and facilities children of equal mental abilities can obtain equal attainment. As a whole the percentages of mental abilities in the Negro children indicate lower abilities at present in the Negro school than in the white."

W(9335) N(1587)
"Tests show Negro children considerably behind white children in the same grades."

W(3137) N(2210)
"Standard of living of the whites higher than that of the Negroes."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"According to test and other information available there is a noticeable gap between the average attainment of white

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

pupils and Negro pupils. Therefore, the problem of child placement would become more acute."

W(2409) N(562)
"Very definitely a difference."

W(2342) N(2685)
"The evidence available, which includes the statistical evidence of achievement and other tests, reveals such wide range in achievement of white and Negro pupils as to require extensive class and grade re-organization for instructional purposes, should the races be mixed."

Total enrollment: (3400)
"Negroes low in achievement. Tested this month."

W(2629) N(953)
"Even though we have a number of children in the Negro school who rank favorably with children in white schools because of background and home environment, this would not be true of the average."

W(3330) N(2681)
"In our opinion the average white pupil is a better pupil than the Negro student, by at least a year."

W(8331) N(4023)
"However this might be more easily overcome than other problems."

W(4083) N(2344)
"This is where the real damage would be done to public education in North Carolina."

S

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 17 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

> "Would, in your opinion, white children or their parents elect to attend any school heretofore conducted for Negro children?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(6211) N(1837)
"Very, very few. Some folk here from other sections of the U. S. might let their children do so just to 'make a point'."

T

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 17 of the questionnaire which reads as follows:

> "Would, in your opinion, white children or their parents elect to attend any school heretofore conducted for Negro children?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(2795) N(1111)
"I believe this would be too much of an adjustment to be made immediately."

W(9983) N(4822)
"(a) A few of our preachers, 'do-gooders,' communists, politicians and college professors have indicated that they would do so.
(b) From 90% to 95% of our people would go to any extreme to resist any attempt to do so. ..... has a situation that would require just such a student placement if the court edict is carried out."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(3228) N(2515)
"It is very unlikely that such a choice would be made."

W(696) N(157)
"There is no likelihood whatsoever that they would either elect or be compelled to attend the present Negro school."

W(1130) N(811)
"Definitely no, in the same manner that they do not want Negro children attending schools previously used by white children."

W(2301) N(1702)
"In this area there might be 10 percent of the parents who would allow their children to attend mixed schools."

W(1051) N(441)
"Nor do we think Negro children would elect to attend the white schools."

W(2256) N(1506)
"White children will not attend Negro schools, law or no law."

W(4427) N(26)
"Question 17 implies an option. If such an option exists in the future, there is no question as to what the people will elect—to retain the status quo."

W(2262) N(1835)
"School Board members tell me (we have 9) that we cannot possibly assign white children to our present all-Negro schools."

W(6724) N(1827)
"This matter would be bitterly contested."

W(7118) N(5259)
"If this school were still staffed by Negro principal and teachers and the majority of its students Negroes, I do not believe a white parent will send his child there. I believe he will suffer any penalty of the law rather than do it."

W(1132) N(118)
"In my opinion, not a single white student would attend a school which had been used as a Negro school."

W(1878) N(0)
"This would never work here."

W(17,926) N(7984)
"No one has expressed himself in such a vein."

W(1795) N(194)
"These buildings have generally been located in or near the colored or Negro center of population—and in small communities (some at least) these are outlying areas."

W(3256) N(1455)
"They would not go to the colored building."

W(13,032) N(3557)
"Any parent in this area who would do such would be looked upon as a fanatic, and I am quite sure that he would be."

W(3295) N(1900)
"It will be most difficult for the Board of Education to succeed in getting white children to attend schools heretofore known as Negro schools. If there must be integration, it will be much less difficult to have children of both races attend schools heretofore for white children."

W(2812) N(1868)
"Cannot envision such election."

W(5120) N(1683)
"Definitely NO!"

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(4548) N(916)
"For any white child or parent in our unit to accept this is very doubtful."

W(1006) N(1100) I(1127)
"The consensus of opinion is that the white parents would allow their children to grow up without the benefit of the normal school instructional benefits or send them to private schools if such does come into existence. And many have stated that they would teach their children themselves before they would send them to a Negro school or allow them to attend a white school that has admitted Negroes. The feeling of 95% of our parents would be, whether right or wrong, that it would be an unforgivable disgrace and, thus, will not accept it."

W(1755) N(1030)
"Parents have begun to change their residences."

W(9127) N(257)
"No! Is the answer."

W(2460) N(2597)
"You might have a small minority that could do this but public sentiment would frown on this step by any family in the community."

W(4224) N(66)
"I am certain beyond any doubt of this."

W(2774) N(3036)
"Other observations support the above answer."

W(1937) N(928)
"They are just not going to do it."

W(999) N(1062)
"Customs and habits are not that easily changed."

W(1550) N(107)
"The location of the school in a small all Negro community would negate this problem."

W(8661) N(3624) I(91)
"Most Negro schools have been surrounded by a Negro community."

W(1571) N(2236)
"It would be difficult to keep them in the buildings they are now in if Negro children were allowed to enter."

W(675) N(764)
"Parents object to moving anything from a Negro school to a white school and certainly would react even more to their children attending the Negro school."

W(2272) N(2638)
"It could only be done by extreme force."

W(3250) N(1288)
"The white people refuse to use school books which have been used by the Negroes. They refuse to ride busses which have been used by the Negroes. They cannot stand the scent. Pharoah's army could not make them enter a school building which has been used by the Negroes."

W(3388) N(329)
"Our one Negro school building is average so far as comfort, equipment and all those working tools that go to make up a good school. Practically all of the children that would use the Negro school plant would have to be transported, since it lies a mile and one-fourth outside of the ..... school district, the town of ..... and the ..... white school plant. This building could probably be integrated into the ..... school facilities as a grammar grade unit, since we have enough children in the ..... school to fill all classrooms in the Negro school by simply moving four sixth grades, four seventh grades and four eighth grades to this building. As for white parents selecting a school in which there were Negro children, that is entirely out of the question."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(6468) N(4337)
"They would not attend such schools even if it meant no schools at all for their children."

W(13,996) N(1604)
"Not for the first few years."

W(7175) N(6916)
"Not at this time, though some of our buildings for Negro children are better than for whites in some districts."

W(11,458) N(4441)
"Not now."

W(6631) N(313)
"No matter how adequate and if equal in all respects to the white ones, it would be next to impossible to get them to go."

W(1926) N(533)
"They would go only after a complete renovation of the plant."

W(5347) N(2210)
"I think this is a recognized fact."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"Many schools heretofore used for Negro children will not be used for white people in our area."

W(2409) N(562)
"By no means."

W(3330) N(2681)
"They just wouldn't go!"

W(8331) N(4023)
"There would be some for sake of novelty."

U

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "No" to question number 18 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "In the event that the Supreme Court should decree that there should be a gradual adjustment brought about from the existing segregated system of public schools to a system not based on color distinction, and provided that sufficient length of time were allowed for such gradual adjustment, would the schools of your unit be better able to cope with the problems presented by such a decision?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(1550) N(107)
"Our action should follow the State pattern. If the action is inevitable I do not believe that prolonging it will help. We are in the process of building and the present uncertainty is complicating our problem."

W(4194) N(3378)
"It is my opinion that it would be better to operate just as we are now with separate schools for white and Negro students. That is the opinion of the principals of our three consolidated Negro schools."

W(5417) N(766)
"I shudder when I think of what may and probably will happen when the Supreme Court hands down its decree implementing its previous decision with reference to segregation in public schools."

W(2571) N(1559)
"We do not think that integration would be for the best interest of either white pupils or Negro. Gradual integration

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

merely introduces the element of time and we do not believe that time will correct a basic mistake. The people may finally accept integration on a gradual basis, but it is our opinion that the distaste for and resentment of such action will not disappear."

(Total 3400)
"Perhaps 15 to 20 years from now."

W(2342) N(2685)
"The proportion of Negroes to whites is such that even gradual adjustment would be fraught with serious resistance and resultant interruption of the school program. I have no reason to believe that gradualism would be any more acceptable than immediate integration."

W(8112) N(2177)
"The answer can only be 'perhaps'."

W(2774) N(3036)
"Of course gradual adjustment would be better than a sudden attempt, but any movement toward adjustment will produce tremendous difficulties in our county."

W(3919) N(2223)
"See no way of implementing the decision."

W(3669)
"Gradual adjustment could hardly apply in our case. What would be considered the first step in gradual adjustment elsewhere, would be total in our case."

W(420) N(333)
"We would have serious problems even if a gradual adjustment should be decreed."

W(1795) N(194)
"It is quite obvious, it seems, that this question is the one with the 'Stinger.' I do not think it has a place in this list—as only one answer is possible and if that is given—and used in your summary—you can quite truthfully say: 'According to our summary, it is agreed that the gradual adjustment is acceptable'—which I think, is misleading and untrue."

W(1006) N(1127) I(1100)
"It depends on the interpretation of the word gradual. If it means that other communities enter into the situation successfully and many years elapse, it might work; however, I honestly, and with all sincerity, doubt if it will ever be workable. I believe it reasonable to state that it will never be workable until there has been a total change in local attitude, and we all know how slowly deep-seated prejudices (whether right or wrong) are modified. Our total picture is that we are facing one of the most destructive decisions ever thrust upon the American people, even greater than were the problems of emancipation."

V

The quotations below are comments made by county and city superintendents of schools in explanation of their answer "Yes" to question number 18 of the questionnaire, which reads as follows:

> "In the event that the Supreme Court should decree that there should be a gradual adjustment brought about from the existing segregated system of public schools to a system not based on color distinction, and provided that sufficient length of time were allowed for such gradual adjustment, would the schools of your unit be better able to cope with the problems presented by such a decision?"

The W, N, or I followed by numerals indicate the white, Negro, or Indian school enrollment of the county and city schools of the superintendent answering the questionnaire.

W(9619) N(7122)
"A gradual adjustment would certainly help school systems to make the transition from segregated to non-segregated schools. It is going to be a difficult job at best. If on top of all the other problems of adjustment which will have to be met, Negro children were thrown in great numbers into the white schools, there would be chaos, as the Negro boys and girls, with very few exceptions, simply cannot do the same quality of work. This would mean that many of these children would fail to pass their work, not because of their color, but for lack of intellectual ability, or background of experience, or both, to do the required classroom work. The Negro parents would then be inclined to accuse the schools of discriminating against them which would not be true in these instances. (The distinguished gentlemen of our Supreme Court, because their experience has had to do with legal matters and not in the area of public education, were naturally not keenly aware of this difference in the general ability and achievement of the two groups.)"

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(3281) N(811)
"This is the only way it will work here."

W(2373) N(4419)
"The 'gradual' would help to adjust the difference in attainments."

W(3534) N(646)
"Provided a separate school to accommodate any colored and white children who might be led to integrate were provided on a trial basis."

W(1523) N(1455)
"We believe only a few Negroes would attempt to enter the schools normally serving the white race. If all schools were open to either white or Negro children, we believe there would be little change in this unit."

W(5074) N(1287)
"Only way out—minimum of 15 years."

W(1164) N(859)
"In my opinion, the Negroes in our school administrative unit are satisfied with their separate school."

W(1490) N(1784)
"I think it would be many years before any appreciable number of Negro students would actually seek admittance to white schools here."

W(2301) N(1702)
"As I said above, 25 years is the minimum time it would take to carry out the integrated program."

W(2262) N(1835)
"This method is the only possible way that I can see for our schools here. Any other plan of integration will, in my opinion, wreck the public schools in our administrative unit."

W(6724) N(1827)
"There is a tendency toward integration. For example, the ministers of our city only this month combined the work of white and Negro ministers in the association of ministers. Because of the good schools which now exist for Negroes, the educational level of the Negro is rapidly going up. It will be much easier to mix white and colored children 10 or 20 years from now than it will be at the present time."

W(5120) N(1683)
"It all depends upon what is meant by 'sufficient length of time.' In my opinion, 100 years would be too short."

W(2117) N(1172)
"Providing the time allowed is sufficient. A year or two would make little difference. On the other hand, if equal facilities are provided over a ten to twenty year period the progress made by Negro schools will appreciably improve the situation. Many people oppose integration just as bitterly on the basis of the low standards that would come about as they do on the basis of racial differences."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(1878)
"I would not be afraid of a gradual adjustment at the high school level."

W(2603) N(7753)
"It is my opinion that it would be most difficult to ever make the adjustment to non-segregated schools. I do believe a sufficient length of time would help to alleviate some of the problems."

W(17,926) N(7984)
"We are making progress. Our principals and supervisors meet together. Small groups of both races meet together in professional meetings and in workshops. Even pupils from both races are cooperating in some areas."

W(3256) N(1455)
"What is a gradual adjustment???? (Number of years??)"

W(13,032) N(3557)
"We are not ready for gradual adjustment to begin at once. Most of our white people are of this opinion. I have talked to many Negro leaders of this county, including teachers and principals. Some of them think that they would be ready to begin integration in about 20 years if they continue to make progress. Before the Negroes of this county will demand integration there will have to be a great deal of agitation from the outside. Apparently that is coming at a rapid rate, from far and near. The agitators that are near are few, but get support from a few, some of whom represent large groups and seem to speak for them, without authority."

W(2398) N(875)
"This is my hope! The first ten years will be the hardest!"

W(3295) N(1900)
"If the leaders of both races can agree on a gradual adjustment, and if our people are not disturbed by outside agitators, the problem will be facilitated."

W(5784) N(5991)
"Funds are not in sight now to build all the facilities needed for our present enrollment. If funds were made available by 1960, we will need five years to build the space needed. No kind of integration can be considered before 1965."

W(6253) N(50)
"Time will help."

W(6940) N(1862)
"I think so."

W(7118) N(5259)
"Obviously we would be better able under these circumstances, but I do not know how well we could cope with the pupils that would be aroused by even a gradual attempt at integration."

W(4548) N(916)
" 'Time' will not make integration more acceptable or desirable, but may help in adjustment."

W(2297) N(397)
"The length of time could not be too short. The situation would still be difficult."

W(2460) N(2597)
"If you mean by gradual adjustment another generation something might be done."

W(3494) N(4163)
"I think that if it has got to come that the shock would be less severe if it came gradually. It is my opinion that it would be best to start at the 12th grade. Here you would have a more select group of Negroes. There would be less opportunity, because of the short time that children would be together, for them to mingle and form friendships that might disturb the parents. At this age, too, you would find the children of both races when they are most tolerant. My nose tells me that the odor is less nauseating as the Negro children advance in the grades."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(2774) N(3036)
"Of course, gradual adjustment would be better than a sudden attempt, but any movement toward adjustment will produce tremendous difficulties in our county."

W(1937) N(928)
"If integration should start with the first grade only and the children grew up together, there would be less trouble than otherwise."

W(3885) N(74)
"The general opinion in this community seems to be that gradual adjustment is the only sensible solution."

W(1826) N(1190)
"It will not work otherwise."

W(1987) N(1303)
"If enough time is permitted. We need 25 years."

W(6211) N(1837)
"Naturally, I assume that our schools would fall into line with the general 'State pattern' which might be established. 95 per cent of our people feel that the Supreme Court made a Great Mistake in their May 17 decision."

W(1755) N(1030)
"A doubtful situation."

W(552) N(371)
"Where to begin, is the '64 dollar question.' Our white people in this county will not tolerate at any grade level, manner, or time, integration of white and Negro children."
"Until white and Negro adults can live together, as the white and Negro children would have to under the integration plan, I see no hope of public schools integrating peacefully."

W(2651) N(344)
"Even with gradual adjustment we have every reason to believe that we will be confronted with serious problems—and as to these problems, I see no reasonable solution at the present time."

W(2905) N(798)
"The gradual transition should be completed 1959-60, beginning with primary grades extending through elementary next two years. First year high school by 1958-59. Complete integration by 1959-60."

W(2577) N(148)
"If left to their own choice, neither race in ..... will want to go to school with the other race for years to come."

W(1139) N(750)
"I honestly think that it will be a long time before the white people of this community will agree to any integration."

W(6487) N(2276)
"This opinion is based on observation of some Negro and white children playing together before their prejudice has had a chance to develop."

W(1408) N(2212) I(230)
"But they would have to have an awfully long time."

W(3901) N(777)
"Gradual adjustment would require a very long time. Forced adjustment will not succeed."

W(2242) N(5125)
"This decision would cause or establish another segregated group. The white financially able to send or establish white or private schools would do so, causing the lower group economically to be forced to integration. This would establish

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

three groups which would cause our section of the country to be divided three ways socially and economically. This would cause people with wealth not to be interested in public education and make it difficult to secure funds to operate our schools. Therefore, I believe that the states and counties should operate, support and control their school system."

W(2795) N(1111)
"Prejudices are acquired, I think; not inherited. A change as radical as has been proposed should by all means be a gradual one if made at all. I believe a gradual pupil integration might be made within a reasonable length of time. I am not so certain about teacher integration even then."

W(9983) N(4822)
"As soon as the citizens see that the communist propaganda as to the equality of the races is false, the reaction will be violent. Too many college pink and red professors, imported socialist writers, and 'do-gooders' religious dreamers have brain-washed our citizens to the point that at first a minority would accept the program. When the true situation becomes apparent, there will be a violent reaction. The testing programs for several decades proves the propaganda false."

W(3228) N(2515)
"It would probably require several decades."

W(696) N(157)
"Any approach other than a gradual approach would be fool-hardy and would show that the honorable gentlemen on the Court did not realize the depth of feeling on this matter."

W(1130) N(811)
"Such a period of gradual adjustment should cover not less than 25 years if it is to be gradual enough. This may not be long enough."

W(4164) N(3107)
"If 'gradual' is interpreted to mean 10 to 25 years—Answer—Yes."

W(1787) N(1575)
"Integration will have a better chance to succeed if it is done gradually. It cannot be done peacefully if done in a hurry. It may not be possible to do it peacefully even if done in a gradual manner."

W(3250) N(1288)
"We are getting along fine with the schools as they are in this county. The Negroes do not want to attend the white schools. They seem to want more prestige. If we can get good facilities for all and are allowed to work out a long range plan, we could better get along and live in some degree of peace; otherwise, there will be no peace. We have this situation: Many Negroes now living in the North are sending their children back to the South for school. Three cases or more like this in one of our schools."

W(6468) N(4337)
"This should be at a 'snail's' pace if it has to come at all. Our people are not ready for it and many of them will have no part of it."

W(3388) N(329)
"This is the only way that it might be accomplished in ..... County. A little at a time. One grade this year and another grade next year. I would suggest that not less than 10 years be given to us in order to bring about compete integration."

W(2272) N(2638)
"This type of integration would cause lots of trouble but it would be better than an attempt of immediate integration."

W(675) N(764)
" 'Sufficient length of time' can be a long time. Just as death postponed is better than death now, so integration postponed

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

is better than integration now. At the moment it appears that integration will not be welcome in the foreseeable future."

W(1571) N(2236)
"Would probably be less people involved at one time but we will have troube in ..... County with any plan to desegregate schools. Much hatred and bitterness will be generated that never existed previously."

W(8661) N(3624) I(91)
"Any extreme change in a social order must be accomplished over a long period of time."

W(999) N(1062)
"Our schools will follow both by choice and by necessity a State pattern. We are part of a State School System and we have no desire to combat the State's policy. I am confident, after serving as school superintendent in ..... for thirty-one years, that even the State cannot wipe out segregation at one fell swoop without seriously impairing the public school system. If non-segregation every comes in North Carolina it will have to be by degress and it will require a long time."

W(3738) N(None)
"It is my opinion that should such be made the law of the land, people would gradually grow to accept it for most people feel that it is morally right to do so but have strong prejudices to overcome in seeing such put into actuality."

W(1835) N(None) I(393)
"We need a terribly long period and I don't believe our people will go along with the integrated schools for many, many years, willingly."

W(1000) N(675)
"Integration beginning with the first grade will greatly lessen the trouble we are all bound to have with this thing."

W(1270) N(1090)
"This cannot be peacefully and successfully done until the people change. At present the majority of both races are against mixing. I have no idea how long 'gradual' means. It must mean when the people change and are willing to accept integration."

W(2694) N(1492)
"The process would have to be very gradual for it to be accepted at all."

W(1831) N(235)
"We yield to the affirmative as to its comparative implication and not as to, in any measure, conceding to sanction."

W(2409) N(562)
"By all means."

W(2629) N(953)
"If enough time were given sufficient preparation could be made in schools of both races for the change. It is my opinion that with a sufficient amount of careful preparation and training on the part of teachers, children, parents, and the public, integration could be accomplished."

W(3330) N(2681)
"Time makes a difference in solving any problem. I suppose a grade at a time would be best."

W(766) N(891)
"This seems to be the only way out."

W(13,996) N(1604)
"Start in the first grades in a few schools (those from whom we could get an approval of the School Committee and P.T.A. leadership). It will take ten or twelve years to get it started in all the schools in our county."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

W(14,452) N(2475)
"In my opinion, this is the only plan which offers hope of a tolerable solution of the problem."

W(7175) N(6916)
"Fifteen or twenty years ago talk of voting by Negroes was considered, 'political heresy' by whites in this area. It is now accepted by change in public opinion."

W(8669) N(644)
"Our people are becoming more tolerant and if given time will work it out."

W(6631) N(313)
"Even then it will take many years. No law can be enforced when public sentiment is opposed to it."

W(1926) N(533)
"To accomplish any change it is necessary to educate the public to the change. An abrupt change of this type can only cause friction until the whites and Negroes are educated for it."

W(3137) N(2210)
"To what degree, I do not know."

W(6314) N(3521) I(250)
"If the Supreme Court should decree that each county or each community be given the opportunity to choose their own school, I do not believe that any racial problems will arise in our unit. Our Negroes and whites are interested in equal but separate facilities. If this desire is met, I believe generally our system will continue to operate without problems."

W(8331) N(4023)
"Much time is needed for children and parents to prepare for integration (at least 10 years)."

EXHIBIT 8

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL AND QUESTIONNAIRE TO SHERIFFS AND CHIEFS OF POLICE, WITH TABULATION OF ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS 1 THROUGH 10, INCLUSIVE.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA
DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
RALEIGH

5 October 1954

To the Sheriffs and Chiefs of Police of North Carolina:

In the re-argument of the school segregation cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, which is scheduled to begin December 6, the Court has requested the answers to two questions which they have submitted, the first relating to the immediate mixing of the races in the public schools and the other to a gradual integration of these schools.

There is enclosed to you herewith two copies of the questionnaire which I am sending to the sheriffs throughout the State and chiefs of police in the larger cities. I will appreciate it if you will answer the questions contained in this questionnaire and return it to me by October 12 if possible. You may retain one copy for your file. Your candid answers to these questions will be of great assistance to me in presenting North Carolina's case to the Supreme Court.

No publication will be made of the answer given by the various sheriffs and chiefs of police to these questions. Only the results will be shown in tabulated form in our brief presented to the Supreme Court. I suggest that no publicity be given to this matter.

Yours very truly,
s/ Harry McMullan
HARRY McMULLAN,
Attorney General

Enclosures

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

QUESTIONS FOR SHERIFFS AND CHIEFS OF POLICE

1. Name of county or city: .....
2. How long have you been engaged in police work? .....

In all of the following questions, assume all white and Negro children are to be assigned to schools nearest their homes without regard to race.

1. Do you think there would be likelihood of violence among racial groups of students which would seriously interfere with the operations of schools in your city or county? (Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—193 No—6 D.K.—1 Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
2. Do you think there would be likelihood of such violence involving parents and others who are not students? (Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—191 No—6 D.K.—3 Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
3. Do you think there would be danger of such violence on school busses or where children wait for busses? (Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—195 No—3 D.K.—2 Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
4. Do you consider your present police force sufficient to preserve the general peace and order in your jurisdiction if such intermixing of white and Negro children in the public schools were to occur? (Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—14 No—182 D.K.—3 Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
5. In your opinion, generally, would parents of white children permit them to attend a school in which a substantial number of the students are Negroes? (Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—4 No—189 D.K.—7 Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
6. In your opinion, would racial conflicts result if white children are disciplined by Negro teachers? (Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—197 No—2 D.K.—1

Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.

7. In your opinion, generally, would parents of Negro children permit them to attend a school in which a substantial number of the students are white?
(Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—111 No—71 D.K.—17
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
8. In your opinion, would racial conflicts result if Negro children are disciplined by white teachers?
(Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—147 No—41 D.K.—7
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
9. In your opinion, would the mixing of the races in the public schools cause such conflicts as to increase the danger of malicious destruction to school property, such as the burning of school buildings or school busses?
(Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—173 No—17 D.K.—8
Make such explanation of your answer as you care to make.
10. If the mixing of the races in public schools were brought about by a gradual process, according to plans of integration considered feasible by local school authorities, in your opinion would the danger of violence in racial clashes be reduced or eliminated?
(Answer "Yes" or "No.") Yes—74 No—108 D.K.—17
11. As the result of your observation and conversations which you have had with citizens of your county or city, do you find the attitude of the majority to be:

	White	Negro
For Segregation	.....	.....
For Non-segregation	.....	.....
Indifferent	.....	.....

(Note: The answers to this question were in such form as to prevent tabulation. Every officer replying indicated that the majority of the people in his jurisdiction favor segregation.)

By: .....

October ....., 1954.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

NOV 15 1954
HAROLD B. WILLEY, Clerk

Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL.,
Appellants,

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.,
On Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Kansas

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL.,
Appellants,

v.

R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.
On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of South Carolina

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL.,
Appellants,

v.

COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.
On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia

FRANCIS B. GEBHART, ET AL.,
Petitioners,

v.

ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.
On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Delaware

BRIEF OF JOHN BEN SHEPPERD, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF TEXAS, AMICUS CURIAE

JOHN BEN SHEPPERD
Attorney General of Texas
BURNELL WALDREP
BILLY E. LEE
J. A. AMIS, JR.
L. P. LOLLAR
J. FRED JONES
JOHN DAVENPORT
JOHN REEVES
WILL DAVIS
Assistants

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
PRELIMINARY STATEMENT	2
Variance of Degree in Which Different Areas Would be Affected	6
Texas Public School System	9
QUESTION FOUR	12
Argument	12
QUESTION FIVE	24
Argument	25
CONCLUSION	28

APPENDICES

APPENDIX I
Map showing concentration of Negro population by counties as shown by the 1950 Federal census.

APPENDIX II
Map showing the number and percentage of Negro scholastics in each county as shown by the 1954-1955 scholastic census.

APPENDIX III
Map showing the concentration of Negro scholastics in general areas, as shown by the 1954-1955 scholastic census.

APPENDIX IV
Questionnaire and evaluated answers relating to views of public school administrators on the problems involved in integration.

APPENDIX V
Alphabetical listing of counties, showing relationship of Negro to white scholastics as based on the 1954-1955 scholastic census.

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES

CASES:	Page
Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U.S. 607 (1944)	27
Alabama Public Service Commission v. Southern Railway Company, 341 U.S. 341 (1951)	22
Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U.S. 27 (1885)	23
Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1942)	26
Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315 (1943)	22
Cumming v. Richmond County Board of Education, 175 U.S. 528 (1899)	3
Far Eastern Conference, United States Lines Co., States Marine Corporation, et al. v. United States and Federal Maritime Board, 342 U.S. 570 (1952)	22
Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 240 U.S. 650 (1916)	21
Hatcher v. State, 125 Tex. 84, 81 S.W. 2d 499 (1935)	14
International Salt Company v. United States, 332 U.S. 392 (1947)	27
Love v. City of Dallas, 120 Tex. 351, 40 S.W. 2d 20 (1931)	14
Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)	26
New Jersey v. City of New York, 283 U.S. 473 (1931)	21
Northern Securities Company v. United States, 193 U.S. 197 (1904)	21
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)	3
Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Company, 312 U.S. 496 (1941)	21
Southwestern Broadcasting Company v. Oil Center Broadcasting Company, 210 S.W. 2d 230 (Tex. Civ. App., 1947, error ref. N.R.E.)	13
Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1 (1911)	21
United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106 (1911)	20

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

	Page
United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876)	5
United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U.S. 131 (1948)	22
University Interscholastic League v. Midwestern University, ____ Tex. ____, 255 S.W. 2d 177 (1953)	13
STATUTES AND CONSTITUTION:
Texas Constitution (Vernon 1948) Art. VII, Sec. 1	25
Texas Constitution (Vernon 1948) Art. VII, Sec. 7	2
Texas Civil Statutes (Vernon 1948) Articles 2745, 2749, 2775, 2780	13
Texas Civil Statutes (Vernon 1948) Articles 2750a, 2781	14
Texas Civil Statutes (Vernon 1948) Article 2784e	13
Texas Civil Statutes (Vernon 1948) Article 2786	13
Texas Civil Statutes (Vernon Supp. 1950) Article 2922-11 et seq.	9
MISCELLANEOUS:
Texas Poll, September 12, 1954	16
Texas State Board of Education Resolution, July 5, 1954	19
The Dallas Morning News, June 9, 1954	14
U. S. News and World Report, August 27, 1954	10

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL.,
Appellants,

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.,
On Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Kansas

---

HARRY BRIGGS, JR., ET AL.,
Appellants,

v.

R. W. ELLIOTT, ET AL.
On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of South Carolina

---

DOROTHY E. DAVIS, ET AL.,
Appellants,

v.

COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD OF PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY, VIRGINIA, ET AL.
On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia

---

FRANCIS B. GEBHART, ET AL.,
Petitioners,

v.

ETHEL LOUISE BELTON, ET AL.
On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Delaware

BRIEF OF JOHN BEN SHEPPERD, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF TEXAS, AMICUS CURIAE

TO THE HONORABLE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES:

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

John Ben Shepperd, Attorney General of Texas, pursuant to request for leave to appear amicus curiae and file a brief, submits this amicus curiae brief to the Court upon the condition that such appearance will not have the effect of making the State of Texas or any of its officers or agencies parties to this litigation.

In compiling data for this brief a sincere effort has been made to obtain a correct cross section of views of educators, legislators and others with knowledge of the subject matter under consideration. Surveys have been made, public opinion has been sampled, and composite views of groups best acquainted with the segregation problem have been obtained. The Texas Education Agency has been most helpful in furnishing pertinent materials which have been used in this brief. We will attempt to present the true Texas picture as reflected from this research.

The public school system in Texas from its inception has been operated and maintained on a segregated basis, and has existed for more than eighty years under the authority of Section 7 of Article VII of the Texas Constitution (1876)[1] and statutes enacted pursuant thereto. This constitutional and statutory authority creating separate but equal facilities

[1] Section 7 of Article VII of the Texas Constitution provides: "Separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored children, and impartial provision shall be made for both."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

in the public school system of Texas was the direct and continuing result of the expressed will of the people of Texas. This Honorable Court in many of its decisions has held that the states may provide education at their own expense for the white and Negro students in separate schools so long as equal facilities and advantages are offered both groups. Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896), and related cases. Stability and harmony in the law, particularly in the constitutional law, is a primary requirement in an effective and efficient government. When the courts have announced, for the guidance and government of individuals and the public, certain controlling principles of law, they should not be changed, because the law by which men are governed should be fixed, definite and known, particularly when millions of dollars have been spent in reliance thereon. Attending a public free school is a privilege extended by the state. It is not a right of a citizen of the United States. Cumming v. Richmond County Board of Education, 175 U.S. 528, 545 (1899). So long as the privileges extended to all groups are equal no one is deprived of the equal protection of the law. The decisions of this Honorable Court have recognized that, where necessity exists, the teaching of white and Negro students in separate classrooms is a reasonable exercise of the state's police power. To preserve the public peace, harmony and the general welfare, the people of Texas in their Constitution, and the Legislature by statutes have declared that such a necessity exists in Texas. There is no discrimination on the part of the State of Texas in administering its public school system, only separation of the races. It is the belief of the people of this State that discrimination against the individual can best be eliminated by segregation of the races in the educational system. It is the evil of discrimination and not segregation per se that is condemned by the United States Constitution.

Section 7 of Article VII of the Texas Constitution and related statutes provide that the State shall furnish equal education to its Negro and white students. The State of Texas has been operating under the assumption that the power of states so to classify and the reasonableness of the classification had been settled as a matter of law since 1896 and was not violative of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

However, if the occasion arises whereby we are compelled to abolish segregation in Texas, it should be by a gradual adjustment in view of the complexities of the problem. Such complexities include the unwillingness of the Texas people immediately to abide by the decision, the varying degrees in which different areas of the State of Texas would be affected, and the result such a decision would have on the State's public school system which has been maintained on a segregated basis for generations.

Legal action which bears upon the folkways of nearly one-fourth of the nation's population cannot be effective unless the affected group is largely willing to abide by it. No individual can be forced against his will to accept, associate, or cohabit with another not of his own choosing. The Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution prohibits only

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"State action" which is discriminatory because of race, creed or color, not the prejudices or discrimination evidenced by individuals toward their fellow man. United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876). And while it has been determined that equal but separate facilities maintained in the public free school systems of the states involved in this litigation is "State action" in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, still this Court should consider that such a decision also affects the individual rights, mores and beliefs of the Southern people. To insure that the people of the South accept the decision and make moral decisions of their own commensurate with the end of bettering the Negro race, some way must be found to protect the constitutional rights of the minority without ignoring the will of the majority. The underlying thought implicit in the Court's decision in these cases is that a feeling of inferiority is generated in the Negro child, resulting not from actual attendance in a segregated school, but from the legal requirement under which the Negro child is forced to attend separate schools. From the standpoint of principle, there is no real difference between compulsory segregation and compulsory integration. Compulsion can only arouse resentment, individual discrimination, and, as experience has demonstrated in other states, violence. The objectives reached by the War between the States left a scar of bitterness and resentment that is visible even now in some parts of the South. Such, we hope, will not be the result of this Court's May 17th decision.

Variance of Degree in Which Different Areas Would Be Affected

In order that this Honorable Court have the full assistance of all parties and amici curiae in formulating decrees, these cases were restored to the docket for the presentation of further argument upon the following questions:

> "4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment
>
> (a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or
>
> (b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?
>
> 5. On the assumption on which questions 4 (a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4 (b),
>
> (a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;
>
> (b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;
>
> (c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;
>
> (d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame de-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

crees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

The following factual information is submitted which we believe to be pertinent insofar as the State of Texas is concerned.

The State of Texas has a total population of seven million, seven hundred eleven thousand, one hundred ninety-four (7,711,194), of whom nine hundred seventy-seven thousand, four hundred fifty-eight (977,458), or 12.7%, are colored.[2] The concentration of the Negro population is shown by counties on the map designated "Appendix I." There are one million, seven hundred eighty-six thousand, nine hundred eighteen (1,786,918) persons of scholastic age enumerated in the scholastic census for the 1954-1955 school year, of whom two hundred thirty thousand, five hundred forty-six (230,546), or 13%, are colored. The concentration of the Negro scholastic population is shown by counties on the map designated "Appendix II." Texas has two hundred fifty-four (254) counties. There are located in the northeastern forty-five counties of this State 50% of the colored scholastics of Texas, and in four of these counties the Negro scholastics comprise a majority of the county's scholastics. In the forty-three counties adjacent to and immediately west of the northeastern block of counties above referred to, another 40% of the colored scholastics reside. Thus, in Texas today approximately 90% of the total Negro scholastics are located in the eighty-eight counties comprising the northeastern quadrant of the State. Forty-one Texas counties do not list a single Negro scholastic. Therefore the remaining 10% of the colored scholastics of Texas are scattered throughout the remaining one hundred and twenty-five counties. A map evidencing this factual information is attached and designated "Appendix III", to which particular reference is made. A study of this map reveals that the segregation problem in Texas is not state-wide, but is of serious import and of vital concern to our local school districts.

[2] This population is based on the 1950 Federal Census.

Of the two hundred and thirteen Texas counties listing Negro scholastics, one hundred forty-six counties offer a complete Negro high school, twenty-one counties offer some Negro high school, but not twelve grades, and thirty-six counties offer only Negro elementary school. Ten counties operate no school for Negroes; however, these counties have ten or fewer Negro scholastics. Negro scholastics in counties not having a complete twelve grades are transported at State expense to other schools. Texas in 1953-54 had a total of one thousand, nine hundred fifty-three (1,953) active school districts, two hundred ninety-two (292) of which offered a full twelve grade school for both white and Negro. One hundred twenty-five (125) districts maintained a Negro school but did not have a white school. A total of nine hundred fifty-six (956) districts provided Negro schools. The districts that did not maintain a school for Negroes were primarily in areas that did not contain Negro scholastics.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Texas Public School System

Pursuant to the constitutional authority, the Texas public school system is administered under what is commonly called "The Minimum Foundation School Program."[3] Under this very effective program, education of the Texas school child is provided on an equal but separate basis, with millions of dollars being spent each year. Under the Minimum Foundation Program, as administered by Texas' twenty-one-member elective State Board of Education, all possible control and responsibility are left to local school administrators and local school boards to provide school programs to meet the needs of the children in their communities. As the name implies, the Minimum Foundation Program guarantees to every school-age child in Texas, regardless of race, creed, color, economic status or place of residence, at least a minimum of a full nine months of schooling each year, thereby spreading the State's financial resources available for public education as equally as possible among all the people. The Program has been in effect for five years, and during that time the average daily attendance of school-age children actually attending school has risen from 73.77% in 1948-49 to 80.85% during 1953-54. 79.31% of the Negro school-age children were in average daily attendance in 1953-54.

The Minimum Foundation Program provides a system of financing which guarantees to local school districts that State funds will be available to pay the cost of a minimum school program when local funds are insufficient.

[3] Art. 2922-11, et seq., Tex. Civ. Stat. (Vernon's, 1948).

A number of the Texas school districts do not need a supplemental appropriation from the Legislature. A majority of the Texas schools have surplus money derived from local taxation with which to enrich the local school program beyond the minimum program prescribed by the State. Expenditures from surplus funds provide adult and kindergarten classes for students not included in the scholastic census age brackets, classes for exceptional children, supplemental expenditures on salaries, maintenance and capital costs, and any other authorized school costs. The State funds are provided in proportionate equality to all school districts, for the benefit of all scholastics, irrespective of race, creed or color. If a school program superior to the minimum requirements is desired in any district, it may be paid for by the taxes voted, levied and collected from the taxpayers of the district.

As a result of the Minimum Foundation Program, teachers' and school administrators' salaries have risen from twenty-ninth in the nation to sixteenth. 97.1% of the Texas teachers now have college degrees. Only the State of Arizona exceeds this mark. There are approximately eight thousand, five hundred (8,500) Negro teachers and school administrators in Texas. This number is nearly equal to the total number of Negro educators in the thirty-one Northern and Western States which practice non-segregation. According to the U. S. News and World Report, August 27, 1954, only one out of every seventy-three teachers in those thirty-one states maintaining an integrated system is a Negro, while in Texas, one out of every five is a Negro. These positions are believed to be the most secure and best paid employment the Negro has today. The effect of this decision upon the teaching profession is speculative, and any decree which would disrupt the stability and security of teachers should be avoided.[4]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Under the Minimum Foundation Program, the public school system of Texas has greatly raised its standards, teachers have been benefited by salary increases and retirement plans, and every school-age child in Texas, without regard to his race, creed or color, has been offered the opportunity of education. The State has not discriminated in its appropriations, such being provided equally to all races and persons, with the privilege and authority in each local district to go further if it is so desired. But the program does provide for separate schools, segregating the races and contemplating an equalization of facilities for all scholastics. Integration would require alteration of the Minimum Foundation Program.

The establishment of an integrated system is not a problem which would apply equally to West or South Texas, where there is only a small percentage of the Negro population, and to Northeast Texas, where the concentration of the Negro population is the heaviest. No equitable general decree could ever be formulated for the entire State of Texas. Specific decrees could be made only after a particular school district was before this Court and the facts relevant to that district were presented. It would be impossible to get enough facts before the Court in one isolated case upon which the Court could enter a general decree which would apply equally to all parts of this State or to all the states practicing segregation. Since we do not know the various fact situations as they exist in these cases, we are in no position to advise the Court as to the type of decree that should be entered.

---

[4] Texas at the present time has no tenure statute for teachers in the public free schools. Employment is through the local school boards.

QUESTION FOUR

4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

(a) Would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

(b) May this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

Argument

This Court has recognized the complexities involved in the formulation of a decree in these cases because problems of different characteristics are presented. Evidently all states were invited to appear

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

because each should have an opportunity to demonstrate the obstacles to adjustment in compliance with any decision that might be rendered in the future affecting the individual states.

It is respectfully submitted that this Court is authorized to permit an effective gradual adjustment toward integration and, unquestionably, if the occasion arises, the administration of this program in Texas must be left to the local school districts. The education system in Texas is predicated upon a number of local, self-governing school districts, with full authority to administer the school system. The basic and historic concept of public free schools is based upon the democratic and salutary principle of local self-government. The schools in Texas are operated, maintained and controlled by local school boards elected by the people of the individual school district.[5] Operational and maintenance costs are provided by local taxation voted by the taxpayers of the district[6] and supplemented by the Legislature under the Minimum Foundation Program.[7] Capital expenditures are made through bond issues voted by the taxpayers of the district.[8] All personnel of the school, with the exception of the elected officials, are employed by local

---

[5] Southwestern Broadcasting Company v. Oil Center Broadcasting Company, 210 S.W. 2d 230 (Tex. Civ. App., 1947, error ref. N.R.E.); University Interscholastic League v. Midwestern University, ... Tex. ....., 255 S.W. 2d 177 (1953); Arts. 2745, 2749, 2775 et seq., and 2780, Tex. Civ. Stat. (Vernon's, 1948).

[6] Art. 2784e, Tex. Civ. Stat. (Vernon's, 1948).

[7] See discussion of the Texas Public School System in this brief.

[8] Art. 2784e and Art. 2786, Tex. Civ. Stat. (Vernon's, 1948).

officials and work under such officials' supervision.[9] It is thus seen that the schools in Texas constitute almost a complete local autonomy controlled by the taxpayers of the individual school districts and their locally elected school board. In fact, the courts of Texas have repeatedly held that these school districts are local public corporations of the same general character as municipal corporations.[10] Any decree of the Court that might affect Texas must leave this administration in the local school districts unhampered. The problems with which we are confronted can best be resolved at the local level in this manner.

As a basic premise for showing the need for a transition period, the following is typical of the feeling of Texas citizens and school administrators on the vital subject now before this Court.

In an article appearing in The Dallas Morning News on June 9, 1954, Dr. J. W. Edgar, Texas Commissioner of Education, stated:

> "Texas has 2,000 problems as a result of the Supreme Court's decision. We have 2,000 school districts, and they vary from totally white to totally Negro.
>
> "The final decree by the Court ought to permit continued management of local districts by local boards. Schools must be run on a community basis. They can't be run successfully from Washington or even from Austin (Texas).
>
> "Experience in separating children on a language basis has proved to us that where the re-

[9] Art. 2750a and Art. 2781, Tex. Civ. Stat. (Vernon's, 1948).

[10] Hatcher v. State, 125 Tex. 84, 81 S.W. 2d 499 (1935); Love v. City of Dallas, 120 Tex. 351, 40 S.W. 2d 20 (1931).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

sponsibility is put upon the local community, they work honestly to resolve differences.

"Anything which schools do effectively must be done with local support. We don't care to tell others how to run their schools, but we certainly believe that our 2,000 problems can be resolved best if the Supreme Court leaves control in local districts."

In a statement made to the Texas Commission on Higher Education, Dr. R. O'Hara Lanier, Negro president of Texas Southern University, stated:

"In spite of the U. S. Supreme Court's anti-segregation ruling, Negro schools will be needed more than ever in the future. It would be a narrow position for the state to get rid of Negro schools for if the Negroes are given equal facilities there is nothing to worry about from segregation.

"For many years to come there will be shown a great desire and preference on the part of the Negro student to attend an institution equal in every respect, where there will exist many opportunities for development for qualities of leadership and where full participation in every phase of college life will be assured.

"Because of human behavior and social backgrounds and patterns long existent, the large majority of such students will come to us (the Negro schools) because they prefer to do so.

"Such students very likely will prefer to continue to study with homogeneous groups and will feel strongly that more sympathetic attention will be given to them in our institutions than in some other schools."

Dr. E. B. Evans, Negro president of Prairie View A. & M. College, expressed similar views to the Commission.

The latest state-wide survey of the Texas Poll[11] on September 12, 1954, indicates:

> "1. 71% of the Texas people are definitely opposed to the Supreme Court's decision. The breakdown on the decision is like this:

	Approve	Disapprove	Undecided
Negroes	60%	33%	7%
Latins	49%	37%	14%
Other Whites	15%	80%	5%
Entire Public	23%	71%	6%

> "2. What should be done about the problem? 7% favor putting the Court's ruling into effect immediately, and another 23% believe plans should be made to bring the races together in the schools within the next few years. A majority of 65% goes on record in favor of continued segregation notwithstanding the Court's decision. The breakdown on this problem is:

	Go Now	Few Years	Keep Apart	Undecided
Negroes	27%	40%	26%	7%
Latins	20%	37%	33%	10%
Other Whites	3%	19%	74%	4%
Entire Public	7%	23%	65%	5%

> In the entire public, Negroes account for about 12% of the population; Latins, about 11%; and other whites, about 77%."

In a recent questionnaire forwarded by the Attorney General of Texas to approximately one hun-

[11] A long-established Texas organization operated by Joe Belden who periodically and systematically conducts a scientific sampling, or polling, and reporting thereon, of public opinion in Texas on current events.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

dred fifty-two Texas school administrative officials, seventy-seven reported that 85% or more students would continue attending the same school if they had free choice. Of this number, fourteen answers were from Negro administrators. Only three answered that students in their districts would prefer attending integrated schools, and all three reports were from Negro administrators. The questions propounded and the answers received by the Attorney General are compiled in a report which is attached as "Appendix IV."

Many plans have been advanced to alter the public school system of Texas as a result of the May 17th decision. Some go so far as to suggest the complete abolition of the free public school system, while others advocate turning the State schools into private schools. The decision of the United States Supreme Court is to the effect that segregation in public schools maintained by compulsion of law is unconstitutional as being in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Many suggest that it does not necessarily follow that integration of the white race with the colored race in the field of education is compelled by the Constitution. If, under the Fourteenth Amendment, all citizens are entitled to equal protection of the law, which was the premise for the Supreme Court's decision, then integration can no more be compelled than can segregation. Provision for domestic tranquility in the exercise of the police powers of the State premised the original laws requiring segregation. To maintain public peace, good order and the domestic tranquility, these same police powers of the State could be exercised, calling for another and different provision relating to public education.

Realizing this, and that the need for compulsion no longer exists, another plan suggests that the section of the law which provides for compulsory education should be repealed and the laws providing that the State furnish free education to all should be left undisturbed. Then the present laws should be amended to allow the parent or guardian of the child desiring to take advantage of free education to express his own desires and preferences as to the type of school the child should attend. The parent or guardian could select a school in which the majority of the other pupils are of the same race as the child, or he could select a school in which the other pupils are of both races, thereby providing equality of opportunity and freedom of individual choice.

This change would remove the unconstitutional "compulsion" of segregation, and at the same time the State would be in a position of honoring the individual preferences of its people.

Another plan advanced is that of allowing voluntary transfers between school districts, and it is based upon the same principle as the foregoing.

In complying with the mandatory duties placed upon the Legislature of the State of Texas by the Constitution of the State of Texas, the Legislature has by general law established, supported and maintained a segregated public free school system. These laws of the State of Texas are not before the Court in these causes, and the State Board of Education has ruled that the schools of Texas should continue to be operated in the same manner until otherwise directed.[12] Since the end of World War II, Texas, together with many of our states, has been confronted with the enormous task of providing adequate school housing for a shifting and rapidly increasing population. In areas predominantly populated by white students schools have been built to house these students. In areas predominantly populated by colored students schools have also been built to house them. Utilization of all present school housing to the fullest extent in this State will be an absolute necessity. Texas is also confronted with the difficult problem of providing adequate facilities for the anticipated increase in its scholastics in the interim between now and 1960. Statistics reveal that at the close of the 1958-1959 school year, eight hundred forty-nine million, three hundred forty-four thousand, nine hundred twenty-two dollars ($849,344,922) will be needed over and above the present needs to care for the increase in population and replacement costs on existing facilities. Of this amount, only three hundred ninety-four million, eight hundred fifty-eight thousand, fifty-two dollars ($394,858,052) can be anticipated from local funds, leaving a balance of four hundred fifty million, four hundred eighty-six thousand, eight hundred seventy dollars ($450,486,-870) which must be derived from another source to care for the needs of the school children for the school year of 1960. The school system is presently overcrowded with certain school-age groups being separated into morning and afternoon classes to offset this condition. It can readily be seen that if Texas attempted an immediate integration, the perplexities confronted in accomplishing the same would be overwhelmingly multiplied. Additional facilities are needed and will have to be supplied by local bond issues. It is highly speculative as to whether such bond issues would be voted to house an integrated school system which an overwhelming majority of the people oppose. The election calls for freedom of choice and no mandamus action could be maintained to force an affirmative vote. At this time it would be highly impracticable to eliminate any of the present school housing, and great consideration must be given to the natural and presently existing boundary lines which, of course, is the prime consideration for the Legislature or the local school board.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

[12] On July 5, 1954, the State Board of Education passed the following resolution: "Since the recent United States Supreme Court's decisions on segregation in public schools are not final, the State Board of Education of Texas is of the unanimous opinion that it is obligated to adhere to and comply with all of our present state laws and policies providing for segregation in our public school system and to continue to follow these present laws and policies until such time as they may be changed by a duly constituted authority of this State. If in the future, the Texas laws should be changed then each local district should have sufficient time to work the problem out. . . ."

A gradual transition to an integrated public school system is not a denial of relief or of the constitutional rights enunciated by the Court. The Court has previously permitted a transition period in analogous situations, particularly in the antitrust and nuisance cases. In United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106 (1911), the Supreme Court determined that the defendant had violated the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Recognizing the need for adjustment to its decree, the Court, in order to avoid and mitigate any possible injury to the interest of the general public,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

remanded the case to the lower court to hear the parties and to ascertain and determine a plan for dissolution of the combination. To accomplish this end, the Court allowed sufficient time (eight months) to carry out its decree. In Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 240 U.S. 650 (1916), the Court entered a final decree in a case in which the State of Georgia had sued the Tennessee Copper Company to restrain the discharge of irritating gases into Georgia. The case had involved three lawsuits and covered a span of nine years in which the Court allowed considerable time and discretion to devise ways and means of subduing and preventing the escape of the noxious fumes. In Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Company, 312 U.S. 496 (1941), the Pullman Company brought suit in the Federal Court against the Railroad Commission of Texas attacking a regulation of the Commission as being in violation of the Federal Constitution and unauthorized by the Texas statutes. The Court remanded the case to the lower court, with directions to retain the bill pending a determination of proceedings, to be brought within a reasonable time in the state court to determine a definite construction of the state statute.[13]

The use of administrative discretion and its limits has been spelled out often by the Court in the areas of administrative agencies. The Court has emphasized consistently that supervision and discretion should lie with the administrative agencies in conducting their functions as economic and political governing boards.[14] Such emphasis is closely related also to the administrative discretion which exists in school boards. In United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U.S. 131 (1948), Mr. Justice Douglas reviewed a decree in an injunction suit by the United States under the Sherman Act to eliminate or qualify certain business practices in the motion picture industry. A provision in the decree that films be licensed on a competitive bidding basis was eliminated by the Supreme Court as not likely to bring about the desired end and as involving too much judicial supervision to make it effective. This elimination was held to require reconsideration by the district court of its prohibition of the expansion of theatre holdings by distributors and provisions for divesting existing holdings.

[13] See also: New Jersey v. City of New York, 283 U.S. 473 (1931); Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1 (1911); Northern Securities Company v. United States, 193 U.S. 197 (1904).

The Court at page 163 stated:

> "It would involve the judiciary in the administration of intricate and detailed rules governing priority, period of clearance, length of run, competitive areas, reasonable return and the like. The system would be apt to require as close a supervision as a continuous receivership, unless the defendants were to be entrusted with vast discretion. The judiciary is unsuited to affairs of business management; and control through the power of contempt is crude and [14] See Alabama Public Service Commission v. Southern Railway Company, 341 U.S. 341 (1951); Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315 (1943); and Far Eastern Conference, United States Lines Co., States Marine Corporation, et al. v. United States and Federal Maritime Board, 342 U.S. 570 (1952).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> clumsy and lacking in the flexibility necessary to make continuous and detailed supervision effective."

The implications in the Court's opposition to judicial administration of intricate and detailed rules in the economic field apply with greater force to the social relationship and problems created by these cases in the field of public education. Furthermore, the amount of capital involved in the Paramount case is minute when compared with the wealth invested in the public school systems of the South.

The Court, in Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U.S. 27 (1885), speaking of the Fourteenth Amendment, stated at page 31:

> "But neither the amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education and good order of the people. . . ." (Emphasis supplied.)

A tremendous portion of the wealth of these states has been invested in capital expenditures for their public schools. The only practical method of establishing an integrated system calls for a period of implementation in our present dual system. This Court in the exercise of its equity powers has ample authority to permit the parties to adjust gradually from their existing segregated systems to an integrated one. The instant cases affect millions of individuals and the entire public in some seventeen states. By reason of the great number of people affected by the decree and by reason of the vast amount of money invested in capital expenditures, and because of the necessity to make use of all present buildings in the operation of an efficient system of public education, this Court should permit the states to adjust their dual systems gradually into an integrated system. It is, therefore, respectfully submitted that this Honorable Court has sufficient authority to permit a gradual adjustment to an integrated school system with sufficient time given for local school officials to accomplish this purpose by the exercise of their administrative authority.

QUESTION FIVE

5. On the assumption on which Questions 4 (a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in Question 4 (b),

(a) Should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) If so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) Should this Court appoint a special Master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) Should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

Argument

The information contained in the introductory statements and in Appendix III clearly demonstrates that the problem of establishing a public school system not based on race is a localized problem in Texas, not a state-wide problem. This is further evidenced in Appendix V, which is a compilation of scholastic population by counties. It is not a problem in which the remedy voluntarily adopted in West Texas or South Texas would be equally applicable and effective in Northeast Texas. For that reason no equitable general decree could be formulated which would be appropriate for every part of the State of Texas. Specific decrees would have to be provided for each case, based on the facts and conditions then presented to the Court which are shown to exist in the locality involved in a proper case.

Section 1 of Article VII of the Constitution of Texas imposes the duty on the Legislature to establish, support and maintain our system of public free schools.[15] This Court announced on May 17, 1954, that segregation in public education is a denial of the equal protection of the laws. Since that time the Texas Legislature has not met in session, and it is not known at this time what action the Legislature will take, if any.

---

[15] Section 1 of Article VII of the Constitution of Texas provides: "A general diffusion of knowledge being essential to the preservation of the liberties and rights of the people, it shall be the duty of the Legislature of the State to establish and make suitable provision for the support and maintenance of an efficient system of public free schools."

In Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940), this Court stated that it did not want to become the school board for the entire country. At page 598 the Court stated:

> "But the courtroom is not the arena for debating issues of educational policy. It is not our province to choose among competing considerations in the subtle process of securing effective loyalty to the traditional ideals of democracy, while respecting at the same time individual idiosyncrasies among a people so diversified in social origins and religious alliances. So to hold would in effect make us the school board for the country. That authority has not been given to this Court, nor should we assume it." (Emphasis supplied.)

Keeping the control of public education close to the local people is perhaps the strongest tradition in American education. One of the predominant characteristics of American education is the variation in local policies and procedures in terms of unique local conditions. The Texas Legislature has the right and duty to maintain public safety and good order. This Court, in the Gobitis case,[16] supra, recognized its [16] That portion of the Gobitis case dealing with the validity of a statute requiring a compulsory flag salute was overruled in Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1942).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

limitations and the authority of the state legislatures when it said at page 597:

> "The precise issue, then, for us to decide is whether the legislatures of the various states and the authorities in a thousand counties and school districts of this country are barred from determining the appropriateness of various means to evoke that unifying sentiment without which there can ultimately be no liberties, civil or religious. To stigmatize legislative judgment in providing for this universal gesture of respect for the symbol of our national life in the setting of the common school as a lawless inroad on that freedom of conscience which the Constitution protects, would amount to no less than the pronouncement of pedagogical and psychological dogma in a field where courts possess no marked and certainly no controlling competence." (Emphasis supplied.)

Other decrees have been held in abeyance until an appropriate action could be taken by the proper agency. See Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U.S. 607 (1944), and Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Company, 312 U.S. 496 (1940).

This Court has the authority to remand these cases to the courts of first instance, instructing them to enter decrees implementing the principles enunciated in the Court's opinion of May 17, 1954. See International Salt Company v. United States, 332 U.S. 392 (1947). If this decision stands, then on remand the courts of first instance would be familiar with local conditions and could provide a continuing supervision over the program of non-discrimination.

They could recognize and adjust the equities between the parties, bringing individual rights into equality without unduly hindering the public school program.

CONCLUSION

Since our position before the Court is that of amicus curiae only and not that of a party, ordinarily we would not assume to state specifically the scope of the decrees to be entered by the Court in these cases. If the Court attempted to formulate a general decree applicable to all school districts and States, it would be prejudging a multitude of cases not before the Court. However, in entering appropriate decrees the Court should consider the following suggestions which are respectfully submitted at the request of the Court:

(1) In formulating a decree or decrees, the Court should recognize the long established traditions and usages which have prevailed in those States maintaining a segregated school system, such as Texas, under the separate but equal doctrine as predicated upon the principles announced in Plessy v. Ferguson, supra. These traditions and usages should not be suddenly and abruptly destroyed. A period of orderly transition will insure that a decree will meet with no more than passive resistance by the public.

(2) In formulating a decree or decrees, this Court must preserve the democratic and salutary principle of local self government inherent in our public school systems. Any decree or decrees entered by the Court should protect this principle. In this manner the decrees could appropriately be implemented by the local school authorities as a legislative and administrative matter.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(3) The Court, in formulating a decree or decrees, should preserve the right of free selection and choice by the patrons of public schools in selecting the school which will be patronized.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN BEN SHEPPERD
Attorney General of Texas

BURNELL WALDREP

BILLY E. LEE

J. A. AMIS, JR.

L. P. LOLLAR

J. FRED JONES

JOHN DAVENPORT

JOHN REEVES

WILL DAVIS
Assistants

Amicus Curiae

APPENDIX IV

Educators' Views on Integration

On July 30, 1954, the Attorney General of Texas directed a questionnaire to one hundred and fifty-two Texas school administrative officials. One hundred two questionnaires were mailed to white administrators and fifty questionnaires were mailed to Negro administrators. Twelve of the questionnaires were directed to county superintendents, fifty were directed to school principals and ninety were directed to district superintendents. Responses were received in eighty-two instances, eighteen of which were from Negro educators.

The questionnaire and evaluated responses are:

"We are in the process of compiling data to determine the feasibility of filing an amicus curiae brief in the United States Supreme Court relative to the recent segregation decisions which affects our public school system. Our school system operates under legislative authorization, and the Legislature will not convene in Regular Session until January to consider the problem arising by reason of the Supreme Court decision. Consequently, if any brief is filed, it should contain a cross-section of the views of educators and the public generally in Texas in an effort to see what impact the decision has made on our public school system and customs.

"By reason of your long familiarity with the field of education throughout the State we would like to have an expression of your views on the following questions:

"1. In the event of legislative or Supreme Court direction, what, in your opinion, would be a reasonable minimum period of time for working out an integrated system in your district?"

In evaluating responses, a period of five years was arbitrarily set as a division. Thirty-six replied that a period of five years or less would be sufficient. Forty-two replied that a longer time than five years was necessary. Nineteen answers volunteered replies favoring a twelve year plan of integration (beginning with the first grade and adding a new grade each year). Ten of the Negro replies favored a five year or less program, while five thought a longer program was necessary. Two Negroes volunteered that they favored the twelve year plan.

"2. Do you consider the local problem more acute than the problem on a state-wide basis?"

Thirty-nine answered that the local problem was not more acute, as compared to forty-one replies that the local problem was more acute. The Negro replies were eleven affirmative, seven negative.

"3. Do you think that the established precedent of separate schools would seriously handicap the operation of integrated schools in your area?"

Sixteen responses did not believe the operation of integrated schools would be handicapped by the precedent of separate schools, but sixty-four did believe a handicap would exist. Eleven Negroes replied there would be no handicap, and seven replied there would be difficulty with an integrated system.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"4. (a) In the event of an integrated system, could all school buildings be utilized?"

Forty-eight responses believed all present school buildings could be used in an integrated program. Thirty-three thought that there would be a loss of use in an integrated system. Ten Negroes replied that all buildings could be used and seven thought that all buildings could not be used in an integrated system.

"4. (b) To what extent are present school buildings situated so that natural zones could be established that would continue to serve substantially the same student body in attendance at the same schools as under present operations?"

Forty replies stated that natural boundaries separated the two races and the schools for each race. Thirty-eight responded that no natural boundaries existed in their locality. Of the Negro educators, eleven replied that natural boundaries existed, while five answered that natural boundaries did not exist in their locality.

"4. (c) If any existing buildings would be unusable in an integrated program, estimate the present value of such buildings."

Forty answered that there would be no loss of buildings in operating an integrated school system. Thirty-eight answered that there would be some loss within their district. Of the Negro educators nine replied there would be no loss, while six answered that there would be some loss.

"5. How will an integrated public school system affect the school teachers in your area?"

Fifteen responded that there would be no affect on school teachers in their districts. Fifty-six answers believed the Negro teachers would be adversely affected by an integrated school program. Some replies thought white teachers in their districts would refuse to teach in an integrated school. The Negro replies seeing no affect within their districts numbered seven, while three feared an adverse affect.

"6. If the patrons of your district, both negro and white, were given free choice, what per cent would send their children to the same school now attended?"

Seventy-seven replied that 85% or more would continue attending the same school if they had free choice. Of this number fourteen answers were from Negro administrators. Only three answered that students in their districts would prefer attending integrated schools, and all three replies were by Negro administrators.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

APPENDIX V

County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
1. Anderson	4,127	2,473	34.5
2. Andrews	1,885	30	1.6
3. Angelina	6,645	1,398	17.4
4. Aransas	1,154	14	1.2
5. Archer	1,541	0	------
6. Armstrong	381	0	------
7. Atascosa	5,266	66	1.2
8. Austin	1,977	789	28.5
9. Bailey	1,994	60	2.9
10. Bandera	725	0	------
11. Bastrop	2551	1,477	36.7
12. Baylor	1,297	60	4.4
13. Bee	4,831	134	2.7
14. Bell	11,788	1,760	13.0
15. Bexar	109,453	5,997	5.2
16. Blanco	806	22	2.7
17. Borden	176	0	------
18. Bosque	2,263	103	4.3
19. Bowie	10,895	3,805	25.9
20. Brazoria	13,514	1,523	10.1
21. Brazos	5,437	2,132	28.17
22. Brewster	1,460	9	.6
23. Briscoe	688	64	8.5
24. Brooks	2,336	3	.1
25. Brown	4,994	140	2.7
26. Burleson	1,791	1,063	37.6
27. Burnet	1,794	34	1.9
28. Caldwell	3,743	686	15.5
29. Calhoun	2,933	151	4.9

County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
30. Callahan	1,690	0	.....
31. Cameron	34,957	117	.3
32. Camp	1,153	822	41.6
33. Carson	1,613	0	.....
34. Cass	4,018	2,400	37.4
35. Castro	1,458	11	.7
36. Chambers	1,649	447	21.3
37. Cherokee	4,905	1,980	28.8
38. Childress	1,649	113	6.1
39. Clay	1,861	14	.7
40. Cochran	1,503	69	4.4
41. Coke	826	0	.....
42. Coleman	2,761	94	3.3
43. Collin	7,950	1,062	11.8
44. Collingsworth	1,692	172	9.2
45. Colorado	2,827	1,134	28.6
46. Comal	3,916	83	2.1
47. Comanche	2,408	0	.....
48. Concho	940	2	.2
49. Cooke	4,783	186	3.7
50. Coryell	3,518	179	4.8
51. Cottle	919	36	3.8
52. Crane	994	66	6.2
53. Crockett	893	12	1.3
54. Crosby	2,168	236	9.8
55. Culberson	606	0	.....
56. Dallam	1,638	12	.7
57. Dallas	119,280	18,943	13.7
58. Dawson	3,695	224	5.7
59. Deaf Smith	2,456	7	.3
60. Delta	1,416	219	13.4

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
61. Denton	7,220	567	7.3
62. De Witt	4,901	798	14.0
63. Dickens	1,380	64	4.4
64. Dimmit	3,505	13	.4
65. Donley	1,087	75	6.4
66. Duval	4,533	0	----
67. Eastland	4,110	64	1.5
68. Ector	12,923	562	4.2
69. Edwards	541	1	.2
70. Ellis	6,570	2,875	30.4
71. El Paso	45,775	719	1.6
72. Erath	2,927	20	.7
73. Falls	3,191	1,978	38.3
74. Fannin	4,900	708	12.6
75. Fayette	3,492	982	21.9
76. Fisher	1,777	113	6.0
77. Floyd	2,291	166	6.8
78. Foard	742	90	10.8
79. Fort Bend	6,304	1,803	22.2
80. Franklin	783	126	13.9
81. Freestone	1,675	1,749	51.1
82. Frio	2,785	23	.8
83. Gaines	2,796	46	1.6
84. Galveston	21,504	5,036	19.0
85. Garza	1,397	45	3.1
86. Gillespie	2,137	0	----
87. Glasscock	255	5	1.9
88. Goliad	1,302	151	10.4
89. Gonzales	3,357	960	22.2
90. Gray	5,727	159	2.7
91. Grayson	12,366	1,303	9.5

County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
92. Gregg	10,895	3,739	25.5
83. Grimes	1,911	1,563	45.0
94. Guadalupe	5,228	814	13.5
95. Hale	7,618	456	5.7
96. Hall	1,770	228	11.4
97. Hamilton	1,790	0	------
98. Hansford	989	0	------
99. Hardeman	1,769	181	9.3
100. Hardin	4,268	791	15.6
101. Harris	156,638	32,559	17.2
102. Harrison	5,059	6,042	54.4
103. Hartley	233	0	------
104. Haskell	2,892	161	5.3
105. Hays	4,332	234	5.12
106. Hemphill	803	0	------
107. Henderson	3,657	1,280	25.9
108. Hidalgo	4,511	84	.2
109. Hill	4,792	1,308	21.4
110. Hockley	5,391	281	5.0
111. Hood	1,054	18	1.2
112. Hopkins	3,595	666	15.6
113. Houston	2,511	2,110	45.7
114. Howard	6,423	285	4.2
115. Hudspeth	868	0	------
116. Hunt	6,188	1,436	18.8
117. Hutchinson	7,511	116	1.5
118. Irion	355	0	------
119. Jack	1,534	23	1.5
120. Jackson	3,221	418	11.5
121. Jasper	3,834	1,540	28.7
122. Jeff Davis	415	0	------

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

	County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
123.	Jefferson	34,353	11,297	24.7
124.	Jim Hogg	1,340	0	.....
125.	Jim Wells	7,757	55	.7
126.	Johnson	6,595	397	5.7
127.	Jones	4,137	325	7.3
128.	Karnes	3,724	143	3.7
129.	Kaufman	4,288	2,222	34.1
130.	Kendall	1,311	11	.8
131.	Kenedy	142	0	.....
132.	Kent	236	6	2.5
133.	Kerr	2,602	104	3.8
134.	Kimble	868	0	.....
135.	King	169	12	6.6
136.	Kinney	471	60	11.3
137.	Kleberg	5,443	172	3.1
138.	Knox	2,069	157	7.0
139.	Lamar	6,644	1,692	20.3
140.	Lamb	4,855	403	7.7
141.	Lampasas	1,852	30	1.6
142.	La Salle	2,800	0	.....
143.	Lavaca	3,484	561	13.9
144.	Lee	1,582	776	32.9
145.	Leon	1,517	1,310	46.3
146.	Liberty	5,368	1,591	22.9
147.	Limestone	2,822	1,654	36.9
148.	Lipscomb	725	0	.....
149.	Liveoak	2,334	4	.8
150.	Llano	904	2	.2
151.	Loving	20	0	.....
152.	Lubbock	22,164	2,001	8.3
153.	Lynn	2,240	104	4.4

	County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
154.	Madison	978	622	38.9
155.	Marion	896	1,314	59.5
156.	Martin	1,160	78	6.3
157.	Mason	893	10	1.1
158.	Matagorda	4,537	1,149	20.2
159.	Maverick	3,430	0	-----
160.	McCulloch	2,184	84	3.7
161.	McLennan	21,888	5,260	19.4
162.	McMullen	200	0	-----
163.	Medina	4,730	31	.6
164.	Menard	685	12	1.7
165.	Midland	9,143	897	8.9
166.	Milam	4,249	1,199	22.0
167.	Mills	1,024	0	-----
168.	Mitchell	2,570	192	6.9
169.	Montague	3,515	0	-----
170.	Montgomery	4,680	1,541	24.8
171.	Moore	3,562	0	-----
172.	Morris	1,816	1,018	35.9
173.	Motley	633	66	9.4
174.	Nacogdoches	4,218	3,278	36.0
175.	Navarro	6,076	2,475	28.9
176.	Newton	1,604	996	38.3
177.	Nolan	4,083	170	4.0
178.	Nueces	45,914	1,748	3.7
179.	Ochiltree	1,114	0	-----
180.	Oldham	653	0	-----
181.	Orange	10,179	1,209	10.6
182.	Palo Pinto	3,694	125	3.3
183.	Panola	2,542	1,809	41.6
184.	Parker	4,768	89	1.8

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
185. Parmer	1,867	27	1.4
186. Pecos	2,699	35	1.3
187. Polk	2,568	1,112	30.2
188. Potter	19,370	1,010	4.9
189. Presidio	1,536	0	------
190. Rains	729	114	13.5
191. Randall	1,316	0	------
192. Reagan	780	41	5.0
193. Real	480	0	------
194. Red River	3,155	1,173	27.1
195. Reeves	3,842	133	3.3
196. Refugio	2,522	275	9.8
197. Roberts	197	0	------
198. Robertson	2,439	2,141	46.7
199. Rockwall	938	539	36.5
200. Runnels	3,437	106	3.0
201. Rusk	5,439	3,154	36.7
202. Sabine	1,336	518	27.9
203. San Augustine	1,222	844	40.8
204. San Jacinto	666	967	59.2
205. San Patricio	12,143	190	1.5
206. San Saba	1,599	9	.6
207. Schleicher	654	40	5.8
208. Scurry	4,236	93	2.1
209. Shackelford	840	16	1.9
210. Shelby	3,623	1,622	30.9
211. Sherman	574	0	------
212. Smith	11,385	5,558	32.8
213. Somervell	493	0	------
214. Starr	5,053	0	------
215. Stephens	1,646	60	3.5

	County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
216.	Sterling	308	2	.6
217.	Stonewall	681	36	5.0
218.	Sutton	895	15	1.6
219.	Swisher	2,318	47	2.0
220.	Tarrant	74,977	8,904	10.6
221.	Taylor	13,248	594	4.3
222.	Terrell	656	0	-----
223.	Terry	3,122	81	2.5
224.	Throckmorton	634	0	-----
225.	Titus	3,207	733	18.6
226.	Tom Green	11,538	621	5.1
227.	Travis	27,111	4,761	14.9
228.	Trinity	1,524	658	30.1
229.	Tyler	2,121	705	24.9
230.	Upshur	2,965	1,533	34.1
231.	Upton	1,598	74	4.4
232.	Uvalde	4,307	44	1.0
233.	Val Verde	4,440	80	1.8
234.	Van Zandt	4,086	451	9.9
235.	Victoria	8,502	733	7.9
236.	Walker	1,786	1,865	51.1
237.	Waller	1,367	1,178	46.29
238.	Ward	2,870	39	1.3
239.	Washington	2,333	1,778	45.2
240.	Webb	16,089	5	.1
241.	Wharton	7,504	2,087	21.8
242.	Wheeler	2,104	66	3.0
243.	Wichita	17,203	1,219	6.6
244.	Wilbarger	3,490	382	9.9
245.	Willacy	5,490	21	.4
246.	Williamson	6,851	1,357	16.5

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

	County	Whites on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	Negroes on 1954-1955 Scholastic Census	% of Negroes
247.	Wilson	3,634	95	2.5
248.	Winkler	2,415	49	2.0
249.	Wise	3,096	34	1.1
250.	Wood	3,932	744	15.9
251.	Yoakum	1,465	1	.1
252.	Young	3,405	24	.7
253.	Zapata	1,035	0	----
254.	Zavala	3,293	26	.8
	TOTALS	1,556,372	230,546	12.9

INDEX

	Page
I. The interest of the United States	2
II. The Court may not find it necessary to reach the question whether the "separate but equal" doctrine should be reaffirmed or overruled	8
III. If the Court should reach the question, the "separate but equal" doctrine should be reexamined and overruled	17
IV. If in any of these cases the Court should hold that a system of "separate but equal" public schools is unconstitutional, it should remand the case to the district court with directions to devise and execute such program for relief as appears most likely to achieve orderly and expeditious transition to a non-segregated system	27
Conclusion	31

CITATIONS

Cases:

Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U. S. 607	27
Alexander v. Hillman, 296 U. S. 222	27
Ashwander v. T. V. A., 297 U. S. 288	9
Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60	18, 22
Carr v. Corning, 182 F. 2d 14	15
Eccles v. Peoples Bank, 333 U. S. 426	27
Endo, Ex parte, 323 U. S. 283	16
Fisher v. Hurst, 333 U. S. 147	10
Gompers v. United States, 233 U. S. 604	25
Graves v. N. Y. ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U. S. 466	26
Great Northern R. Co. v. Sunburst Oil Co., 287 U. S. 358	31
Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816	10, 13, 17
Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24	22
Liverpool Steamship Company v. Emigration Commissioners, 113 U. S. 33	9
McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U. S. 203	19
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637	17, 18, 23
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337	9, 11, 18
Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283	26
Perez v. Sharp, 32 Calif. 2d 711	24
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537	4, 13, 14, 23, 32
Radio Station WOW, Inc. v. Johnson, 326 U. S. 120	27
Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, 331 U. S. 549	14
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1	22
Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631	9, 11

Cases—Continued Page

Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36 22
Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649 26
Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1 27
Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303 19
Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 ..... 8, 9, 10, 11, 17, 18
Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410 22
Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Railway Co., 163 U. S. 564 27
United States v. Aluminum Co., 322 U. S. 716, 148 F. 2d 416, 171 F. 2d 285, 91 F. Supp. 333 27
United States v. CIO, 335 U. S. 106 ..... 9, 15
United States v. National Lead Co., 332 U. S. 319 27
United States v. Paramount Pictures, 70 F. Supp. 53, 334 U. S. 131, 85 F. Supp. 881, 339 U. S. 974 27
Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313 21
Wilshire Oil Co. v. United States, 295 U. S. 100 12
Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25 25

Statutes:

Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, 49 Stat. 820, 15 U. S. C. 79k 28
8 U. S. C. 41 21
8 U. S. C. 42 21
Virginia:
Code (1950), Section 22-221 16
Constitution (1902), Article IX, Section 140 15

Miscellaneous:

Letter from Secretary of State to Attorney General dated December 2, 1952 6–8
Message to the Congress, February 2, 1948, H. Doc. No. 516, 80th Cong., 2d sess 2, 4, 33
To Secure These Rights, Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights (1947), p. 89 ..... 4, 6, 8, 31–32

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1952

No. 8*

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES AS AMICUS CURIAE

Because of the national importance of the constitutional questions presented in these cases, the United States considers it appropriate to submit this brief as amicus curiae. We shall not undertake, however, to deal with every aspect of the issues involved. Comprehensive briefs have been submitted by the parties and other amici curiae; and, so far as possible, this brief will avoid repetition of arguments and materials contained in those briefs. We shall try to confine ourselves to those aspects of the cases which are of particular concern to the Government or within its special competence to discuss.

*Together with No. 101, Briggs, et al. v. Elliott; No. 191, Davis, et al. v. County School Board, et al.; No. 413, Bolling, et al. v. Sharpe, et al.; and No. 448, Gebhart, et al. v. Belton, et al.

I

The interest of the United States

In recent years the Federal Government has increasingly recognized its special responsibility for assuring vindication of the fundamental civil rights guaranteed by the Constitution. The President has stated: "We shall not * * * finally achieve the ideals for which this Nation was founded so long as any American suffers discrimination as a result of his race, or religion, or color, or the land of origin of his forefathers. * * * The Federal Government has a clear duty to see that constitutional guaranties of individual liberties and of equal protection under the laws are not denied or abridged anywhere in our Union."[1]

Recognition of the responsibility of the Federal Government with regard to civil rights is not a matter of partisan controversy, even though differences of opinion may exist as to the need for particular legislative or executive action. Few Americans believe that government should pursue a laissez-faire policy in the field of civil rights, or that it adequately discharges its duty to the people so long as it does not itself intrude on their civil liberties. Instead, there is general acceptance of an affirmative government obligation to insure respect for fundamental human rights.

[1] Message to the Congress, February 2, 1948, H. Doc. No. 516, 80th Cong., 2d sess., p. 2.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The constitutional right invoked in these cases is the basic right, secured to all Americans, to equal treatment before the law. The cases at bar do not involve isolated acts of racial discrimination by private individuals or groups. On the contrary, it is contended in these cases that public school systems established in the states of Kansas, South Carolina, Virginia, and Delaware, and in the District of Columbia, unconstitutionally discriminate against Negroes solely because of their color.

This contention raises questions of the first importance in our society. For racial discriminations imposed by law, or having the sanction or support of government, inevitably tend to undermine the foundations of a society dedicated to freedom, justice, and equality. The proposition that all men are created equal is not mere rhetoric. It implies a rule of law—an indispensable condition to a civilized society—under which all men stand equal and alike in the rights and opportunities secured to them by their government. Under the Constitution every agency of government, national and local, legislative, executive, and judicial, must treat each of our people as an American, and not as a member of a particular group classified on the basis of race or some other constitutional irrelevancy. The color of a man's skin—like his religious beliefs, or his political attachments, or the country from which he or his ancestors came to the United States—does not diminish or alter his legal status or constitutional rights. "Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens."[2]

The problem of racial discrimination is particularly acute in the District of Columbia, the nation's capital. This city is the window through which the world looks into our house. The embassies, legations, and representatives of all nations are here, at the seat of the Federal Government. Foreign officials and visitors naturally judge this country and our people by their experiences and observations in the nation's capital; and the treatment of colored persons here is taken as the measure of our attitude toward minorities generally. The President has stated that "The District of Columbia should be a true symbol of American freedom and democracy for our own people, and for the people of the world."[3] Instead, as the President's Committee on Civil Rights found, the District of Columbia "is a graphic illustration of a failure of democracy."[4] The Committee summarized its findings as follows:

> For Negro Americans, Washington is not just the nation's capital. It is the [2] Mr. Justice Harlan in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 559. Regrettably, he was speaking only for himself, in dissent.

[3] Message to the Congress, note 1, supra, p. 5.

[4] To Secure These Rights, Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights (1947), p. 89.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

point at which all public transportation into the South becomes "Jim Crow." If he stops in Washington, a Negro may dine like other men in the Union Station, but as soon as he steps out into the capital, he leaves such democratic practices behind. With very few exceptions, he is refused service at downtown restaurants, he may not attend a downtown movie or play, and he has to go into the poorer section of the city to find a night's lodging. The Negro who decides to settle in the District must often find a home in an overcrowded, substandard area. He must often take a job below the level of his ability. He must send his children to the inferior public schools set aside for Negroes and entrust his family's health to medical agencies which give inferior service. In addition, he must endure the countless daily humiliations that the system of segregation imposes upon the one-third of Washington that is Negro.

* * * * *

The shamefulness and absurdity of Washington's treatment of Negro Americans is highlighted by the presence of many dark-skinned foreign visitors. Capital custom not only humiliates colored citizens, but is a source of considerable embarrassment to these visitors. * * * Foreign officials are often mistaken for American Negroes and refused food, lodging and entertainment. However, once it > is established that they are not Americans, they are accommodated.[5]

It is in the context of the present world struggle between freedom and tyranny that the problem of racial discrimination must be viewed. The United States is trying to prove to the people of the world, of every nationality, race, and color, that a free democracy is the most civilized and most secure form of government yet devised by man. We must set an example for others by showing firm determination to remove existing flaws in our democracy.

The existence of discrimination against minority groups in the United States has an adverse effect upon our relations with other countries. Racial discrimination furnishes grist for the Communist propaganda mills, and it raises doubts even among friendly nations as to the intensity of our devotion to the democratic faith. In response to the request of the Attorney General for an authoritative statement of the effects of racial discrimination in the United States upon the conduct of foreign relations, the Secretary of State has written as follows:

> * * * I wrote the Chairman of the Fair Employment Practices Committee on May 8, 1946, that the existence of discrimination against minority groups was having an adverse effect upon our relations with other countries. At that time I pointed out that

[5] Id., pp. 89, 95.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

discrimination against such groups in the United States created suspicion and resentment in other countries, and that we would have better international relations were these reasons for suspicion and resentment to be removed.

During the past six years, the damage to our foreign relations attributable to this source has become progressively greater. The United States is under constant attack in the foreign press, over the foreign radio, and in such international bodies as the United Nations because of various practices of discrimination against minority groups in this country. As might be expected, Soviet spokesmen regularly exploit this situation in propaganda against the United States, both within the United Nations and through radio broadcasts and the press, which reaches all corners of the world. Some of these attacks against us are based on falsehood or distortion; but the undeniable existence of racial discrimination gives unfriendly governments the most effective kind of ammunition for their propaganda warfare. The hostile reaction among normally friendly peoples, many of whom are particularly sensitive in regard to the status of non-European races, is growing in alarming proportions. In such countries the view is expressed more and more vocally that the United States is hypocritical in claiming to be the champion of democracy while permitting practices of racial discrimination here in this country.

232307—52——2

> The segregation of school children on a racial basis is one of the practices in the United States that has been singled out for hostile foreign comment in the United Nations and elsewhere. Other peoples cannot understand how such a practice can exist in a country which professes to be a staunch supporter of freedom, justice, and democracy. The sincerity of the United States in this respect will be judged by its deeds as well as by its words.
>
> Although progress is being made, the continuance of racial discrimination in the United States remains a source of constant embarrassment to this Government in the day-to-day conduct of its foreign relations; and it jeopardizes the effective maintenance of our moral leadership of the free and democratic nations of the world.[6]

II

The Court may not find it necessary to reach the question whether the "separate but equal" doctrine should be reaffirmed or overruled

The briefs in these cases are largely concerned with the question, specifically reserved in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 635–636, whether the "separate but equal" doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, "should be reexamined in the light of contemporary knowledge respecting [6] Letter to the Attorney General, dated December 2, 1952. The earlier letter of May 8, 1946, referred to by the Secretary, is quoted in To Secure These Rights, note 4, supra, pp. 146–147.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and the effects of racial segregation."

In the Sweatt case (p. 631) the opinion stated: "We have frequently reiterated that this Court will decide constitutional questions only when necessary to the disposition of the case at hand, and that such decisions will be drawn as narrowly as possible." The essential requisites for constitutional adjudication "may be lacking though there be entire disinterestedness on both sides in their desire to secure at the earliest possible moment an adjudication on constitutional power."[7] The Court has emphasized that "it is bound by two rules, to which it has rigidly adhered, one, never to anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity of deciding it; the other never to formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied. These rules are safe guides to sound judgment. It is the dictate of wisdom to follow them closely and carefully." Liverpool Steamship Company v. Emigration Commissioners, 113 U. S. 33, 39. Additional authorities are collected in the concurring opinion of Brandeis, J., in Ashwander v. T. V. A., 297 U. S. 288, 346–348.

Because of its "traditional reluctance to extend constitutional interpretations to situations or facts" not actually presented to it, the Court has declined to pass on the abstract constitutionality of racial segregation per se in cases where such an issue was raised but where other or additional grounds for finding inequality were present. Sweatt v. Painter, supra; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631, 633; Fisher v. Hurst, 333 U. S. 147, 150; Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337; cf. Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, 826. The Court may find, upon examination of the records in the cases at bar, that none of them presents inescapably the question whether separate but otherwise equal public schools for white and colored children are, solely because they are separate, constitutionally unequal.

[7] United States v. CIO, 335 U. S. 106, 126 (concurring opinion).

That question would not arise unless and until it were found as a fact, upon the basis of supporting evidence, that the separate schools are equal in the educational benefits and opportunities afforded children of both races. Such a finding, if made by a district court and sustained by the evidence, would make it necessary to decide whether the establishment of such "separate but equal" schools satisfies the requirements of the Constitution. In none of the cases before the Court, however, is there such a finding.

In the Virginia, South Carolina, and Delaware cases, physical inequality, apart from segregation, was expressly found, and these findings of fact are not here challenged. (No. 101, R. 210, 307; No. 191, R. 622, 624; No. 448, R. 48–66.) The specific findings of inequality in those cases make it unnecessary to go further in order to establish that plaintiffs' constitutional rights have been violated. Failure of a state to provide "equal" educational facilities to some of its citizens, solely because of their race or color, is without more a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. "The admissibility of laws separating the races in the enjoyment of privileges afforded by the State rests wholly upon the equality of the privileges which the laws give to the separated groups within the State." Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 349. The constitutional right to equality of educational opportunity is "personal and present" (Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 635), and it is no answer to the particular plaintiffs' claim to say that, at some time in the future, colored persons as a group will be treated "equally." A state can discharge its obligation to persons discriminated against only by furnishing them equal educational benefits "as soon as it does for applicants of any other group." Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631, 633. We agree with the Supreme Court of Delaware in No. 448 that, in cases where separate schools are found physically unequal, the particular plaintiffs should not be required to attend inferior schools until such time as the state may complete an "equalization" program. Accordingly, the district courts, upon making such findings in the Virginia and South Carolina cases, erred in withholding from the plaintiffs the relief to which they were then immediately entitled. If and when it should be found as a fact, and not merely prophesied, that "equalization" has been accomplished, there would arise the question which on the present records in the Virginia and South Carolina cases may be deemed hypothetical, namely, whether "equalization" is the same as equality. Cf. Wilshire Oil Co. v. United States, 295 U. S. 100, 102.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the Kansas case, the district court found equality of physical facilities, curricula, qualifications of teachers, transportation service, etc., and held that the plaintiffs were "denied no constitutional rights or privileges by reason of any of these matters." (R. 245–246.) But it also made the following finding of fact (ibid.):

> Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retain [retard?] the educational and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school system.[8]

[8] A substantially identical finding of fact was made by the Chancellor in the Delaware case. The state Supreme Court, although it held that this finding was "immaterial" to the constitutional issue, did not reject it as unsupported by the evidence.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

This is not a finding of "separate but equal." On the contrary, it is a finding of "separate but unequal," or more precisely, "separate and hence unequal." Despite this finding, the district court held that the plaintiffs' constitutional right to equality of treatment had not been violated. This holding was based solely on the court's understanding of the "separate but equal" doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson. The district court thought that that case required it to hold as a matter of law that separate schools are legally equal even though it finds that, because of segregation, they are in fact unequal. This, we submit, was plain error even if it be assumed that Plessy is still controlling.

Plessy v. Ferguson did not purport to lay down an inexorable rule of law, which could not be challenged at any time in the future no matter how different the circumstances, that segregation could never create inequality. In the Plessy case the Court said only that, as a general matter, laws requiring the separation of white and colored persons "do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other." (P. 544; italics added.) This was asserted as if it were axiomatic and too obvious to admit of dissent. We do not pause here to demonstrate the errors of fact and law contained in the Court's generalization.[9] It suffices to note that the Plessy case plainly does not preclude a district court from finding, as the district court found in the Kansas case, that segregation can, and in the particular instance does, produce unequal and inferior treatment. In Plessy the Court indulged in an abstract speculation as to the effects of racial segregation in general; in No. 8 there is a contrary finding of fact, based on evidence and not on unproved assumptions, as to the particular effects of racial segregation in public schools on the education of colored children. Hence, we believe, the Kansas district court erred in construing Plessy v. Ferguson as compelling a holding of constitutional equality where there is a specific finding of fact that the particular type of enforced racial segregation creates inequality.

[9] See Brief for the United States, pp. 27–35, 49–60, in Henderson v. United States, No. 25, Oct. Term 1949, 339 U. S. 816.

The District of Columbia case arises on the pleadings, the precise issue being whether the district court erred in granting the motion to dismiss the complaint. No evidence was taken, and no findings of fact were made. To the extent that determination of the constitutional questions raised may depend on facts, the case may not be in an appropriate posture for deciding such questions. Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, 331 U. S. 549, 568–575, and cases cited.

In any event, it is contended that the action of respondents in establishing segregated schools in the District of Columbia infringes petitioners' rights under the Fifth Amendment. Respondents assert that such segregation is compelled by certain Acts of Congress, and their interpretation of these Acts was upheld by the district court in dismissing the complaint, apparently on the authority of Carr v. Corning, 182 F. 2d 14 (C. A. D. C.). There is, therefore, an initial question of statutory construction.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Court may find this an appropriate case for application of the well-settled rule of construction that doubts as to the meaning of a statute should be resolved so as to avoid serious constitutional questions. The Court has in countless cases affirmed its duty "in construing congressional enactments to take care to interpret them so as to avoid a danger of unconstitutionality." United States v. CIO, 335 U. S 106, 120–121, and cases cited. There is room for reasonable argument that in the pertinent statutes Congress assumed the existence of a system of segregated schools in the District of Columbia, but did not make it mandatory upon the responsible District authorities to maintain and continue such segregation.

The language of these Acts of Congress may be regarded as significantly different from the constitutional and statutory provisions involved in the state cases. Typical of the latter in their explicitness are those of Virginia.[10] Its Constitution (1902, Article IX, section 140) provides:

[10] The texts of the constitutional and statutory provisions in states having school segregation are quoted in appellees' brief in No. 101, pp. 38–46.

"White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school." Its statutes (Code 1950, section 22–221) provide: "White and colored persons shall not be taught in the same school, but shall be taught in separate schools, under the same general regulations as to management, usefulness and efficiency."

No similarly explicit and mandatory language, manifesting an unmistakable intention to make racial segregation compulsory in the public schools of the District of Columbia, is to be found in the pertinent Acts of Congress.[11] If Congress had expressly required such segregation, a grave and difficult question under the Fifth Amendment would arise. This question could be avoided if these Acts were construed as meaning only that in them Congress assumed, but neither approved nor disapproved, the fact of a segregated school system in the District. Such a construction, we suggest, is not precluded by the terms of the legislation. Cf. Ex parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283, 303, note 24, and cases cited. If the Court should adopt this construction, it would be appropriate to remand the case to the district court with instructions to enter a declaratory judgment to that effect. The respondent Board of Education would then be free to abandon the present segregated school system in the District of Columbia. If it should thereafter continue to maintain such a segregated school system, its action [11] These provisions are set out in petitioners' brief in No. 413, pp. 23–26.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

could not be based upon any asserted mandate from Congress but would arise solely from its own independent ~~action~~ choice. In such event the legal questions which might arise would not be the same as those now sought to be raised.

III

If the Court should reach the question, the "separate but equal" doctrine should be reexamined and overruled

In the briefs submitted by the United States in Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, and in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, the Government argued that racial segregation imposed or supported by law is per se unconstitutional. We renew that argument here. Without repeating in detail the grounds, stated at length in those briefs, for the conclusion that the doctrine of "separate but equal" is wrong as a matter of constitutional law, history, and policy, the United States again urges the Court, if it should reach the question, to reexamine and overrule that doctrine.

The Government submits that compulsory racial segregation is itself, without more, an unconstitutional discrimination. "Separate but equal" is a contradiction in terms. Schools or other public facilities where persons are segregated by law, solely on the basis of race or color, cannot in any circumstances be regarded as equal. The constitutional requirement is that of equality, not merely in one sense of the word but in every sense. Nothing in the language or history of the Fourteenth Amendment supports the notion that facilities need be equal only in a physical sense.

People who are compelled by law to live in a ghetto do not enjoy equality, even though their houses are as good as, or better than, those on the outside. Cf. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60. The same is true of children who know that because of their color the law sets them apart from others, and requires them to attend separate schools specially established for members of their race. The facts of every-day life confirm the finding of the district court in the Kansas case that segregation has a "detrimental effect" on colored children; that it affects their motivation to learn; and that it has a tendency to retard their educational and mental development and to deprive them of benefits they would receive in an integrated school system. (Supra, p. 12.) Similar considerations are reflected in the opinions of this Court in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases, 339 U. S. at 633–635 and 641–642.

The broad principle underlying the decisions of this Court from Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, to the Sweatt and McLaurin cases is that the Fourteenth Amendment forbids the classification of students on the basis of race or color so as to deny one group educational advantages and opportunities afforded to another. To be sure, those cases involved university graduate and professional schools, but nothing in the language or history of the Fourteenth Amendment could support a constitutional distinction between universities on the one hand, and public elementary or high schools on the other. Strict insistence upon the constitutional requirement of equality is no less necessary as applied to public schools which, as has been said, are "designed to serve as perhaps the most powerful agency for promoting cohesion among a heterogeneous democratic people * * *. The public school is at once the symbol of our democracy and the most pervasive means for promoting our common destiny." [12]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Similarly, nothing in the language or history of the Fourteenth Amendment could support an interpretation which permits segregation of Negroes but not of other groups in the community. Indeed, as the Court has pointed out in many cases, that Amendment was primarily designed to assure to colored persons the right to be treated under the law exactly like white persons, and to protect them against being singled out for special or discriminatory treatment.

Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, decided in 1880, was the first case in which the Court was called upon to deal with the application of the Fourteenth Amendment to a state law making a classification based on race or color. The interpretation placed on the Amendment in that case (pp. 306–308) is especially significant, not merely because of its comprehensive nature, but because it was made by a Court whose members had lived during the period when the Amendment was adopted:

[12] McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U. S. 203, at 216, 231 (concurring opinion).

> This [the Fourteenth Amendment] is one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose; namely, securing to a race recently emancipated, a race that through many generations had been held in slavery, all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy. The true spirit and meaning of the amendments, as we said in the Slaughter-House Cases (16 Wall. 36), cannot be understood without keeping in view the history of the times when they were adopted, and the general objects they plainly sought to accomplish. At the time when they were incorporated into the Constitution, it required little knowledge of human nature to anticipate * * * that State laws might be enacted or enforced to perpetuate the distinctions that had before existed. Discriminations against them had been habitual. It is well known that in some States laws making such discriminations then existed, and others might well be expected. * * * It was in view of these considerations the Fourteenth Amendment was framed and adopted. It was designed to assure to the colored race the > enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the general government, in that enjoyment, whenever it should be denied by the States. * * *

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

>
> * * * What is this but declaring that the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the States, and, in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color?
>
> * * * The very fact that colored people are singled out * * * is practically a brand upon them, affixed by the law, an assertion of their inferiority, and a stimulant to that race prejudice which is an impediment to securing to individuals of the race that equal justice which the law aims to secure to all others.

Referring to the civil rights statutes (now 8 U. S. C. 41 and 42) enacted by Congress pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court in Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318, stated: "The plain object of these statutes, as of the Constitution which authorized them, was to place the colored race, in respect of civil rights, upon a level with whites. They made the rights and responsibilities, civil and criminal, of the two races exactly the same." See also the Slaughter-

House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 70–72, 81, and Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 76.

In Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410, 420, the Court said: "The Fourteenth Amendment and the laws adopted under its authority thus embody a general policy that all persons lawfully in this country shall abide 'in any state' on an equality of legal privileges with all citizens under non-discriminatory laws." Cf. Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24, 30–34. And in Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 23, the Chief Justice stated for the Court:

> The historical context in which the Fourteenth Amendment became a part of the Constitution should not be forgotten. Whatever else the framers sought to achieve, it is clear that the matter of primary concern was the establishment of equality in the enjoyment of basic civil and political rights and the preservation of those rights from discriminatory action on the part of the States based on considerations of race or color.

"Separate but equal" is sometimes described as an "ancient" doctrine of constitutional law. But its antiquity dates not from the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 but from a judicial expression which did not make its appearance in the reports of this Court until 1896. Almost three decades after ratification of the post-bellum Amendments, when "the history of the times when they were adopted, and the general objects they plainly sought to accomplish" may have become blurred by the passage of time, the opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, read into the Fourteenth Amendment a qualification that enforced separation of white and colored persons in the use of public facilities does not violate the Amendment so long as the separate accommodations are "equal." This judicial contraction of the constitutional rights secured by the Amendment is irreconcilable with the body of decisions which preceded and followed Plessy v. Ferguson, and is not justified by the considerations adduced to support it.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the Plessy case the view was expressed (p. 551) that the alternative to racial segregation compelled by law is "an enforced commingling" of white and colored persons. This observation, apart from its irrelevance to the constitutional issue, is a plain non sequitur. Segregation imposed by law is an interference with the right of an individual to exercise a voluntary choice as to those with whom he will associate. To remove such an interference is to enlarge individual freedom, not to limit it. "Commingling" between white and colored persons can then result as the product of voluntary choice, not of legal coercion. Cf. McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 641–642.

In the Plessy case the Court also said (p. 551) that "Legislation is powerless to eradicate racial instincts or to abolish distinctions based upon physical differences, and the attempt to do so can only result in accentuating the difficulties of the present situation." This observation also was irrelevant to the constitutional issue before the Court. It might properly have been made before a legislative body considering a bill to penalize acts manifesting racial prejudice. But the Court was not called upon to make a judgment of policy as to the wisdom of legislation designed to eradicate racial prejudice; the only question before it was whether a particular statute violated a constitutionally-protected right.

In any event, this observation in the Plessy opinion is, at best, a half-truth. Although legislation may not be able to "eradicate" racial prejudice, experience has shown that it can create conditions favorable to the gradual elimination of racial prejudice; or it can, on the other hand, strengthen and enhance it. As the Supreme Court of California has said, the way to eradicate racial tension is not "through the perpetuation by law of the prejudices that give rise to the tension."[13] Even if statutes cannot in themselves remove racial antagonisms, they cannot constitutionally exacerbate such antagonisms by giving the sanction of law to what would otherwise be private acts of discrimination.

The above-quoted statements in the Plessy opinion illustrate the extent to which the "separate but equal" doctrine represented the views of the members of the Court as the best solution for "the difficulties of the present situation" then existing. But the Justices were being called upon to make, not a judgment as to desirable legislative policy, but a judicial judgment as to the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment which would be most faithful to its terms, history, and purposes.

[13] Perez v. Sharp, 32 Calif. 2d 711, 725.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Whatever the merits in 1896 of a judgment as to the wisdom or reasonableness of the rule of "separate but equal", it should now be discarded as a negation of rights secured by the Constitution. The Court has said that "It is of the very nature of a free society to advance in its standards of what is deemed reasonable and right. Representing as it does a living principle, due process is not confined within a permanent catalogue of what may at a given time be deemed the limits or essentials of fundamental rights." Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25, 27. "* * * the provisions of the Constitution are not mathematical formulas having their essence in their form; they are organic living institutions transplanted from English soil. Their significance is vital not formal; it is to be gathered not simply by taking the words and a dictionary, but by considering their origin and the line of their growth." Gompers v. United States, 233 U. S. 604, 610.

In sum, the doctrine of "separate but equal" is an unwarranted departure, based upon dubious assumptions of fact combined with a disregard of the basic purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment, from the fundamental principle that all Americans, whatever their race or color, stand equal and alike before the law. The rule of stare decisis does not give it immunity from reexamination and rejection. In Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649, 665–666, the Court said:

> * * * we are not unmindful of the desirability of continuity of decision in constitutional questions. However, when convinced of former error, this Court has never felt constrained to follow precedent. In constitutional questions, where correction depends upon amendment and not upon legislative action this Court throughout its history has freely exercised its power to reexamine the basis of its constitutional decisions. This has long been accepted practice, and this practice has continued to this day. This is particularly true when the decision believed erroneous is the application of a constitutional principle rather than an interpretation of the Constitution to extract the principle itself.[14]

[14] "* * * the ultimate touchstone of constitutionality is the Constitution itself and not what we have said about it." Graves v. N. Y. ex rel. O'Keefe, 306 U. S. 466, 491–492 (concurring opinion). In Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283, 470, Mr. Chief Justice Taney agreed that "it be regarded hereafter as the law of this court, that its opinion upon the construction of the Constitution is always open to discussion when it is supposed to have been founded in error, and that its judicial authority should hereafter depend altogether on the force of the reasoning by which it is supported."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

IV

If in any of these cases the Court should hold that a system of "separate but equal" public schools is unconstitutional, it should remand the case to the district court with directions to devise and execute such program for relief as appears most likely to achieve orderly and expeditious transition to a non-segregated system

It is fundamental that a court of equity has full power to fashion a remedy to meet the needs of the particular situation before it. Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U. S. 607, 622; Radio Station WOW, Inc. v. Johnson, 326 U. S. 120, 132; Eccles v. Peoples Bank, 333 U. S. 426, 431; Alexander v. Hillman, 296 U. S. 222, 239; Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Railway Co., 163 U. S. 564, 600–601. The fact that a system or practice is determined to be unlawful does not of itself require the court to order that it be abandoned forthwith. Thus, where a violation of the antitrust laws has persisted over a long period of time, resulting in a tangled complex of economic arrangements tainted with illegality, it is recognized that a decree calling for complete elimination of the illegal arrangements overnight would be impracticable. For example, dissolution of the illegal combinations involved in the Standard Oil and Motion Picture [15] cases was deliberately [15] Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1; United States v. Paramount Pictures, 70 F. Supp. 53 (S. D. N. Y.), 334 U. S. 131, 85 F. Supp. 881, 339 U. S. 974. See also United States v. National Lead Co., 332 U. S. 319, 329–335; United States v. Aluminum Co., 322 U. S. 716, 148 F. 2d 416 (S. D. N. Y.), 171 F. 2d 285, 91 F. Supp. 333, 419.

required to take place over a period of years.[16]

If, in any of the present cases, the Court should hold that to compel colored children to attend "separate but equal" public schools is unconstitutional, the Government would suggest that in shaping the relief the Court should take into account the need, not only for prompt vindication of the constitutional rights violated, but also for orderly and reasonable solution of the vexing problems which may arise in eliminating such segregation. The public interest plainly would be served by avoidance of needless dislocation and confusion in the administration of the school systems affected. It must be recognized that racial segregation in public schools has been in effect in many states for a long time. Its roots go deep in the history and traditions of these states. The practical difficulties which may be met in making progressive adjustment to a non-segregated system cannot be ignored or minimized.[17]

---

[16] As another example, when Congress determined that certain holding company arrangements were illegal, it delayed elimination of such arrangements in particular cases until a satisfactory plan for their dissolution should be proposed by the parties and approved by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, 49 Stat. 820, 15 U. S. C. § 79k.

[17] These anticipated difficulties relate, of course, only to the question of relief; they cannot affect the merits of the constitutionality of compulsory racial segregation. Moreover, the discussion in this section of the brief assumes that the separate schools for colored children are in other respects "equal." It would be manifestly unfair and unjust,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

A decision that the Constitution forbids the maintenance of "separate but equal" public schools will necessarily result in invalidation of provisions of constitutions, statutes, and administrative regulations in many states—provisions which were adopted in good faith upon the assumption, supported by previous declarations of this Court, that they were consistent with the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment. A reasonable period of time will obviously be required to permit formulation of new provisions of law governing the administration of schools in areas affected by the Court's decision. School authorities may wish to give pupils a choice of attending one of several schools, a choice now prohibited. Teachers may have to be transferred, and teaching schedules rearranged. It is possible, of course, that abolition of segregation would in many areas produce no serious dislocations, and no wholesale transfers of teachers or pupils would be required. This could result from purely geographical factors, for it would still be likely that the pupils of a school would be representative of the area in which it is situated.

These are indicative of the kinds of problems which may arise in giving effect to a holding that "separate but equal" school systems are unconstitutional. We suggest that any relief which and contrary to the Court's decisions, to withhold immediate relief where the separate schools are also physically unequal and inferior. See pp. 10–12, supra.

---

this Court may direct should contemplate the possibility of such problems and afford opportunity for their expeditious settlement within a specified period. Moreover, to the extent that there may exist popular opposition in some sections to abolition of racially-segregated school systems, we believe that a program for orderly and progressive transition would tend to lessen such antagonism. An appropriate tribunal to devise and supervise execution of such a program is a district court, which could fashion particular orders to meet particular needs. On remand, that court could direct the parties to submit proposals for such a program. And if the district court so desires, it could appoint an advisory committee of lawyers and other citizens to assist it in this task. After the district court adopts a program, either side could seek review, by appeal or otherwise, if it believes the program does not conform to this Court's decision. At reasonable intervals after the program is put into effect, the parties should submit progress reports to the district court, which should have the power, if circumstances so require, to enter any further orders found to be necessary.

Such a procedure should afford opportunity to responsible school authorities to develop a program most suited to their own conditions and needs. Thus, subject to the court's approval, a school board might propose integration on a grade basis, i. e., to integrate the first grades immediately, and to continue such integration until completed as to all grades in the elementary schools. Cf. Great Northern R. Co. v. Sunburst Oil Co., 287 U. S. 358. Another board might deem it more feasible to integrate on a school-by-school basis. In some states where there is segregation only in some grades of the elementary schools, as a result of the discretionary action of the authorities, it may be feasible to put a non-segregated system into effect immediately.[18]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

CONCLUSION

The subordinate position occupied by Negroes in this country as a result of governmental discriminations ("second-class citizenship," as it is sometimes called) presents an unsolved problem for American democracy, an inescapable challenge to the sincerity of our espousal of the democratic faith.

In these days, when the free world must conserve and fortify the moral as well as the material sources of its strength, it is especially important to affirm that the Constitution of the United States places no limitation, express or implied, [18] It is assumed that the district courts are, because of their familiarity with local conditions, the appropriate tribunals to deal with issues of relief. It may be, however, that the Court will wish to formulate more precise standards and provisions for the guidance of the district courts. In that event we suggest that several procedures are available. One would be for the Court to issue no decree at this time, but to set the matter down for argument at a later date on the question of relief. Another would be to appoint a special master to hold hearings and make recommendations to the Court on that question.

on the principle of the equality of all men before the law. Mr. Justice Harlan said in his dissent in the Plessy case (163 U. S. at 562):

> We boast of the freedom enjoyed by our people above all other peoples. But it is difficult to reconcile that boast with a state of the law which, practically, puts the brand of servitude and degradation upon a large class of our fellow-citizens, our equals before the law.

The Government and people of the United States must prove by their actions that the ideals expressed in the Bill of Rights are living realities, not literary abstractions. As the President has stated:

> If we wish to inspire the people of the world whose freedom is in jeopardy, if we wish to restore hope to those who have already lost their civil liberties, if we wish to fulfill the promise that is ours, we must correct the remaining imperfections in our practice of democracy.
>
> We know the way. We need only the will.[19]

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES P. MCGRANERY,
Attorney General.

PHILIP ELMAN,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

DECEMBER 1952.

[19] Message to the Congress, note 1, supra, p. 7.

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1952

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

RIDER - Supplemental Brief for the United States

(Nos. 1, 2, 4, 8, and 10)

The following should be inserted in the Supplemental Brief for the United States, immediately after the paragraph ending on the top of page 71:

> Both bills passed the Senate on May 21, 1866. On that day the Senate considered 18 measures, and passed 10. Of those considered 10 were District bills, 7 of which were passed. There was practically no debate or comment on any of these measures, and no discussion of any of the District bills passed. (Globe, pp. 2706-2723.)
>
> S. 246 (dealing with the school funds) passed the House on July 18, 1866. On that day the House considered 23 measures, passed 9 bills, and concurred in Senate amendments to 11 more. This included consideration of 5 District measures, 4 of which were passed. There was no discussion of any of the District bills passed. (Globe, pp. 3905-3913.)
>
> S. 247 (dealing with the school lots) passed the House on July 27, 1866, the next to last day of the session. On that day the House held a day and evening session. In the evening session, lasting from 7:30 p.m. to 7:50 a.m., it considered 38 measures, and passed 23. There was brief debate on only 8 of the 23 measures passed. The entire "debate" on S. 247 consisted of a question and answer as to the size of the lots. (Globe, pp. 4262-4288.)

INDEX

I and II

	Page
The contemporary understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment with respect to its effect on racial segregation in public schools	3
A. Introductory	4
1. The reconstruction period	4
2. Public education in the United States in 1866	8
B. The historical origins and background of the Fourteenth Amendment	9
1. The anti-slavery origins of the reconstruction amendments	9
2. The status of Negroes (legal, economic, and educational) at the close of the Civil War	14
C. The legislative history of the Thirteenth Amendment and implementing legislation	17
1. The Thirteenth Amendment	17
2. Implementing legislation: The Freedmen's Bureau bills, and the Civil Rights Act of 1866	20
D. The Fourteenth Amendment in Congress	32
1. The Stevens "apportionment" amendment	33
2. The Bingham "equal rights" amendment	36
3. H. J. Res. 127: the Fourteenth Amendment	41
a. The House debate	42
b. The Senate debate	48
E. The ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment by the States	57
F. Contemporaneous actions, federal and state, bearing on school segregation	66
1. Federal legislation in the 39th Congress	67
a. The Freedmen's Bureau Extension Act	67
b. School legislation for the District of Columbia	69
2. Legislation in Congress after 1866	72
a. Readmission of the Southern States	72
b. Legislative attempts to abolish school segregation in the District of Columbia	76
c. Civil Rights Act of 1875	78
3. State legislation and decisions	86
a. Negro education in the North	90
b. Negro education in the South	96
c. State judicial decisions on Negro education	100
d. Significance of the contemporaneous state laws providing for school segregation	104
G. Summary and conclusions	112

II

III

Page

It is within the judicial power, in construing the Fourteenth Amendment, to decide that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional 132

IV

If the Court holds that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional, it has power to direct such relief as in its judgment will best serve the interests of justice in the circumstances 152

V

If the Court holds that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional, it should remand these cases to the lower courts with directions to carry out this Court's decision as speedily as the particular circumstances permit 168

A. Obstacles to integration 170

B. The decrees 182

Conclusion 187

CITATIONS

Cases:

Adamson v. California, 332 U. S. 46 128

Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U. S. 607 155

Alexander v. Hillman, 296 U. S. 222 155

Armour & Co. v. Wantock, 323 U. S. 126 167

Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207 147

Atlantic Coast Line v. Florida, 295 U. S. 301 155

Attorney General v. Birmingham, 4 Kay & J. 528 (1858) ... 158

Attorney-General v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, 4 Ch. App. 146 158

Attorney General v. Corporation of Halifax, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 129 158

Attorney-General v. Finchley Local Board, 3 Times L. R. 356 . 158

Attorney-General v. Proprietors of the Bradford Canal, L. R. 2 Eq. 71 158

Bailey v. City of New York, 38 Misc. (N. Y.) 641 159

Baltimore v. Brack, 175 Md. 615 158

Beasley v. Texas and Pacific Ry. Co., 191 U. S. 492 156

Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U. S. 45 144

Board of Education v. Tinnon, 26 Kans. 1 102

Bonner, In re, 151 U. S. 242 156

Boston Rolling Mills v. Cambridge, 117 Mass. 396 158

Breed v. City of Lynn, 126 Mass. 367 158

Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U. S. 277 126

Brehm v. Richards, 152 Md. 126 158

Browder v. United States, 312 U. S. 335 131

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Cases—Continued	Page
Brown v. Board of Trustees, 187 F. 2d 20	163
Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60	141
Butterfield v. Zydok, 342 U. S. 524	157
Caretti v. Broring Building Co., 150 Md. 198	158
Central Kentucky Co. v. Railroad Commission, 290 U. S. 264	155
Chapman v. City of Rochester, 110 N. Y. 273	159
Chase v. Stephenson, 71 Ill. 383	101
City of Manchester v. Farnworth (1930), A. C. 171	158
City of San Diego v. Van Winkle, 69 Cal. App. 2d 237	158
Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3	7, 80
Clark v. The Board of Directors, etc., 24 Iowa 267	101, 103
Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264	166
Colegrove v. Green, 328 U. S. 549	150
Commonwealth v. Davis, 10 Weekly Notes 156 (1881)	104
Commonwealth v. Helm, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 532	112
Commonwealth ex rel. Brown v. Williamson, 10 Phila. 490	102
Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327	107, 146
Cumming v. Board of Education, 175 U. S. 528	107, 144
Dallas v. Fosdick, 40 How. Pr. Rep. 249 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. 1869)	89, 101
Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97	131
Doremus v. Mayor and Aldermen of Paterson, 79 N. J. Eq. 63	159
Dove v. The Independent School District, 41 Iowa 689	101
Eccles v. Peoples Bank, 333 U. S. 426	154
Euclid v. Amber Realty Co., 272 U. S. 365	142
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U. S. 1	126
Fay v. New York, 332 U. S. 261	136
French v. Chapin-Sacks Mfg. Co., 118 Va. 117	159
Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. 50	150
Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 237 U. S. 474, 240 U. S. 650	157, 164
Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475	150
Gompers v. United States, 233 U. S. 604	130
Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78	145
Great Central Ry. v. Doncaster Rural Council, 87 L. J. R. N. S. 80	158
Gregory v. Crain, 291 Ky. 194	158
Gundy v. Village of Merrill, 250 Mich. 416	159
Harding v. Stamford Water Co., 41 Conn. 87	158
Harper v. Railway Co., 76 W. Va. 788	164
Harrisonville v. Dickey Clay Co., 289 U. S. 334	158
Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U. S. 321	155, 156
Heim v. McCall, 239 U. S. 175	147
Helvering v. Davis, 301 U. S. 619	131
Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366	131
Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n. v. Blaisdell, 290 U. S. 398	128

Cases—Continued Page

Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24 111
Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516 131
Inland Steel Co. v. United States, 306 U. S. 153 156
Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1 164
Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214 140
Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 457 128
Lohman v. The St. Paul R. R. Co., 18 Minn. 174 159
Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1 150
Mahler v. Eby, 264 U. S. 32 157
Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581 ..... 126, 140
McCabe v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co., 235 U. S. 151 ..... 164, 167
McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 128
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637 ..... 136, 148, 149, 151, 164
McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1 126
Medley, Petitioner, 134 U. S. 160 157
Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Co., 320 U. S. 661 156
Metropolitan Rd. v. District of Columbia, 132 U. S. 1 70
Minnesota v. National Tea Co., 309 U. S. 551 154
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337 ..... 65, 107, 136, 143, 146, 164
Moody v. Village of Saratoga Springs, 17 App. Div. (N. Y.) 207 affirmed, 163 N. Y. 581 159
Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370 140
Nebraska v. Wyoming, 325 U. S. 589 164
Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U. S. 536 ..... 112, 141
Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197 159
North Staffordshire Ry. Co. v. Board of Health, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 131 (1870) 158
Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S. 118 150
People v. Easton, 13 Abbott's Pr. R. (N. S.) 159 (Sup. Ct., 1872) 103
People ex rel. John Longress v. The Board of Education, etc., 101 Ill. 308 102
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 ..... 140, 144
Porter v. Warner Co., 328 U. S. 395 156
The Protector, 12 Wall. 700 150
Radio Station WOW, Inc. v. Johnson, 326 U. S. 120 ..... 154, 156
Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U. S. 496 156
Railway Express v. New York, 336 U. S. 106 138
Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 198 ..... 12, 103, 145
Rochin v. California, 342 U. S. 165 131
Sammons v. City of Gloversville, 34 Misc. (N. Y.) 459 159
Screws v. United States, 325 U. S. 91 136

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Cases—Continued

	Page
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1	111, 141, 164, 181
Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631	107, 136, 148, 164, 165
Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36	118, 119, 139
Smith v. The Directors, etc., 40 Iowa 518	101
South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437	131
Southern R. Co. v. Franklin &c. M. C. R. Co., 96 Va. 693	164
Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1	160, 162
State v. White, 90 N. J. Eq. 621	159
State Board of Equalization v. Young's Market Co., 299 U. S. 59	126
State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198	92, 95, 103, 107, 146
State ex rel. Hatfield v. Carrington, 194 Ia. 785	112
State ex rel. Stoutmeyer v. Duffy, 7 Nev. 342	102, 146
Stovern v. Town of Calmar, 204 Ia. 983	158
Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303	110, 111, 118, 122, 139
Suburban Land Co., Inc. v. Billerica, 314 Mass. 184	158
Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629	107, 136, 148, 149, 151, 164
Tod v. Waldman, 266 U. S. 113	157
Town of Purcellville v. Potts, 179 Va. 514	159
Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. Chicago, &c. Ry. Co., 163 U. S. 564	155
United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75	147
United States v. Aluminum Co., 322 U. S. 716, 148 F. 2d 416, 171 F. 2d 285, 91 F. Supp. 333	160
United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 191 Fed. 371	160, 185
United States v. Classic, 313 U. S. 299	130
United States v. International Harvester Co., 214 Fed. 987, 274 U. S. 693	160, 162, 163
United States v. Morgan, 307 U. S. 183	155, 157
United States v. National Lead Co., 332 U. S. 319	154, 160
United States v. Paramount Pictures, 70 F. Supp. 53, 334 U. S. 131, 85 F. Supp. 881, 339 U. S. 974	160, 163
United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. 649	128
Van Camp v. Board of Education of Logan, 9 Ohio 406	12
Virginia, Ex parte, 100 U. S. 339	109, 124, 137, 138, 140
Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313	124, 137, 139
Virginian Railway Co. v. System Federation, 300 U. S. 515	156
Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36	103, 107
Weems v. United States, 217 U. S. 349	129
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624	151
Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183	147
Williams v. United States, 341 U. S. 97	136
Winchell v. City of Waukesha, 110 Wis. 101	159
Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25	131, 142
Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S 414	156

	Page
Executive Orders and Regulations:
Emancipation Proclamation, 1863	4
Executive Order 9346, May 27, 1943, 8 F. R. 7183	179
Executive Order 9980 of July 26, 1948, 13 F. R. 4311	179
Executive Order 10479, August 15, 1953, 18 F. R. 4899	179
Proclamation No. 16 of Sept. 22, 1862, 12 Stat. 1267	18
5 C. F. R. 410 1–7 (1952 Supp.)	179
Federal Statutes:
The Captured and Abandoned Property Act of 1863, 12 Stat. 820	18
Civil Rights Act of 1866, 14 Stat. 27	5, 20, 59
Civil Rights Act of March 1, 1875, 18 Stat. 335	7, 66, 80, 85
Confiscation Act of 1861, 12 Stat. 319	18
Enforcement Act of 1870, 16 Stat. 140	6
Freedmen's Bureau Extension Act, July 16, 1866, 14 Stat. 173	21, 67
Reconstruction Act of March 2, 1867, 14 Stat. 428	5, 72, 98
12 Stat. 376	4
Act of May 20, 1862, 12 Stat. 394	69
Act of May 21, 1862, 12 Stat. 407	69
12 Stat. 432	4
Act of June 25, 1864, 13 Stat. 187	69
13 Stat. 567, 774	19
Act of July 23, 1866, 14 Stat. 216	69, 71
Act of July 28, 1866, 14 Stat. 343	69, 71
14 Stat. 428, sec. 5	98
16 Stat. 59, Dec. 22, 1869	76
16 Stat. 62	74, 88
16 Stat. 67	74, 88
16 Stat. 80	74, 88
16 Stat. 363	75
18 Stat. 336	136
8 U. S. C.:
41	124
42	124
41–48	136
44	136
18 U. S. C.:
241–243	136
28 U. S. C.:
1343	136
2243	157
State Constitutions and Statutes:
Alabama Constitution of 1867, Art. I, sec. 2	98
Alabama Laws 1868, p. 148 (Act of the Board of Education)	100
Arkansas Laws 1866–67, No. 35, Sec. 5, p. 100	99

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

State Constitutions and Statutes—Continued

	Page
Arkansas Laws 1868, No. 52, Sec. 107:
P. 163	100
P. 148	100
California Laws 1866, c. 342, sec. 57	89
Connecticut Public Laws 1868, p. 206	93
Delaware Laws 1875, ch. 48	89, 94
District of Columbia Code (1951 ed.):
§§ 31–670, 31–671	171
§§ 31–1110, 31–1112	170
Florida Constitution of 1868, Art. IX, sec. 1	100
Florida Laws 1865, No. 12, ch. 1475	100
Georgia Laws 1870, No. 53, Sec. 32	100
Illinois Public Laws 1872, p. 700	93
Illinois Public Laws 1874, p. 120	93
Indiana Laws 1869 (Special session), p. 41	89, 93
Indiana Laws 1877, p. 124	93
Kansas Laws 1867, ch. 125	93
Kentucky Laws (Gen. St. 1873—Bullock & Johnson), ch. 62, Art. III, § 2	110
Kentucky Laws 1873–1874, ch. 521	94
Louisiana Constitution of 1868:
Art. 2	98
Art. 13	99
Arts. 135, 136	98
Maryland, Annotated Code (Flack ed., 1951), Art. 77, §§ 42 (4), 208	171
Maryland Laws 1868, c. 407, c. IX	89, 94
Maryland Laws 1872, c. 377, c. XVIII	94
Massachusetts Acts and Resolves 1867, p. 820	61
Michigan Laws 1867, Act. No. 34	93
Mississippi Code (1942 ed.), Art. 15, §§ 6808–6811	171
Mississippi Constitution of 1868, Art. I, Sec. 21	99
Missouri Laws (Wagner's Mo. Stat. 1870 (2d ed.) ch. 80, § 2)	111
North Carolina Laws, 1868–1869, ch. 184, Sec. 50, p. 471	100
51 Ohio Laws, p. 429, sec. 31 (1853), as amended, 61 Ohio Laws 31, sec. 4 (1864)	88
Oregon (Gen. Laws of Oregon, 1843–1872, Civil Code, § 918)	111
South Carolina Code (1952), §§ 21–251, 21–290	170
South Carolina Constitution of 1868, Art. X, secs. 10, 39	98
Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, title 49, ch. 8	171
Virginia Laws 1869–1870, ch. 259, Sec. 47	100
West Virginia Acts of 1872–1873, p. 102, reenacting chapter 116 of the 1870 Code	110

Congressional Reports and Documents: Page

H. Ex. Doc. No. 315 (1871), 41st Cong., 2d Sess. 8, 14, 16, 17, 90
H. J. Res. 127, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 21, 41, 42
H. R. 380, 42d Cong., 2d Sess. 79
H. R. 613, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 67
H. R. 783, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. 75
H. R. 796, 43d Cong., 2d Sess. 80, 83
H. R. 1050, 42d Cong., 2d Sess. 79
H. R. 1335, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. 76
S. 1, 43d Cong., 1st Sess. 79, 81
S. 9, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 22
S. 60, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 21, 23, 25
S. 61, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 23, 25
S. 365, 42d Cong., 2d Sess. 78
S. 916, 41st Cong , 2d Sess. 78
S. 1244, 41st Cong., 3d Sess. 76
S. Doc. No. 14, 83d Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 4–8. 173
S. Doc. 711, 63d Cong., 3d Sess. (Journal of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction) 32, 33, 36, 37, 38, 41, 42

State Miscellaneous:

Alabama Senate Journal 1866, p. 32. 63
Alabama Senate Journal 1868, p. 14. 97
Alabama Convention Journal, pp. 153, 237–238. 98
Arkansas Convention Debates and Proceedings, p. 645 et seq. 98, 100
Arkansas House Journal 1868. 64, 97
Florida Senate Journal 1866, p. 8. 64
Georgia Convention Journal, p. 151. 98
Georgia House Journal 1870, p. 416. 97
Georgia Senate Journal 1866, pp. 65–71. 63
Illinois Doc. 1869, vol. 2, p. 557. 91
Illinois Doc. 1871, pp. 355 et seq. (Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction 1869–1870). 93, 95
Illinois Doc. 1871, pp. 355–356 (Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction 1869–1870). 95
Illinois Doc. 1873, vol. 2 (Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction 1871–1872, pp. 115 et seq.) 95
Illinois Senate Journal 1867 (Governor Oglesby), p. 29. 61
Indiana Doc. 1865–1866, p. 339 (Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction 1865–1866). 94
Indiana Doc. 1867–1868 (Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction 1867–1868). 93, 94
Indiana Doc. 44th Reg. Sess. (1867), Part I, p. 338. 91
Indiana Senate Journal 1867, pp. 14, 40 et seq. 60
Louisiana Convention Journal, pp. 60–61, 94, 200–202, 268–270, 277. 98

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

State Miscellaneous—Continued — Page

Louisiana House Debates 1869, pp. 209–10, 217–20, 246–7. 100
Louisiana Legislative Documents 1870, Message of the Governor, p. 7 97
Maryland Docs. 1870, House Doc. A., pp. 14–15 92
Mississippi Convention Journal, pp. 316, 318, 479–480 98
New Hampshire House Journal 1866, p. 176, et seq. 62
New York Assembly Journal 1867, vol. 1, p. 13 61
North Carolina Public Docs. 1867–1868, Doc. No. 2, Sess. 1868, pp. 5–6 97
Ohio Doc. 1869, pp. 885, et seq. (18th Annual Report) 96
Ohio Constitutional Convention, 1873–1874, Debates, vol. 2, part 2:
pp. 2238, et seq 96
pp. 2240–41 96
Pennsylvania Leg. Rec., 1867 (Jenks Penn. Debates), Appendix:
p. XLI 61
p. IX 62
p. CCCXLII 96
Pennsylvania Leg. Rec., 1867, Appendix, pp. CCCXLII 96
Pennsylvania Leg. Rec., 1867 (Taylor in the Pennsylvania Debates), Appendix, p. XXII 61
South Carolina Convention Proceedings, pp. 71, 88, 100, 685–709, 889, 894, 899–901 98
Tennessee Senate Journal (Gov. Brownlow called Session), 1866, p. 4 61
Texas Convention Journal, I, pp. 896, 898, 912 98
Virginia Convention Journal, pp. 67, 299, 308, 333, 335, 336, 339, 340 98
Wisconsin Senate Journal, 1867, p. 96 62

General Miscellaneous:
American Freedman 1866, p. 18 68
Barnard, Special Report of the Commissioner of Education, H. Ex. Doc. No. 315, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. (1871) 8, 14, 16, 17, 90
Beach, High on Injunctions (4th ed.), sec. 746 159
Beach, Injunctions (1895), sec. 2 159
Bond, The Education of the Negro in the American Social Order, New York, 1934 16
Brandeis, The Living Law, 10 Ill. L. Rev. 461 (1916) 131
Brevier, Legislative Reports 1865 91, 95
Brevier, Legislative Reports 1867, p. 80 64
Brevier, Legislative Reports (1869), pp. 193 et seq., 340 et seq., 490 et seq 95
11 Brevier, Legislative Reports (1869 Extra Session), pp. 114 et seq., 387 et seq 95

General Miscellaneous—Continued	Page
Buck, The Road to Reunion, 1865–1900 (1937)	7
Bustard, The New Jersey Story: The Development of Racially Integrated Public Schools, 21 Journ. of Negro Education, 275 (1952)	178
Cardozo, The Growth of the Law (1924)	131
Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process (1921)	131
Cardozo, The Paradoxes of Legal Science (1928), p. 99	131
Chicago Com. on Human Relations, Report of the, The People of Chicago, 1947–1951	181
Cubberley, Public Education in the United States (1919), p. 119, et seq	8, 9, 12
Curtis, The Republican Party (1904), Vol. I, Ch. VI	13
Douglas, Stare Decisis (1949)	132
Dunning, Reconstruction Political and Economic 1865–1877 (1907), p. 41	7
Dumond, Antislavery Origins of the Civil War in the United States (1939)	10, 11, 13
Flack, The Adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment (1909), Chs. III, IV	59, 60, 63
Frankfurter, Law and Politics (1939)	132
Frankfurter, Mr. Justice Holmes' Constitutional Opinion (1923), 36 Harv. L. Rev. 909	131
Frankfurter, Mr. Justice Holmes and the Supreme Court (1938)	132
Graham, The Early Antislavery Backgrounds of the Fourteenth Amendment (1950), Wis. L. R. 479	10
Graham, Procedure to Substance—Extra-Judicial Rise of Due Process, 1830–1860, 40 Cal. L. R. 483 (1953)	10
Holmes, The Common Law (1881)	131
Holmes, The Path of the Law, 10 Harv. L. Rev. 457 (1897)	131
Housing and Home Finance Agency, Public Housing Administration, 1953, Open Occupancy in Public Housing	181
Hughes, Addresses (1916), pp. 354–355	131
Hughes, The Supreme Court of the United States (1928)	131
Hurd, Law of Freedom and Bondage in the United States (1862), Vol. 2, pp. 1–218	14
Integration of the Negro into American Society (1951)	182
Jackson, Full Faith and Credit (1945)	132
Jackson, The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy (1941)	132
James, The Framing of the Fourteenth Amendment (1939)	50
Jenkins, Pro-Slavery Thought in the Old South (1935)	10, 11
Knight, Public Education in the South (1922)	8, 9
Mangum, The Legal Status of the Negro (1940)	112
McPherson, Political History of the United States, 1860–1865 (1865)	119
McPherson's, Scrap Book, 14th Amendment, p. 84	65

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

General Miscellaneous—Continued Page

New York Times, Aug. 24, 1953, p. 21 178
Nye, Fettered Freedom (1949) 10, 11, 15
Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence (5th ed.), Secs. 111, 170, 175a 155
Pomeroy's Eq. Rem. (1905):
Secs. 531, 535 159
Sec. 761 164
Randall, The Civil War and Reconstruction (1937), p. 724 .. 15
Reed, Stare Decisis and Constitutional Law (1938), No. 35 Penna. Bar Ass'n Quarterly, 131 131
Selected Studies of Negro Employment in the South: 8 Southern Plants of International Harvester Company (National Planning Association, 1953) 181
1 Seton, Judgments and Orders (7th ed.), p. 612 158
Statistics of State School Systems 1949–1950 (Chapter 2 of Biennial Survey of Education in the United States (1948–1950) 172
Stephenson, Race Distinctions in American Law (1910), Ch. IV 14, 15
Stone, Fifty Years' Work of the Supreme Court (1928), 14 A. B. A. Journ. 428 131
Stone, Law and Its Administration (1924) 131
Story, Equity Jurisprudence (14th Ed.), Secs. 28, 578 155 ten Broek, The Anti-Slavery Origins of the Fourteenth Amendment (1951) 10, 11, 12, 13
Toledo Board of Community Relations, Report of the, 1951 181
U. S. News & World Report, October 16, 1953, pp. 46, 99 .. 180
"Transitional Housing Area," Report of the Director of the Mayor's Interracial Committee in Detroit (1952) ... 181
United Press Survey, New York Times, Jan. 22, 1951 181
Wickersham, J. P., A History of Education in Pennsylvania (1886), p. 506 109
Wilson, Rise and Fall of Slave Power in America (1874):
Vol. I, pp. 496–498 12
Vol. II, p. 406 ..... 13, 14
Woodward, Reunion and Reaction: The Compromise of 1877 and the End of Reconstruction (1951) 7

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1953

No. 1[1]

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES ON REARGUMENT

On June 8, 1953, the Court ordered these cases restored to the docket for reargument, and requested counsel in their briefs and on oral argument to discuss certain questions. The order also invited the Attorney General of the United States to take part in the oral argument and to file an additional brief if he so desires.[2]

[1] Together with No. 2, Briggs, et al. v. Elliott, et al.; No. 4, Dorothy E. Davis, et al. v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, Virginia, et al.; No. 8, Spottswood Thomas Bolling, et al. v. C. Melvin Sharpe, et al.; and No. 10, Francis B. Gebhart, et al. v. Ethel Louise Belton, et al.

[2] The full text of the Court's order is as follows (345 U. S. 972–973):

"Each of these cases is ordered restored to the docket and is assigned for reargument on Monday, October 12, next. In

Since the United States is not a party to any of these cases and is participating herein solely as an amicus curiae, it submits this brief as an objective non-adversary discussion of the questions stated in the Court's order of reargument. No attempt has been made to reexamine other questions briefed and argued at the last term.

---

their briefs and on oral argument counsel are requested to discuss particularly the following questions insofar as they are relevant to the respective cases:

"1. What evidence is there that the Congress which submitted and the State legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated or did not contemplate, understood or did not understand, that it would abolish segregation in public schools?

"2. If neither the Congress in submitting nor the States in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment understood that compliance with it would require the immediate abolition of segregation in public schools, was it nevertheless the understanding of the framers of the Amendment

"(a) that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under section 5 of the Amendment, abolish such segregation, or

"(b) that it would be within the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing such segregation of its own force?

"3. On the assumption that the answers to questions 2 (a) and (b) do not dispose of the issue, is it within the judicial power, in construing the Amendment, to abolish segregation in public schools?

"4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

"(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

"(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

I and II

THE CONTEMPORARY UNDERSTANDING OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO ITS EFFECT ON RACIAL SEGREGATION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The first two questions asked by the Court are as follows:

> 1. What evidence is there that the Congress which submitted and the State legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated or did not contemplate, understood or did not understand, that it would abolish segregation in public schools?
>
> 2. If neither the Congress in submitting nor the States in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment understood that compliance

---

from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

"5. On the assumption on which questions 4 (a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4 (b),

"(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

"(b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;

"(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

"(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

"The Attorney General of the United States is invited to take part in the oral argument and to file an additional brief if he so desires."

with it would require the immediate abolition of segregation in public schools, was it nevertheless the understanding of the framers of the Amendment

(a) that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under section 5 of the Amendment, abolish such segregation, or

(b) that it would be within the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing such segregation of its own force?

Since the historical materials examined are relevant to both questions, they are here treated together.[3]

A. INTRODUCTORY

1. The reconstruction period

Abolition of slavery by national action began while the Civil War was in progress, with Congressional abolition in the District of Columbia (12 Stat. 376) and the territories (12 Stat. 432) in 1862, and President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation in 1863. The Thirteenth Amendment, abolishing slavery everywhere within the United States, was proposed by Congress on February 1, 1865, and declared adopted on December 18, 1865.

After the termination of hostilities, new governments were established in the Southern states under Presidential authority. Negroes were not allowed, however, to participate in the elections held in these states, and in December 1865 Congress refused to seat members chosen in such elections. At the same session Congress created a Joint Committee on Reconstruction, to which all matters concerning the South were referred and which originated the various measures which formed the program of Congressional reconstruction.

[3] The Appendix, which is contained in a separate volume, consists of detailed factual summaries of the materials on the various aspects of the historical questions which are dealt with in this brief.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

During 1866 Congress, over the opposition of President Johnson, extended the functions of the Freedmen's Bureau, which had been created in 1865 to promote the welfare of the freed Negroes and to protect their civil rights. In April of the same year it enacted over a veto the Civil Rights Act (14 Stat. 27), which was designed to enforce by Federal authority the civil rights of Negroes, including their right to "full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property * * *."

Two months later, on June 16, 1866, Congress proposed the Fourteenth Amendment. By March 1867 most of the Northern states had ratified the Amendment. Three border states had rejected it, however, and of the Southern states only Tennessee had ratified it, making a total of less than the required three-fourths. The elections of 1866 had returned to Congress a clear majority in favor of the program of Congressional reconstruction. Accordingly, in March 1867 Congress enacted the Reconstruction Act (14 Stat. 428) under which the Southern states (except for Tennessee) were divided into five military districts and the existing state governments were declared to be provisional only. The Act provided that military supervision would be withdrawn, and a state's representatives readmitted to Congress, after it had (a) framed a new constitution "in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects," (b) adopted universal male suffrage, and (c) ratified the Fourteenth Amendment. By June 1868 seven states had met all of these conditions and were restored to representation. On July 21, 1868, the Amendment, having been ratified by the legislatures of thirty of the thirty-seven states to which it was submitted, was declared adopted. Subsequently, the other three Southern states ratified the Amendment, and their representatives were readmitted to Congress.

280315—53——2

The impeachment of President Johnson in 1868, arising out of his differences with Congress on reconstruction policy, was unsuccessful, but the election of Grant that year brought into office a President who was in agreement with the Congressional program. To assure the Negroes the right to vote, protected by the national government, a third constitutional amendment, the Fifteenth, was proposed by Congress in February 1869 and came into effect in March 1870. In the latter year the Enforcement Act (16 Stat. 140)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

reenacted the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and imposed civil and criminal sanctions for violation of rights secured by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.

Congress in 1875 enacted a new Civil Rights Act (18 Stat. 335)[4] declaring that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the "full and equal enjoyment" of the accommodations of inns, public conveyances, theatres, and other places of public amusement, and providing civil and criminal penalties for violations. That Act marked the end of attempts during the reconstruction period to enforce by federal legislation equality of treatment for the emancipated Negroes.

After the determination in 1877 that Hayes had been elected President, the use of Federal authority to support the reconstruction governments in the Southern states ceased.[5]

---

[4] This Act was held unconstitutional in 1883 in the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3.

[5] An historian has described the settlement of the Hayes-Tilden election dispute as follows: "Generalized, this famous bargain meant: Let the reforming Republicans direct the national government and the southern whites may rule the Negroes. Such were the terms on which the new administration took up its task. They precisely and consciously reversed the principles of reconstruction as followed under Grant, and hence they ended an era." Dunning, Reconstruction, Political and Economic, 1865–1877 (1907), p. 41; see also Woodward, Reunion and Reaction: The Compromise of 1877 and the End of Reconstruction (1951); Buck, The Road to Reunion, 1865–1900 (1937).

2. Public education in the United States in 1866

The quarter-century before the Civil War witnessed the initial efforts to establish free, tax-supported public schools throughout the United States.[6] By 1861 the principle of free public education had become accepted in almost all of the Northern states. Common schools open to all, and supported by general taxation, existed in most of the cities and towns, and in a large number of rural areas.[7]

In the South, however, different conditions prevailed. The essentially rural and sparsely settled character of the region made communication slow and community cooperation difficult. The institution of slavery and the acceptance of class and social distinctions were formidable barriers to the growth of public education. In addition, religious influences tended to encourage the view that education was a parental obligation and not one which the state should assume. Consequently, education in the South prior to the Civil War was left largely to private groups.[8]

Outside of some of the larger cities, such public schools as existed in the South were generally

[6] Cubberley, Public Education in the United States (1919), p. 119 et seq.; Knight, Public Education in the South (1922), pp. 196–198.

[7] Cubberley, supra, p. 211. A survey of the public school systems in many cities and towns during this period may be found in Barnard, Special Report of the Commissioner of Education, H. Ex. Doc. No. 315, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. (1871), pp. 77–130.

[8] Knight, supra, pp. 264–265.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

maintained for the benefit of only the children of the poor.[9] Even these were disrupted by the war. Teachers and students were called away to other tasks, and the state school funds were diverted to other purposes. At the close of the war the Southern states were faced with the task of completely rebuilding their educational systems.[10] The development of the present-day system of public education did not really begin in the South until the post-war period.[11]

Although public education was far more advanced in the North than in the South, the conditions in the former region hardly approximated those existing today. The schools were often small one-room affairs where, in rural areas at least, not much more than the three R's was taught. In many states the school term was only three months of a year. Compulsory school attendance was scarcely known. Ungraded schools were common in rural areas, and public high schools were rare. The quality of instruction was generally low, judged by modern standards.[12]

B. THE HISTORICAL ORIGINS AND BACKGROUND OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

1. The anti-slavery origins of the reconstruction amendments

The constitutional changes of the Reconstruction period, and the civil rights legislation which

[9] Ibid.

[10] Id., pp. 306, 313–317.

[11] Cubberley, supra, p. 251.

[12] Cubberley, supra, ch. VIII, Knight, supra, p. 294 et seq.

accompanied them, were the culmination of more than thirty years of controversy engendered by the anti-slavery movement. The growth of that movement and the formation of its constitutional philosophy, particularly in relation to the Fourteenth Amendment, have been the subject of several recent historical and legal studies.[13] These studies show that the conception of the principles incorporated in the Constitution by the Reconstruction Amendments, and the line of their development and growth, are to be found in the long and bitter political and ideological conflict over slavery that preceded the Civil War.

The abolitionists propounded a philosophy of equality expressed most frequently in terms derived from the Declaration of Independence, an equality which implied a duty of government to apply laws impartially to protect the "natural and fundamental" rights of all persons, white and black alike.[14] "Just as the great objection to slavery was its lack of legal protection for slaves, as well as the concomitant, invidious, and discriminatory treatment of free Negroes

[13] Nye, Fettered Freedom (1949); ten Broek, The Antislavery Origins of the Fourteenth Amendment (1951); Dumond, Antislavery Origins of the Civil War in the United States (1939); Jenkins, Pro-Slavery Thought in the Old South (1935); Graham, The Early Antislavery Backgrounds of the Fourteenth Amendment, (1950) Wis. L. Rev. 479, 610; Graham, Procedure to Substance—Extra-Judicial Rise of Due Process, 1830–1860, 40 Calif. L. Rev. 483 (1953).

[14] ten Broek, supra, pp. 7, 96; Nye, supra, p. 177 et seq.; Dumond, supra, pp. 71–73.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

and the wholesale public and private invasion of the rights of abolitionists, so the first object of the abolitionists was to gain legal protection for the basic rights of members of all three classes."[15] To gain that legal protection from the governments of the states where slavery existed was a practical impossibility; so the full impetus of the movement was directed towards securing national protection.[16]

Against the philosophy of absolute equality before the law, pro-slavery advocates posed the concept of "classified equality among equals."[17] To them, slavery was not a necessary evil but a "positive good," for by relegating a class in society naturally incapable of self-direction to a position legally subordinate to that of a class which was naturally superior and dominant, true equality was possible within each class.[18]

The agitation of the anti-slavery forces for absolute equality stimulated numerous efforts to eradicate from the laws of Northern states distinctions based on color; these were regarded as badges of servitude irreconcilable with the equality which was the natural right of all men.[19] An example was the campaign to open the Massachusetts common schools to all, without regard to color. Those schools were tax supported and free, [15] ten Broek, supra, p. 97; see Dumond, supra, p. 43.

[16] ten Broek, supra, ch. III, IV, passim.
[17] Jenkins, supra, ch. III passim; Nye, supra, pp. 185–189.
[18] Ibid.
[19] Nye, supra, pp. 81–84; ten Broek, supra, pp. 42, 54, note 17.

and governed by local boards.[20] Some boards yielded to local pressure to abolish segregation; others did not, and efforts were made after 1844 to obtain remedial legislation.[21] In 1849, after failure of these efforts, an attempt was made to secure judicial invalidation of school segregation. In that year, in Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 198, Charles Sumner argued before the Supreme Judicial Court that segregation in the Boston common schools was a violation of the state constitutional guarantee of equality, because segregation was in itself a denial of equality.[22] He lost the case, but in 1855 the Massachusetts legislature forbade school segregation.

In Van Camp v. Board of Education of Logan, 9 Ohio 406 (1859), it was held that mulatto children were not entitled to enter the white common schools. The basic philosophy of the anti-slavery movement was expressed in the dissenting opinion, which declared that "caste-legislation" was inconsistent with the theory of a free and popular government "that asserted in its bill of rights the equality of all men" (p. 415). Twelve years later, Senator Wilson, a leader in the Congressional program of reconstruction, referred to these struggles for Negro access to common schools as an integral [20] Cubberly, Public Education in the United States (1919), p. 163 et seq.

---

[21] Wilson, Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America (1872), vol. I, pp. 495–498.

[22] ten Broek, supra, p. 54, note 17.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

part of the "contest of forty years between liberty and equality on the one side and slavery and privilege on the other" for securing "perfect and absolute equality in rights and privileges" for the Negro.[23]

This application of the philosophy of absolute legal equality to invalidate distinctions based on race or color in the Northern states was, however, a side issue. The main objective was complete abolition of slavery, and to accomplish that purpose it was necessary to secure political control of the national government.[24] These efforts produced a new national political organization—the Republican Party—established in 1854, and formed specifically to promote anti-slavery objectives.[25] Control of the national government by that party after the election of 1860 was the occasion for assertion by the South of the right of sovereign states to secede from the Union to protect their domestic institutions;[26] and control of the national government by that party after the Civil War was the occasion for amendment of the Constitution to embody the principle of "perfect and absolute" equality before the law for which the anti-slavery advocates had so long agitated.

[23] Congressional Globe, 41st Cong., 3d Sess., p. 1061.

[24] ten Broek, supra, ch. VI.

[25] Wilson, supra, vol. II, p. 406 et seq.; Curtis, The Republican Party (1904), vol. I, ch. VI.

[26] Dumond, supra, pp. 123–126.

2. The status of Negroes (legal, economic, and educational) at the close of the Civil War

By 1865 slavery had been ended in fact. In that year it was constitutionally abolished. Emancipation did not, however, make the former slave a free man in all respects. Abolition of slavery did not wipe out at a stroke the "badges of servitude" which had existed for so many generations. The Negro "freedmen" were still commonly regarded as an inferior race. Legally, economically, and educationally, the free colored population was still subject to disabilities not imposed on white citizens, both in the Southern states and, to a lesser extent, in some of the Northern states.

Before the Civil War the states had varied in their treatment of free colored people. Some slave states had required freed Negroes to emigrate; where permitted to remain, they were limited in their rights to contract, hold property, sue, appear as witnesses, and to vote or serve on juries. In some Northern states immigration of free Negroes was prohibited; in many more, the right of suffrage was denied.[27]

[27] Hurd, Law of Freedom and Bondage in the United States (1862), vol. 2, pp. 1–218, contains a complete compilation and digest of these laws; and see Barnard, Special Report of the Commissioner of Education, H. Ex. Doc. No. 315, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., Appendix, Legal Status of the Colored Population etc., pp. 301–400; Wilson, Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America (1874), vol. II, p. 181 et seq.; Stephenson, Race Distinctions in American Law (1910), ch. IV. Only in the states of Maine, New Hamp-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

At the close of the war, so-called "Black Codes" designed to restrict the freedom of the newly freed colored people were enacted in the Southern states. These Codes contained provisions discriminating against Negroes with regard to such matters as employment and the right to engage in business.[28] They were regarded by the majority in Congress as "an attempt on the part of Johnson's reorganized governments to reestablish virtual slavery and thus reverse the result of the war."[29]

Despite emancipation, the Negroes remained on the lowest economic level. Cut adrift without money or property, they generally remained dependent upon their former owners for employment. The Black Codes only reinforced that dependence.

In the field of education the opportunities of the Southern Negro were far inferior to those of his brother in the North. Long before the war, most of the Southern states had enacted legislation prohibiting the education of all Negroes, free or slave, because of the widespread belief that such education was conducive to rebelliousness.[30] shire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island had Negroes received the full right of suffrage.

---

[28] Stephenson, supra, ch. IV.

[29] Randall, The Civil War and Reconstruction (1937), p. 724.

[30] Nye, Fettered Freedom (1949), pp. 70–71. See the speech of Senator Wilson (Mass.) on April 12, 1860, reviewing these laws, Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 1685.

The few Negro schools were operated clandestinely. It has been estimated that ninety-five per cent of the colored population of the South was illiterate at the time of the Civil War.[31]

After the war ended, the provisional legislatures in the Southern states began to show great interest in the establishment of systems of public school education; yet, with few exceptions, they showed no disposition to extend its benefits to Negroes.[32] This reflected the hostility of many people in the South towards the principle of Negro education. The establishment of schools for Negroes was left largely to northern charitable societies, in cooperation with the Freedmen's Bureau. However, the effectiveness of these schools was impaired by the opposition of a considerable portion of the local white population—an opposition which frequently expressed itself in violence, with Negro schools being burned and their teachers, white and colored alike, beaten and expelled from the community.[33]

In the North the situation was far different. Nowhere were there prohibitions against Negro education,[34] although in five states Negroes were [31] Bond, The Education of the Negro in the American Social Order (1934), p. 21.

[32] Id., p. 41.

[33] Id., pp. 28–32.

[34] The only border state which had had such prohibitions was Missouri. By 1865, this prohibition was not only abolished, but Negroes were admitted to public schools. Barnard, supra, pp. 359–360. All the following references to

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

excluded from public schools.[35] In some Northern states they were admitted to the same public schools as white children; in others, they were either provided with separate schools, or admitted to the white schools, depending principally upon the number of children involved;[36] in still others, they were provided only with separate schools.[37] In individual communities in many of the states the practice varied from the state-wide pattern, either by legislative permission or common practice, without legal sanction.[38]

C. THE LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT AND IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION

1. The Thirteenth Amendment

The legislative history of the Fourteenth Amendment in Congress must begin with a brief account of the Thirteenth Amendment. Both amendments had a common origin and purpose, and were con-the educational status of the Negro are taken from Appendix, Legal Status of the Colored Population, etc., pp. 301–400, of the Barnard report.

---

[35] Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois.

[36] Pennsylvania and California are examples.

[37] See p. 90, footnote 93, infra.

[38] For example, the Ohio state statutes provided only for separate schools; in the greater part of the state, however, with the exception of Cincinnati, colored children were admitted to the same schools as white children. In Illinois, where there was no provision for Negro public education, the city of Chicago, after an unsuccessful experiment with separate schools during 1864–1865, maintained under its own ordinances a fully integrated system of public schools. On the other hand, New York City and some towns in New Jersey maintained separate schools for colored children. See Barnard, supra, pp. 96, 104.

sidered in Congress as related components of an integral plan of reconstruction.

The Thirteenth Amendment originated in the 38th Congress in the form of a joint resolution introduced by Senator Henderson in January 1864. (Congressional Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 145.) The resolution proposed that the Constitution be amended to provide that "Slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, shall not exist in the United States."[39] The proposal was made only after Congressional and executive action had been taken which effectively emancipated the slaves in the Southern states.[40] In reporting the resolution, Senator Trumbull, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, noted that fact. He stated that the amendment would not only end the institution of slavery but would remove from the Constitution the inconsistency of the founding fathers, who, while proclaiming the equality of all men, nevertheless denied all rights to an entire race (Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 1313). The resolution passed the Sen-

[39] Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 1313. The Thirteenth Amendment, as adopted, provides that "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

[40] The Confiscation Act of 1861, 12 Stat. 319; the Captured and Abandoned Property Act of 1863, 12 Stat. 820; Proclamation (No. 16) of September 22, 1862, 12 Stat. 1267.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

ate, but failed of passage in the House (Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 1490, 2995); and it became one of the principal issues in the 1864 national election.[41]

The overwhelming Republican victory that year led President Lincoln in December 1864 to recommend to the lame-duck session of the 38th Congress that the House reconsider its vote (Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess., Appendix, p. 3). In January 1865 the resolution was passed by the House by slightly more than the required two-thirds vote (Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 531). It was submitted to the states for ratification in February 1865, and by December of that year a sufficient number of states had ratified. (13 Stat. 567, 774.)

The Congressional debates on the Thirteenth Amendment indicate that its purpose was to make the Negro, so far as law could do so, an indistinguishable element of the general population.[42] It was the belief of its proponents that by abolishing the institution of slavery they were establishing the constitutional principle of full equality before the law. (Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 154, 177.) To these men, freedom and equality were coextensive; the one necessarily implied the other. (Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 1482, 2957; Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 154.) Similarly, those who opposed the Amendment did not doubt that the freedom conferred upon the Negro slave included more than "mere exemption from servitude." (Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 2962.) To them, that freedom was a reversal of the "natural and divine" order under which the colored race was inferior and unequal. (Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 150.) This argument proceeded on the basis of their understanding that the Amendment would merge the Negro into the general mass of people on a basis of full legal equality. Those who favored the Amendment did not deny that such was its purpose. (Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 2957, 2960, 2989; Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 154, 202, 237.)

[41] McPherson, Political History of the United States, 1860–65 (1865), pp. 406, 419, 422.

[42] See, for example, the remarks of Rep. Orth (Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 143).

2. Implementing legislation: The Freedmen's Bureau bills and the Civil Rights Act of 1866

In the period between the adjournment of the 38th Congress in March 1865 and the convening of the 39th Congress in December of that year, the provisional governments in the Southern states, which had been set up by President Johnson under his "restoration" policy, enacted a series of laws discriminating against Negroes in various ways, the so-called Black Codes discussed supra, p. 15. The first session of the 39th Congress, over the veto of President Johnson, enacted two bills to nullify the discriminations created by the Black Codes: (1) the Civil Rights Act of 1866, 14 Stat. 27, and (2) the law which extended the life of the Freedmen's Bureau and enlarged its powers,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

14 Stat. 173. It also passed another bill dealing with the Freedmen's Bureau which failed of enactment after it had been vetoed by President Johnson. (S. 60, 39th Cong., 1st Sess.; Globe, p. 943)[43] These three bills were expressly intended to give content to the freedom conferred upon the Negro by the Thirteenth Amendment by guaranteeing to him all of the civil rights to which free men were entitled.

These measures were related to the Fourteenth Amendment by more than mere coincidence of time [44] and subject matter. As will appear infra, pp. 40–45, the latter was proposed after members of the Congress stated that the civil rights guaranteed by statute were vulnerable to future political changes or might possibly be stricken down as unconstitutional. Because the rights intended to be secured to Negroes by these measures were the same as those subsequently embodied in the Four-[43] All references to the Globe in this section are to the Congressional Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Session.

[44] The Supplementary Freedmen's Bureau bill (S. 60) was debated in Congress from January 11, 1866, through February 20, 1866; the Civil Rights bill, from January 29, 1866, through April 9, 1866; and the second Supplementary Freedmen's Bureau bill (H. R. 613), from May 22, 1866, through July 2, 1866. Meanwhile, the two precursors to the Fourteenth Amendment, the Stevens "apportionment" amendment and the Bingham "equal rights" amendment, infra, pp. 33–41, were debated from January 23, 1866, through March 9, 1866, and February 26 through 28, 1866, respectively. Debate on H. J. Res. 127, containing the Fourteenth Amendment as finally proposed, extended from May 8, 1866, to June 13, 1866.

280315—53——3

teenth Amendment, it is appropriate to include their legislative history as a relevant part of the background of the Fourteenth Amendment.

(a) Immediately following President Johnson's message of December 5, 1865, stating that existing state law furnished adequate protection for civil rights, the 39th Congress established a Joint Reconstruction Committee to serve as the principal agency for developing the program of "Congressional reconstruction." (Globe, pp. 6, 30, 47.) Senator Wilson immediately brought up for consideration a bill (S. 9)[45] to nullify the Black Codes. (Globe, p. 39.) He urged Congress to strike down these Codes without delay, so that the Negro freedman > can go where he pleases, work when and for whom he pleases; that he can sue and be sued; that he can lease and buy and sell and own property, real and personal; that he can go into the schools and educate himself and his children; that the rights and guarantees of the good old common law are his, and that he walks the earth, proud and erect in the conscious dignity of a free man * * *. (Globe, p. 111.)

The chief opposition to Wilson's bill came from those Senators who considered all civil rights proposals as an unwarranted effort "to confer on former slaves all the civil or political rights that white people have." (Globe, p. 113.) The [45] All bill numbers hereafter cited in this section refer to bills in the 39th Cong., 1st Session.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

bill was, however, withdrawn by Wilson because of the evident view of the majority that measures of such a nature required more careful formulation. Senator Trumbull undertook this task. He subsequently introduced two bills which, he stated, would effectively protect all men in those basic rights without which they would not be free. (Globe, p. 43.)

(b) One of the Trumbull bills (S. 60) proposed to extend the life of the Freedmen's Bureau and to enlarge its authority; the second (S. 61) was intended to protect all persons in the exercise of their civil rights and to furnish a means by which those rights might effectively be vindicated. (Globe, p. 129.)

The purpose of S. 60, as stated by Senator Trumbull, was to restrain by military measures any attempt to enforce the Black Codes. (Globe, pp. 319–323.) The bill passed the Senate by a wide majority. (Globe, p. 421.) The opposition centered their attack on the basic concept of equality underlying the bill, and on its military enforcement provisions. (E. g., Globe, pp. 318, 319, 342.) The debate in the House emphasized much the same issues, with the additional matter of education for the freedmen. (E. g., Globe, pp. 513, 585.)

There was little difference in the majority and minority views concerning the bill's scope. Its proponents expressed their understanding that the equality to be enforced did not mean "that all men shall be six feet high," but rather that they were to have "equal rights before the law," so that it "operates alike on both races" and without "discrimination against either in this respect that does not apply to both." (Globe, pp. 322, 343.) Nor did the opposition indicate any disagreement on that score. They objected, rather, to the general philosophy of the bill. Representative Dawson of Pennsylvania observed that the bill constituted only a part of a broad policy to enforce absolute equality for Negroes so that they > should be received on an equality in white families, should be admitted to the same tables at hotels, should be permitted to occupy the same seats in railroad cars and the same pews in churches; that they should be allowed to hold offices, to sit on juries, to vote, to be eligible to seats in the State and national Legislatures, and to be judges, or to make and expound laws for the government of white men. Their children are to attend the same schools with white children, and to sit side by side with them. (Globe, p. 541.)

Several Congressmen objected to entrusting the Freedmen's Bureau with the responsibility of educating the freedmen because it appeared that the Bureau had taken over certain white schools in the South for the use of Negro children. The charge was made that "unless they mix up white children with black, the white children can have no chance in these schools for instruction."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(Globe, App. pp. 71, 82.) There is no other evidence that any particular thought was given to the question of racial segregation in the existing schools. The bill was passed by the House, but was vetoed by President Johnson in February 1866. (Globe, pp. 688, 915.) The Senate sustained his veto. (Globe, p. 943.)

(c) After the Senate passed S. 60, it turned immediately to consideration of the second of Senator Trumbull's bills, S. 61, the so-called "Civil Rights" bill. (Globe, p. 421.) S. 61 provided (1) that there was to be no discrimination in "civil rights or immunities" among the inhabitants of the United States on account of color, race, or previous servitude, and (2) that all persons, regardless of race or color, were to have the "same" rights to make and enforce contracts, to sue and be sued, to inherit and own property, and to have the full and equal benefit of all laws for the security of person and property. (Globe, p. 474.) Violation of any of these rights "under color of law" was to carry both civil and criminal penalties. (Globe, p. 475.)

The purpose of the bill was stated to be the nullification of all state laws which, on grounds of color or race, deprived "any citizen of civil rights which are secured to other citizens." (Globe, p. 474.) The Senate proponents of the bill explained that the freedom conferred upon Negroes by the Thirteenth Amendment was of little value, unless they were given "some means of availing themselves of their benefits." (Globe, p. 474.) So long as there were state laws discriminating against the colored people, they remained in part slave. Any statute > which is not equal to all, and which deprives any citizen of civil rights which are secured to other citizens, is an unjust encroachment upon his liberty; and is, in fact, a badge of servitude which, by the Constitution, is prohibited. (Ibid.)

To the objection that the bill's purpose was "revolutionary", its supporters answered that the country was "in the midst of revolution." (Globe, p. 570.)

The opposition, recognizing that the bill was intended to accomplish "the abolition of all laws in the States which create distinctions between black men and white ones" (Globe, p. 603), objected to this attempt to "place all men upon an equality before the law." (Globe, p. 601.) They claimed that the Thirteenth Amendment did not confer the power on Congress to erase distinctions between Negroes and whites created by state law. (Globe, p. 476.) For them, the Amendment had merely abolished the "status or condition of slavery", and there was no justification for attempting to use it "to confer civil rights which are wholly distinct and unconnected" with such a status. Senator Cowan of Pennsylvania, opposing the bill, referred to the system of racially-segregated schools provided for by Pennsylvania law as an example of the kind of legal distinction which would be eradicated by the bill:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> In Pennsylvania, for the greater convenience of the people, and for the greater convenience, I may say, of both classes of the people, in certain districts the Legislature has provided schools for colored children, has discriminated as between the two classes of children. We put the African children in this school-house and the white children over in that school-house, and educate them there as we best can. Is this amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery to break up that system which Pennsylvania has adopted for the education of her white and colored children? Are the school directors who carry out that law and who make this distinction between these classes of children to be punished for a violation of this statute of the United States? To me it is monstrous. (Globe, p. 500.)

No member of the Senate rose to differ with Senator Cowan's view of this objective of the bill. The attacks on the bill failed, however, and it was passed by the Senate in February 1866. (Globe, p. 606.)

In the House the bill was reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee, of which Congressman Wilson of Iowa was chairman. (Globe, p. 1115.) The debate in the House followed the same general pattern as in the Senate.

Mr. Wilson took a more limited view of the objectives and scope of the bill than had his colleagues in the Senate. To him, the general language of the bill did not mean that "all citizens shall sit on the juries, or that their children shall attend the same schools." These, to him, were not such "civil rights or immunities" as were intended to be protected by the bill.[46] (Globe, p. 1117.)

Those in the House who opposed the bill on its merits vigorously disagreed with Wilson's view that the bill had a limited application, particularly with respect to state laws concerning racial segregation in the schools. (Globe, pp. 1120, 1121, 1270). Congressman Kerr of Indiana argued that the bill would invalidate the school laws of his state:

> Again, the constitution of Indiana has dedicated a munificent fund to the support of common schools for the education of the children of the State. But negro and mulatto children are by law excluded from [46] Mr. Wilson later pointed out that this view depended not on any general definition of "civil rights or immunities" but upon the form of the bill itself, which, under general rules of construction, would in his opinion have limited the general declaration to the specific and limited rights actually enumerated. (Globe, pp. 1291, 1294.) He thought that the bill could only be construed as relating to matters within the control of Congress, and he had doubt that Congress could constitutionally provide such general protection of civil rights. (Globe, p. 1294.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> those schools. Negroes and mulattoes are exempt by law from school tax. They are denied a civil right, on account of race and color, and are granted an immunity, (from school taxation,) but are taxed for all other purposes. Now, a negro or mulatto takes his child to the common schoolhouse and demands of the teacher that it be admitted to the school and taught as the white children are, which is refused. The teacher then becomes a wrong-doer and is liable to the same punishments, to be administered in the same way; because all the persons referred to would be acting under color of some law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom. (Globe, p. 1271.)

Congressman Rogers of New Jersey, of the minority, argued similarly with reference to the Pennsylvania schools:

> In the State of Pennsylvania there is a discrimination made between the schools for white children and the schools for black. The laws there provide that certain schools shall be set apart for black persons, and certain schools shall be set apart for white persons. Now, if this Congress has a right, by such a bill as this, to enter the sovereign domain of a State and interfere with these statutes and the local regulations of a State, then, by parity of reasoning, it has a right to enter the domain of that State, and inflict upon the people there, without their consent, the right of the negro to enjoy the elective franchise to the same ex> tent that it is accorded to the white men in that State, * * *. (Globe, p. 1121.)

To Rogers, there was no authority under the Thirteenth Amendment for Congress to interfere in such "domestic" matters; but he plainly understood that the bill under consideration would prohibit segregated schools in the states.

There were some members of the majority who, although supporting the merits of the bill, agreed with the minority that there was doubt that the Thirteenth Amendment empowered Congress to enact such legislation. (Globe, pp. 1290, 1293, 1266.) Led by Congressman Bingham of Ohio, later a principal draftsman of the Fourteenth Amendment, they clearly expressed their understanding that the general language of the bill would "strike down by congressional enactment every State constitution which makes a discrimination on account of race or color in any of the civil rights of the citizen." (Globe, p. 1291.) Congressman Delano of Ohio, a member of this group, pointed out that the bill would clearly apply to state school laws; he cited his own state as an example:

> we once had in the State of Ohio a law excluding the black population from any participation in the public schools or in the funds raised for the support of those schools. That law did not, of course, place the black population upon an equal footing with the white, and would, therefore, under > the terms of this bill be void, and those attempting to execute it would be subjected to punishment by fine or imprisonment. (Globe, App. 158.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Mr. Bingham stated that all laws making distinctions on the basis of color should be eliminated, for the law "should be just"; but he saw the proper remedy for those abuses, "not by an arbitrary assumption of power, but by amending the Constitution of the United States, expressly prohibiting the States from any such abuse of power in the future." (Globe, p. 1291.) He agreed that without such amendment the "protection in time of peace within the States of all the rights of person and citizen was of the powers reserved to the States." (Globe, p. 1293.)

The bill was recommitted against Wilson's wishes, largely because of the defection of Bingham and his followers. (Globe, p. 1296.) It was amended in committee to strike out the general language guaranteeing "civil rights or immunities." (Globe, p. 1366.) As Wilson said, that language had been taken by some as warranting a "latitudinarian construction not intended." (Ibid.) In this form the bill passed the House, and was concurred in by the Senate. (Globe, pp. 1367, 1416.)

The President vetoed the measure on March 27, 1866. (Globe, p. 1679.) The Senate, after two days' discussion, passed the bill over the veto; the House held no debate, and the veto was immediately overridden. (Globe, pp. 1809, 1861.)

In sum, the Thirteenth Amendment had been proposed as a means of attaining the equality of all men before the law, not as conferring mere exemption from servitude. To its proponents, and to most of its opponents, it would establish the principle that all men should be treated equally. The Civil Rights and the Freedmen's Bureau bills were considered necessary to enforce the equality of freedom guaranteed by that Amendment by forbidding differences in legal treatment on account of race or color. These bills were aimed at striking down state laws which were viewed as restricting the freedom of Negroes by creating or continuing legal distinctions based on race or color. The debates on these bills show that some legislators, on both the majority and minority sides, expressed the view that this principle of equality under law would, if enforced, destroy racial segregation in state schools.

D. THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT IN CONGRESS

During the same period that the Civil Rights Act and the first Freedmen's Bureau extension bill were occupying the attention of the 39th Congress, the Joint Committee on Reconstruction was engaged in the study of plans to "reconstruct" the Union on principles that would prevent a recurrence of the recent war.[47] In the course of that study the Committee originated two [47] Journal of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, Senate Doc. 711, 63rd Cong., 3rd Sess. (hereinafter "Committee Journal").

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

separate proposals for constitutional amendments which it reported to the floor of Congress. These proposals were: (1) a constitutional amendment reducing the congressional representation of any state which denied citizens suffrage on the basis of race or color (the Stevens "apportionment" amendment)[48]; and (2) a constitutional amendment empowering Congress to enact legislation to guarantee equal rights to all persons (the Bingham "equal rights" amendment).[49] Both proposals failed. However, after some modification, and with the addition of other proposals, they were included in the "plan of reconstruction" reported by the Joint Committee in April 1866. That plan included the Fourteenth Amendment. (Globe, pp. 2265, 2286.) The discussions of these preliminary proposals in the Congress illumine the scope and purpose of that Amendment and constitute an integral part of its legislative history.

(1) The Stevens "apportionment" amendment. The first proposal to be reported was the apportionment amendment. A brief report to the House was delivered by Congressman Thaddeus Stevens on January 22, 1866. (Globe, p. 351.) The amendment had a direct political purpose. It proposed to reduce the congressional representation of a state which excluded any group of citizens from the elective franchise on account of race or color.

[48] Committee Journal, p. 13; Globe, p. 351.

[49] Committee Journal, p. 17; Globe, pp. 813, 1033.

The opponents of reconstruction united to condemn this proposal (e. g., Globe, pp. 353, 381, 387). However, the usual supporters of reconstruction were divided. To many of the latter, a constitutional provision for apportionment where suffrage was denied on the basis of color might imply that the Constitution permitted legal distinctions to be made on such a basis. (Globe, pp. 405, 408.)

Congressman Bingham argued that while the measure was necessary, it was not sufficient standing alone. (Globe, p. 429.) It should be accompanied, he said, by > another general amendment to the Constitution which looks to the grant of express power to the Congress of the United States to enforce in behalf of every citizen of every State and of every Territory in the Union the rights which were guaranteed to him from the beginning * * *.

Bingham urged that the American people should adopt both of these proposals in order > to declare their purpose to stand by the foundation principle of their own institutions, the absolute equality of all citizens of the United States politically and civilly before their own laws. (Globe, p. 431.)

The split among the majority led to recommittal of the apportionment proposal. (Globe, p. 508.) However, the following day it was again reported with an amendment concerning apportionment of

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

direct taxes, and in this form it passed the House with little discussion. (Globe, p. 538.)

Senator Sumner opened the Senate debate on February 6 with an attack on the proposal. (Globe, p. 673). He said that the freedmen must be fully protected, not by indirection, but by directly "maintaining him in the equal rights of citizenship," including suffrage; and this was impossible "so long as you deny him the shield of impartial laws." (Globe, p. 675.) Sumner proposed, instead, a joint resolution to declare, by statute and not by constitutional amendment, the abolition of all distinctions based on color, including those relating to the franchise. (Globe, p. 684.) This was proposed as an exercise by Congress of the authority which he thought it had under the Thirteenth Amendment. Senator Fessenden, Chairman of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, opposed Sumner and argued the necessity of the apportionment amendment, although admitting his own preference for > a distinct proposition that all provisions in the constitution or laws of any State making any distinction in civil or political rights, or privileges, or immunities whatever, should be held unconstitutional, inoperative, and void, or words to that effect. (Globe, p. 704.)

But he thought that a direct suffrage amendment would probably be too extreme to secure ratification by the states. Senator Yates of Illinois stated that the equality of freedom guaranteed by the Thirteenth Amendment included both civil and political rights. (Globe, App., pp. 100–101.) By that Amendment, he said, the Negro "became a part of the people" and as such "entitled to the same rights and privileges with all the other citizens of the United States."

Although the proposal received a majority vote in the Senate, it lacked the necessary two-thirds. (Globe, p. 1289.)

(2) The Bingham "equal rights" amendment. The second precursor of the Fourteenth Amendment is more directly related to section 1 of that Amendment. It had its origin in two proposals of a similar nature which were placed before the Joint Committee on Reconstruction at its third meeting in January 1866.[50]

The first of these proposals, by Congressman Bingham, provided:

> The Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to secure to all persons in every State within this Union equal protection in their rights of life, liberty, and property.[51]

The second, by Congressman Stevens, chairman of the House group of the Committee, was a simpler declaration that

> All laws, State or national, shall operate impartially and equally on all persons without regard to race or color.[52]

[50] Committee Journal, p. 9.
[51] Ibid.
[52] Ibid.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Both were referred to the subcommittee on the apportionment of representatives in Congress, which included Bingham and Stevens.

The following week the subcommittee approved a new draft combining the Bingham and Stevens proposals:

> Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to secure to all citizens of the United States, in every State, the same political rights and privileges; and to all persons in every State equal protection in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property.[53]

The Committee kept it under consideration until after the apportionment amendment had passed the House. The matter was then referred to a special subcommittee, consisting of Bingham, Boutwell of Massachusetts, and Rogers of New Jersey. The subcommittee reported back a draft very similar to Bingham's original proposal:

> Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure all persons in every State full protection in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property; and to all citizens of the United States, in any State, the same immunities and also equal political rights and privileges.[54]

The Committee by a tie vote failed to approve this draft, and Bingham proposed a modification which the Committee adopted:

[53] Committee Journal, p. 12.

[54] Committee Journal, p. 14.

> The Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty and property.[55]

Bingham reported the proposed amendment to the House on February 26. (Globe, p. 813.)

The proposal was debated for three days and was then postponed. In his report, Bingham stated that the amendment "stands in the very words of the Constitution"; it had theretofore been "the want of the Republic that there was not an express grant of power in the Constitution to enable the whole people of every State * * * to enforce obedience to these requirements of the Constitution." (Globe, pp. 1033, 1034.)

Rogers of New Jersey, a member of the Joint Committee, expressed the view of the minority that the "protection, security, advancement, and improvement, physically and intellectually, of all classes" should be left to the states:

> Negroes should have the channels of education opened to them by the States, and by the States they should be protected in life, liberty, and property. * * * (Globe, App., p. 134.)

[55] Committee Journal, p. 17. It may be observed that each of the proposals, except that of Stevens, provided for exclusive Congressional enforcement.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

They should be permitted by the states to do everything white men could do, except to vote and hold office. However, according to Rogers, the amendment would take from the states the power to regulate such personal rights as education:

> In the State of Pennsylvania there are laws which make a distinction with regard to the schooling of white children and the schooling of black children. It is provided that certain schools shall be designated and set apart for white children, and certain other schools designated and set apart for black children. Under this amendment, Congress would have power to compel the State to provide for white children and black children to attend the same school, upon the principle that all the people in the several States shall have equal protection in all the rights of life, liberty, and property, and all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. (Globe, App., p. 134.)

Bingham took the floor again for his proposal, stating:

> that no man, no matter what his color, no matter beneath what sky he may have been born, no matter in what disastrous conflict or by what tyrannical hand his liberty may have been cloven down, no matter how poor, no matter how friendless, no matter how ignorant, shall be deprived of life or liberty or property without due process of law—law in its highest sense, that law which is > the perfection of human reason, and which is impartial, equal, exact justice * * *. (Globe, p. 1094.)

Congressman Hotchkiss of New York, however, said that the provision which authorized Congress to legislate guarantees of equal protection would mean that the degree of protection given could vary as the Congress changed. (Globe, p. 1095.) Equal protection should instead be made a > constitutional right that cannot be wrested from any class of citizens, or from the citizens of any State by mere legislation. But this amendment proposes to leave it to the caprice of Congress * * *. [T]he very privileges for which the gentleman is contending shall be secured to the citizens; but I want them secured by a constitutional amendment that legislation cannot override.

Following this three-day debate, further consideration of the proposal was postponed. (Globe, p. 1095.) This postponement was apparently attributable to the reluctance of the moderate Republican group to give Congress the power to determine the measure of equal protection. The objection that the proposal placed upon Congress the direct responsibility not merely of enforcement but of declaring what rights were to be protected was also voiced by members of the majority in the debates on the Civil Rights bill: what a Republican Congress could give, they feared, a Democratic Congress could take away. The guarantees of legal equality, to be permanent, therefore had to be made an explicit part of the Constitution.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The majority were determined that the Constitution should not permit any distinctions of law based on race or color, and that it should include express guarantees of equal protection which could not be repealed by any future Congress. The debates on both Stevens' "apportionment" proposal and Bingham's "equal rights" proposal echo the same determination to abolish legal differences based on color or race which had been manifested throughout the debates on the Thirteenth Amendment and its implementing legislation. In the debates on the "equal rights" proposal, the minority repeated their previous argument that to protect equally the civil rights of all persons would destroy racial segregation in state schools. The majority, as before, did not deny that charge but instead continued to discuss equal protection in general terms, without any attempt to enumerate its specific applications.

(3) H. J. Res. 127: the Fourteenth Amendment. After the failure of these two proposals, Stevens laid before the Joint Committee in April 1866 a "plan of reconstruction," the core of which was a proposed amendment to the Constitution, containing five sections. Section 1 read as follows:

> No discrimination shall be made by any State, nor by the United States, as to the civil rights of persons because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.[56]

[56] Committee Journal, pp. 28, 29.

Bingham immediately moved to amend this by adding:

> Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, nor take private property for public use without just compensation.

The committee rejected Bingham's amendment and retained the original form.[57] Subsequently, Bingham secured committee agreement to a new section in these words:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.[58]

This section, which contains the wording of the Fourteenth Amendment as eventually adopted, was substituted for the original section 1, and in that form was reported to both Houses on April 30. (Globe, pp. 2265, 2286.) In the House, as H. J. Res. 127, the proposed amendment was made a special order of business. (Globe, p. 2286.)

(a) The House debate. There were but three days of discussion in the House under a rule limiting debate, and much of that time was devoted to Reconstruction generalities and to portions of the

[57] Ibid.
[58] Committee Journal, p. 39.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

proposal other than section 1. (Globe, p. 2433.) From the opening statement by Stevens on May 8, 1866, until he closed May 10, 1866, with the declaration that the Southern states should not return except "as supplicants in sackcloth and ashes," nearly all the radical Republicans in the House echoed his disappointment that suffrage for the Negro was not directly included in the proposed amendment. (Globe, pp. 2459, 2544.) However, Stevens remarked that what was proposed "is all that can be obtained in the present state of public opinion." (Globe, p. 2459.)

The discussion of Section 1 commenced with some brief remarks by Stevens on behalf of the Joint Committee. He affirmed the justice of its provisions:

> They are all asserted, in some form or other, in our Declaration or organic law. But the Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies the defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States, so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree. Whatever law protects the white man shall afford "equal" protection to the black man. Whatever means of redress is afforded to one shall be afforded to all. Whatever law allows the white man to testify in court > shall allow the man of color to do the same. (Globe, p. 2459.)

Stevens referred to discriminatory state laws which disqualified Negroes from testifying in courts, and provided different methods of trial or different punishments for them. He did not wish, however, to "enumerate these partial and oppressive laws" at length. But, he said,

> Unless the Constitution should restrain them those States will all, I fear, keep up this discrimination, and crush to death the hated freedmen. (Globe, p. 2459.)

He anticipated that it would be contended that the "civil rights bill secures the same things." That was only "partly true." Moreover,

> a law is repealable by a majority. * * * This amendment once adopted cannot be annulled without two thirds of Congress. That they will hardly get. (Ibid.)

The arguments which Stevens made for this section of the Amendment do not indicate that, apart from the suffrage provision, he considered there was any difference in substance between the new proposal and his own earlier one (supra, p. 36) that "All laws, State or national, shall operate impartially and equally on all persons without regard to race or color."

Congressman Finck of Ohio was opposed to the amendment, but all he said about section 1 was that—> if it is necessary to adopt it, in order to confer upon Congress power over the mat> ters contained in it, then the civil rights bill * * * is clearly unconstitutional. (Globe, p. 2461.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Congressman Garfield of Ohio, later President, rose to support the proposal:

> The civil rights bill is now a part of the law of the land. But every gentleman knows it will cease to be a part of the law whenever the sad moment arises when that gentleman's party comes into power. It is precisely for that reason that we propose to lift that great and good law above the reach of political strife, beyond the reach of the plots and machinations of any party, and fix it in the serene sky, in the eternal firmament of the Constitution, where no storm of passion can shake it and no cloud can obscure it. (Globe, p. 2462.)

The first section, he said, would hold "over every American citizen, without regard to color, the protecting shield of law."

Congressman Raymond of New York, publisher of the New York Times and a conservative Republican who had voted against the Civil Rights bill, undertook to explore the "somewhat curious history" of the "principle" of the first section, "which secures an equality of rights among all the citizens of the United States":

> It was first embodied in a proposition introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Bingham,] in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, giving to Congress power to secure an absolute > equality of civil rights in every State of the Union. It was discussed somewhat in that form, but, encountering considerable opposition from both sides of the House, it was finally postponed, and is still pending. Next it came before us in the form of a bill, by which Congress proposed to exercise precisely the powers which that amendment was intended to confer and to provide for enforcing against State tribunals the prohibitions against unequal legislation. (Globe, p. 2502.)

Even though Raymond had voted twice against the civil rights bill, the principle of which was embodied in the proposed amendment, he stated that he was supporting the latter because he was "heartily in favor of the main object which that bill was intended to secure." All that he wanted was to have this accomplished by constitutional means. (Ibid.)

Congressmen Randall of Pennsylvania and Rogers of New Jersey were among the few opponents of the amendment who registered specific objections to section 1. (Globe, pp. 2530, 2538.) Although most of the others objected to reconstruction generally, or to other sections of the proposal, Randall objected because:

> The first section proposes to make an equality in every respect between the two races, notwithstanding the policy of discrimination which has heretofore been exclusively exercised by the States, which in my judgment should remain and continue. They > relate to matters appertaining to State citizenship, and there is no occasion whatever for the Federal power to be exercised between the two races at variance with the wishes of the people of the States. (Globe, p. 2530.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Rogers insisted that "the first section of this programme of disunion" was "most dangerous to liberty." (Globe, p. 2538.) It was, he said, > no more nor less than an attempt to embody in the Constitution of the United States that outrageous and miserable civil rights bill which * * * was vetoed by the President of the United States upon the ground that it was a direct attempt to consolidate the power of the States and to take away from them the elementary principles which lie at their foundation. (Globe, p. 2538.)

The speeches of Congressmen Bingham and Stevens closed the debate. To Bingham, the need for the first section was "one of the lessons that have been taught * * * by the history of the past four years of terrific conflict." (Globe, p. 2542.) It was to supply the absence in the Constitution of a > power in the people, the whole people of the United States, * * * to protect by national law the privileges and immunities of all the citizens of the Republic and the inborn rights of every person within its jurisdiction whenever the same shall be abridged or denied by the unconstitutional acts of any State.

This amendment would not take rights properly reserved to the states, for

> No State ever had the right, under the forms of law or otherwise, to deny to any freeman the equal protection of the laws or to abridge the privileges or immunities of any citizen of the Republic, although many of them have assumed and exercised the power, and that without remedy. (Globe, p. 2542.)

Section 1 would carry out the great objectives of the Constitution in protecting persons "by national law from unconstitutional State enactments." (Globe, p. 2543.)

After Stevens' speech, which candidly outlined the partisan political aims of the entire amendment, a vote was taken, and on May 10, 1866, it passed by more than the necessary two-thirds. (Globe, p. 2545.)

(b) The Senate debate. In the Senate, the amendment received more extended consideration. It was first brought up May 23, nearly two weeks after it passed the House. (Globe, p. 2763.) Senator Howard of Michigan made the report for the Joint Committee in place of the chairman, Senator Fessenden, who was ill.

Howard explained section 1 in great detail. He said:

> This abolishes all class legislation in the States and does away with the injustice of subjecting one caste of persons to a code not applicable to another. * * * It estab-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> lishes equality before the law, and it gives to the humblest, the poorest, the most despised of the race the same rights and the same protection before the law as it gives to the most powerful, the most wealthy, or the most haughty. That, sir, is republican government, as I understand it, and the only one which can claim the praise of a just Government. Without this principle of equal justice to all men and equal protection under the shield of the law, there is no republican government and none that is really worth maintaining. (Globe, p. 2766.)

The fifth section of the proposal, he stated, would enable the Congress, > in case the States shall enact laws in conflict with the principles of the amendment, to correct that legislation by a formal congressional enactment. (Globe, p. 2768.)

Senator Stewart of Nevada spoke generally on the amendment as a plan of reconstruction. (Globe, p. 2798.) He discussed the purposes of section 1 in terms of the conflict between the Congress and the President. Mere restoration of the Southern states on their pre-war footing would, he said, permit them to continue "to apply the theories of slavery to a condition of freedom":

> They were educated to believe that a negro was a slave, possessing no rights that a white man was bound to respect, and they believed it still, and they are astonished > at the inconsistencies of the world and its tendency to recognize the rights of man. (Globe, p. 2799.)

However, he did not believe the amendment sufficed in its present form, for to him Negro suffrage was the only definite answer to "slavery and inequality of human rights." (Ibid.)

Up to this point, on May 24, the debate had produced a number of proposed revisions, for the most part concerned with other sections of the amendment. (Globe, pp. 2768, 2770, 2804.) With Stewart's speech, it was plain that the majority party was not united on all the aspects of the amendment. Further consideration was postponed for five days, until Tuesday, May 29. Friday, Monday, and Tuesday morning were devoted to a caucus of the Republican members of the Senate.[39] What was discussed in the caucus, or who proposed the changes agreed to by the caucus, cannot be determined; it is clear, however, that there was great unity thereafter. In fact, opponents found it "hard work to speak" when they knew in "advance that no argument, however just and forcible, and no appeal, however patriotic, can influence a single vote." (Globe, p. 2938.)

Senator Howard, as floor leader, took up the amendment Tuesday, and offered the changes which had been agreed to in caucus. (Globe, p. 2868.)

[39] James, The Framing of the Fourteenth Amendment (1939), pp. 171–172 (an unpublished thesis in the library of the University of Illinois).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The only section 1 change was the addition of a declaration of citizenship as its first sentence:

> All persons born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside. (Globe, p. 2869.)

The purpose of this change was to settle the "great question of citizenship" and to remove "all doubt as to what persons are or are not citizens of the United States." (Globe, p. 2890.)

All of the caucus changes were adopted. (Globe, pp. 2897, 2921.) The renewal of the debates showed marked unity not only in the majority party but also in the opposition. Most of the Senators in that group undertook active opposition—Hendricks of Indiana, Davis of Kentucky, McDougall of California, Reverdy Johnson of Maryland, Democrats; and Cowan of Pennsylvania and Doolittle of Wisconsin, dissident Republicans.

The pattern of opposition was set by Hendricks. (Globe, p. 2938.) To him, the amendment was a matter of partisan politics, a mere "party programme." The whole proposal would centralize "absolute and despotic power" in the Federal government. (Globe, p. 2940.) Senator Davis likewise accused the majority of a "bold and desperate political game." (Globe, App., p. 238.) As to the first section, he said, its > real and only object * * * is to make negroes citizens, to prop the civil rights bill, > and give them a more plausible, if not a valid, claim to its provisions, and to press them forward to a full community of civil and political rights with the white race, for which its authors are struggling and mean to continue to struggle. (Globe, App., p. 240.)

None of the opposition Senators devoted any discussion to specific illustrations of "equality"; they, along with the majority, were more concerned with its general and political implications.

After the caucus, only four of the proponents of the amendment found it necessary to make major speeches, Poland of Vermont, Howe of Wisconsin, Henderson of Missouri, and Yates of Illinois. (Globe, pp. 2961, 3031, 3037, App., p. 217.) Senator Poland was first, and he argued the necessity and justice of reconstruction generally. (Globe, p. 2961.) As to section 1, he declared that its provisions were largely a restatement of those in the original Constitution. Nevertheless, > we know that State laws exist, and some of them of very recent enactment, in direct violation of these principles. Congress has already shown its desire and intention to uproot and destroy all such partial State legislation in the passage of what is called the civil rights bill. The power of Congress to do this has been doubted and denied by persons entitled to high consideration. It certainly seems desirable that no doubt should be left existing as to the > power of Congress to enforce principles lying at the very foundation of all republican government if they be denied or violated by the States * * *. (Globe, p. 2961.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Senator Howe, arguing the necessity of radical reconstruction policies, directed attention to section 1. (Globe, App., p. 217.) His is an important speech, because it went beyond generalities and dealt expressly with the amendment's application to public schools. Howe attacked Senator Hendricks' argument that state rights were invaded by the amendment, for no state had a right to have an "appetite so diseased as seeks to abridge these privileges and these immunities, which seeks to deny to all classes of its citizens the protection of equal laws." (Globe, App., p. 219.) But for Federal intervention, the Southern states would have continued to deny "to a large portion of their respective populations the plainest and most necessary rights of citizenship." As a result of such intervention, he acknowledged that most of those states had granted some basic rights, such as contract, ownership, suit, and the like; but > these are not the only rights that can be denied; these are not the only particulars in which unequal laws can be imposed. (Globe, App., p. 219.)

The single instance of continuing inequality which Senator Howe cited to illustrate the need for section 1 was "a statute enacted by the Legislature of Florida for the education of her colored people." He analyzed for the Senate the details of the inequality of that statute: First, there was unequal taxation, for

> They make provision for the education of their white children also, and everybody who has any property there is taxed for the education of the white children. Black and white are taxed alike for that purpose; but for the education of colored children a fund is raised only from colored men. (Globe, App., p. 219.)

Moreover under the statute there was an insufficient sum provided for Negro education, only about twelve thousand dollars, of which all but $2,200 was to pay the superintendent of colored schools and the assistant superintendents. Finally, the Negro schools in Florida, he said, could not be satisfactory, since their administration would be subject to the uncontrolled discretion of the superintendents:

> Into that school, however, it is worthy of remark that no child can go without permission of the superintendent or his assistant, * * * and the teacher who has paid five dollars for the permission to teach cannot hold that permission a day longer than the superintendent or assistant superintendent see fit to allow * * *. (Globe, App., p. 219.)

Since legislation of this degree of inequality, touching "one of the great interests not only of

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

this colored population but of the State itself," had been already enacted, Senator Howe asked if there could possibly be hesitation in amending the Constitution to place a "positive inhibition upon exercising this power of local government to sanction such a crime * * *." His speech thus clearly reflects an understanding that school legislation which discriminated against Negroes would be invalidated by the amendment.

Following Howe, Senator Henderson, draftsman of the Thirteenth Amendment, defended the new proposal. (Globe, p. 3031.) He said that the South, after the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment, > saw its opportunity and promptly collected together all the elements of prejudice and hatred against the negro for purposes of future party power. They denied him the right to hold real or personal property, excluded him from their courts as a witness, denied him the means of education, and forced upon him unequal burdens. Though nominally free, so far as discriminating legislation could make him so he was yet a slave. (Globe, p. 3034.)

He referred explicitly to the anti-slavery origins of the new amendment; to him, the Southern position that the Negro was "inferior to the white man" had caused the war because it came into irreconcilable conflict with the "opposite idea of man's equality * * *, carrying with it equal rights and equal privileges." After the war, it had become necessary "to consider whether the cause of disease should be removed entirely or be left in the system to fester again." The amendment, he said, was the only way to remove the cause of disease.

Senator Yates likewise expressed the belief that as a result of the Thirteenth Amendment the freed Negro had in law become "one of the people, one of the body-politic, and entitled to be protected in all his rights and privileges as one of the citizens of the United States." (Globe, p. 3037.)

Following some unsuccessful attempts by the opposition to have the sections of the amendment submitted as separate propositions, and to strike out the privileges and immunities clause because it was too vague, the final vote was taken on June 8. (Globe, p. 3042.) The amendment was adopted by a vote of 33–11, more than the necessary two-thirds. (Ibid.)

In the House, the amendment was called up by Stevens on June 13, with the statement that the Senate amendments were so slight that there was no purpose in having lengthy discussion. (Globe, p. 3144.) There was a brief debate of a general nature not directed at any specific provisions of the amendment. (Globe, pp. 3144–3148.) That same day, the amendment, in the form in which it had passed the Senate, was approved by the House by a vote of 120 to 32.[60]

[60] (Globe, p. 3149.) The Fourteenth Amendment, as thus submitted, reads as follows:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

E. RATIFICATION OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT BY THE STATES

In contrast to the abundance of materials relating to the legislative history of the Fourteenth Amendment in Congress, the available records concerning its ratification by the state legislatures

"SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"SECTION 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SECTION 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

are scanty and incomplete.[61] State legislative debates for the period were not reported, except in Pennsylvania and, in digest form, in Indiana. Official records of state action are limited to the messages of the Governors transmitting the proposed Amendment to the legislatures, often as merely a minor item in the annual message, occasional committee reports, and items entered in the legislative journals.

The Fourteenth Amendment was proposed by Congress on June 16, 1866. It was declared adopted on July 28, 1868, after thirty states had ratified it. During the years 1866 and 1867 it was ratified by twenty-two states, including only Tennessee of the eleven former Confederate states.[62]

"SECTION 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

"SECTION 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

[61] Our research in the state materials has necessarily been limited to those available in the Library of Congress, including its Microfilm Collection of Early State Records prepared under the supervision of Professor W. S. Jenkins, of the University of North Carolina. Detailed accounts of the ratification proceedings in all of the states appear in the Appendix to this brief.

[62] In three of these states—Ohio, New Jersey and Oregon—resolutions were passed by the state legislature in 1868 to withdraw the prior consent to the Amendment. In each in-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It was rejected by three border states and the other Southern states. In 1868, as a condition of restoration under the Reconstruction Act, seven Southern states ratified the Amendment, along with Iowa, and it came into effect. Subsequently, in compliance with the Reconstruction Act, the other three Southern states ratified.

Ratification by the Northern states in 1866 and 1867 was on the basis of party lines, with the Republican legislatures approving the Republican plan of reconstruction for the South. Rejection by the Southern and the border states was based on opposition to that plan of reconstruction. In both cases the emphasis was upon the political clauses.[63]

The Fourteenth Amendment as "a plan for reconstruction for the South" was a highly controversial party issue in the elections of 1866. Interest centered on its political clauses: the redistribution of representation under section 2 and the related question of Negro suffrage; the disqualification of Southern leaders under section 3; and the war debt provisions of section 4. References to the first section during the election campaigns were, as a rule, brief and general in nature, such as, for instance, that this section made the Civil Rights Act of 1866 a part of the Constitution, that stance the attempted "rescission" came after a change in the party control of the legislature. See Flack, The Adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment (1909), pp. 165–168, 170.

[63]A more detailed review is in Flack, supra, chs. III, IV.

it meant Negro equality, or that it centralized power in Congress.[64]

With emphasis during the campaign of 1866 on the political clauses and with little need after the election to do more than carry out the decision of the voters, there was little occasion to analyze the Amendment in detail, and still less occasion to discuss the specific applications of the first section. The Governors' messages to the state legislatures were in general terms, as were the committee reports recommending ratification.[65]

---

[64] See Flack, supra, pp. 140–160.

[65] Governor Morton of Indiana, for example, said little more than that

"No public measure was ever more fully discussed before the people, better understood by them, or received a more distinct and intelligent approval. I will enter into no arguments in its behalf before this General Assembly. Every member understands it. * * *" (Indiana Senate Journal 1867, p. 42.)

Governor Crawford of Kansas submitted the Amendment with this comment:

"Whilst the foregoing proposed amendment is not fully what I might desire, nor yet, what I believe the times and exigencies demand, yet, in the last canvass, from Maine to California, it was virtually the platform which was submitted to the people; the verdict was unmistakable. The people have spoken on the subject, at the ballot-box, in language which cannot be misunderstood." (Kansas Senate Journal 1867, p. 45.)

Governor Fenton of New York, in recommending adoption of "a proposition so moderate and so just" stated that "I need not discuss the features of this amendment; they have undergone the ordeal of public consideration since the adjournment of Congress in July last, and they are understood, appreciated and approved. * * *

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

There were sufficient references to the first section to show an understanding that it guaranteed to the Negroes full rights as citizens, but the exact content of those rights was not spelled out. It was to provide "civil equality before the law,"[66] "equal protection of all citizens in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property,"[67] "all the political and civil rights citizenship confers,"[68] and "to destroy all legal caste within our borders."[69]

The first section was intended > to destroy every distinction founded upon a difference in the caste, nationality, race or color * * * which has found its way into the laws of the Federal and State Governments which regulate the civil relations or rights of the people. * * * In all matters of civil legislation and administration there shall be perfect legal equality in the advantages and securities guaranteed by each State to everyone here declared a citizen.[70]

In the debates in Pennsylvania, where school segregation existed, Senator Landon expressed this idea more forcefully:

"There is no other plan before the people, and the verdict of the ballot-box implies that no other plan is desired. * * " (New York Assembly Journal 1867, vol. 1, pp. 13–14.)

[66] Governor Bullock, Massachusetts Acts and Resolves 1867, p. 820.

[67] Governor Brownlow, Tennessee Senate Journal, Called Session, 1866, p. 4.

[68] Governor Oglesby, Illinois Senate Journal, 1867, p. 40.

[69] Taylor in the Pennsylvania debates. Pennsylvania Legislative Record, 1867, App., p. XXII.

[70] Jenks, opposing ratification, in the Pennsylvania debates, id. p. XLI.

> * * * You ask me: what do you want for the colored man? I reply, do you let the white rebel go to school? I claim that the colored man shall go to school; do you protect the white man before the law, you shall protect the colored man before the same law; do you punish a crime in a colored man, you shall punish the same in a white man in the same way; and a virtue that will reward a white man shall be rewarded in the colored man. Do you let the white rebels of Carolina or Florida vote, then in the name of Heaven command that the colored man in the same State shall vote."[71]

Opposition to the amendment, in so far as it referred to the first section, was based on its transfer of power to the Federal Government."[72]

In the South, where the Amendment was at first rejected, emphasis was given to the political clauses, particularly those dealing with representation and with disqualification of the former [71] Id., p. IX.

[72] Thus, the minority report of the Wisconsin Senate Committee on Federal Relations commented that

"The first section, in connection with the fifth, will give to the federal government the supervision of all the social and domestic relations of the citizens in the state and to subordinate state governments to federal power." (Wisconsin Senate Journal 1867, p. 98.)

The minority report in New Hampshire characterized the Amendment as "* * * a dangerous infringement upon the rights and independence of all the States, North as well as South, assuming, as it does, to control their legislation in matters purely local in their character." (New Hampshire House Journal 1866, pp. 176–177.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

leaders of the South.[73] The validity of the procedure by which the Amendment was submitted was also attacked, the argument being that a Congress from which representatives of the Southern states were excluded could not properly propose an amendment.[74]

The first section was attacked, not so much on the ground that it extended rights to the Negroes, but that it, together with the fifth section, enlarged the powers of the Federal Government to such an extent as to destroy the rights of the states.[75]

[73] See Flack, supra, p. 159.

[74] See, for example, the report of the Georgia Joint Committee on the State of the Republic, Georgia Senate Journal, 1866, pp. 65–71.

[75] For example, Governor Patton of Alabama, in recommending rejection of the Amendment, stated as an objection to the first section that:

"It would enlarge the judicial powers of the General Government to such gigantic dimensions as would not only overshadow and weaken the authority and influence of the State courts, but might possibly reduce them to a complete nullity. It would give to the United States courts complete and unlimited jurisdiction over every conceivable case, however important, or however trivial, which could arise under the State laws. Every individual dissatisfied with the decision of a State court, might apply to a Federal tribunal for redress." (Alabama Senate Journal 1866, p. 33.)

Governor Walker of Florida, referring to the first and fifth sections, stated that:

"These two Sections taken together, give Congress the power to legislate in all cases touching the citizenship, life, liberty or property of every individual in the Union, of whatever race or color, and leave no further use for the State governments. It is in fact a measure of consolidation entirely

The later messages of the Southern Governors recommending ratification of the Amendment because such ratification was a condition precedent to readmission into Congress contained no analysis of the Amendment. The ratification of the Amendment by the Southern states was perfunctory, without any discussion of its meaning or effect.[76]

In our review of the records of the ratification proceedings, the specific references to the possible effect of the Amendment on education consist of three brief statements: that of Senator Landon of Pensylvania, quoted supra, p. 62; a statement by Representative Ross in the Indiana debates that under the Amendment "The blacks would sit with us in the jury-box, and with our children in the common schools";[77] and a report changing the form of government." (Florida Senate Journal 1866, p. 8.)

[76] A typical example was Governor Murphy's message to the Arkansas legislature in which he remarked that:

"As the reconstruction laws require the ratification of this 14th Article before the State will be received and recognized as a State in the Union, it will be unnecessary for me to say more to the present Legislature, composed of loyal citizens of the State, than merely call their attention to the importance of early attention to the ratification of the same." (Arkansas House Journal 1868, p. 19.)

The record of House action is equally typical.

"On motion of Mr. SIMS, the rules were suspended by a two-thirds vote, and the joint resolution was placed on its second reading; after which it was engrossed, and read a third time and put upon its final passage by calling of ayes and nays." (Id., p. 22.)

[77] Brevier Legislative Reports, 1867, p. 80.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

from a Kentucky contributor to a newspaper that the Democrats in Kentucky say "That amendment admits * * * their children to the public schools. * * *"[78]

The paucity of the available materials on the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment by the states is such as to preclude any definite conclusion as to the existence of any general understanding of the effect which the Amendment would have on racial segregation in public schools. Apart from the few scattered references given above, we have found no manifestations of an awareness in the state legislatures that the Amendment would affect public education, as this Court later held in Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, and related cases (see pp. 143–149, infra), by imposing on a state the duty of furnishing such education to all its citizens, if furnished to some, on a basis of equality of right. The available materials do show that there were widespread expressions of a general understanding of the broad scope of the Amendment similar to that abundantly demonstrated in the Congressional debates (pp. 20–56, supra), namely, that the first section of the Amendment would establish the full constitutional right of all persons to equality before the law and would prohibit legal distinctions based on race or color.

[78] McPherson's Scrap Book, Fourteenth Amendment, p. 84 (name of paper not given).

F. CONTEMPORANEOUS ACTIONS, FEDERAL AND STATE, BEARING ON SCHOOL SEGREGATION

The Reconstruction period, during which the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, also witnessed other actions, both in Congress and the states, which are relevant to an inquiry into the contemporaneous understanding of the Amendment's effect on school segregation. The 39th Congress in 1866 also passed laws concerning (a) the schools maintained by the Freedmen's Bureau, and (b) the public schools in the District of Columbia. In the proceedings in Congress in 1868 and 1870 on the readmission of the Southern states there were some references to the matter of public school education for Negroes. In later Congresses, repeated efforts were made, particularly under the leadership of Senator Sumner, to provide specific enforcement of the rights secured by the Fourteenth Amendment. These efforts culminated in the Civil Rights Act of 1875. At one stage in its legislative history that Act contained a provision forbidding racial segregation in public schools. In the states, various actions were taken to provide public education for Negroes. In some states, particularly in the North, existing laws for segregated schools were continued; in other states, particularly in the South, school segregation laws were enacted shortly after the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted; in still other states, provisions for mixed schools were enacted. In this section of the brief

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

we shall summarize these actions, both federal and state, and attempt to evaluate them as evidence of a contemporary understanding as to the Fourteenth Amendment's effect on racial segregation in public schools.

1. Federal legislation in the 39th Congress

(a) The Freedmen's Bureau Extension Act. In May 1866 there was again raised in the House the question of extending the life of the Freedmen's Bureau and providing it with the authority to safeguard the welfare and civil rights of the freedmen. (Congressional Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 2743.) Representative Eliot reported from his Select Committee on Freedmen a bill (H. R. 613) similar to the one vetoed by President Johnson in February 1866 (supra, pp. 23–25), and it passed the House without any particularly significant discussion. (Globe, p. 2878). In the Senate, it was referred to the Military Affairs Committee, of which Senator Wilson was chairman, and was favorably reported with substantial amendments. (Globe, p. 3409). It passed the Senate in June, but was vetoed by the President. (Globe, pp. 3413, 3838.) With no discussion, the veto was overridden in both House and Senate, and the bill became law July 16, 1866. (Globe, pp. 3842, 3850; 14 Stat. 173.)

The House version of the bill had made provision for the maintenance of schools for the freedmen, with equipment and teachers to be supplied by private societies.[79] The Senate kept that provision, and added a provision for financing the schools from the property of the Confederate States. (Globe, pp. 3409, 3410.) After the termination of the Freedmen's Bureau, the remaining proceeds of such property were to be distributed proportionately to those southern states "which have made provision for the education of their citizens without distinction of color." There was also resolved a long-standing dispute as to the disposition of certain islands off Georgia and South Carolina, which General Sherman had devoted to the freedmen's use. (Globe, p. 2809.) One provision in resolution of that dispute distributed the proceeds of a certain portion of those lands to "the support of schools, without distinction of color or race, on the islands in the parishes of St. Helena and St. Luke." (Globe, p. 3409.)

These two provisions are the only instances in which the 39th Congress legislated directly to establish schools that were financed in whole or in part from Federal funds, and it is noteworthy that in these provisions it expressed a policy

[79] The educational societies concerned were the successors of the former abolitionist groups and adhered to their concepts of equality in civil rights. Thus, the American Freedmen's Union Aid Commission, a central organization of these societies, had in its constitution a provision that "no schools or supply depots shall be maintained from the benefits of which any person shall be excluded because of color." American Freedman (1866), p. 18.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

favoring schools making no distinctions on grounds of race or color.

(b) School Legislation for the District of Columbia. A month after the 39th Congress submitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the states, it provided that an earlier school act for the District of Columbia (the Act of June 25, 1864, 13 Stat. 187) should be construed to require the authorities of Washington and Georgetown to pay over certain moneys for the support of the separate colored schools in those cities (Act of July 23, 1866, 14 Stat. 216). A week later, on the final day of the session, Congress passed a bill authorizing a grant of three lots in Washington for colored schools (Act of July 28, 1866, 14 Stat. 343).

Separate schools for colored children had been established for Washington County by the Act of May 20, 1862, 12 Stat. 394, and for the cities of Washington and Georgetown by the Act of May 21, 1862, 12 Stat. 407. When Congress in the Act of June 25, 1864, supra, provided a reallocation of taxes for the support of the various District school systems, it left unchanged the existing provisions for separate colored schools. It is to be noted that none of the foregoing measures received much attention in Congress. There were no written committee reports. All were considered perfunctorily as part of routine District business, and were passed with scarcely any debate or division in vote. (Globe, 37th Cong., 2d Sess. pp.

280315—53——6

1544, 2037, 2157; Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 2814, 3126.)[80]

It is contended that the 1866 school legislation for the District of Columbia evidences an understanding by the 39th Congress, which proposed the Fourteenth Amendment, that the Amendment did not prohibit racially-segregated schools. We believe that no persuasive inference can be drawn of any connection between these acts and the Amendment. In the first place, separate schools in the District for colored children had been established by Congress four years before the Fourteenth Amendment was proposed. The 1866 Acts were only implementations of the existing legislation. The legislative history of those measures contains no indications that they were regarded as having any relation to the Fourteenth Amendment. The latter was the product of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction; the District schools bills were reported by the Senate and House District Committees, none of whose members was on the Joint Committee. (Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 11, 21, 57, 106.) The Amendment was passed by Congress only after prolonged and searching debate, while the school measures were considered perfunctorily, amid a welter of routine District business. There were no committee [80] Cf. Metropolitan Rd. v. District of Columbia, 132 U. S. 1, 5, on the limited extent of interest and interference by Congress in the internal affairs of the District prior to the Organic Act of 1871, 16 Stat. 419.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

reports, no debate or noteworthy comment. There was no roll call vote in either House or Senate on these bills. (Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 2719, 3906, 4278.)

The Act of July 23, 1866, dealt with a question raised in a local controversy regarding the allocation of school funds. It merely provided that there would be made available for the Negro schools, newly-created under the legislation of 1862, the funds which the Congress had previously committed for their support, but which had been locally withheld. Similarly, in the Act of July 28, 1866, the question was merely one of easing the financial burden of supporting the Negro schools by the donation of building sites. In the debates on these bills, characterized by their sponsor, Senator Morrill of Maine,[81] as "very small measures * * * which will take no great time anyway" (Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 2716), there is no evidence that any member of Congress thought that its action on these measures would constitute a legislative interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment, or indeed that the Amendment was in any way relevant. Congress was exercising its exclusive jurisdiction over the District, to which the Fourteenth Amendment in terms did not apply. Moreover, the conditions prevailing in the District during this period were such as to make the question of mixed or separate schools relatively unimportant. Throughout the entire period the overriding problem was to make a beginning in providing some schools for Negroes. Prior to the war, the problem of Negro education had been completely disregarded by the Congress; and at each step taken after 1860, attention was focussed on the need of creating educational facilities for a race that theretofore had received no public educational benefits. Details of school organization were subordinated to that need, and were not considered and discussed in Congress.

[81] Senator Morrill, in the debates during this same session on the Civil Rights Act, expressed the conviction that the Constitution forbade distinctions based on race or color. (Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 570–571.)

2. Legislation in Congress after 1866

(a) Readmission of the Southern States. Under the Reconstruction Act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 428) the Southern states, as a condition of representation in Congress, were required to form "a constitution of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects" which was to be submitted to Congress "for examination and approval." In 1868, the new constitutions were submitted to Congress by Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, and South Carolina, and those states were readmitted (15 Stat. 72, 73). None of these state constitutions provided for separate schools for colored children; in at least three of them (Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida) a provision for mixed schools was expressed or implied. (See infra, pp. 97–98.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the House debates, opponents of the reconstruction program unsuccessfully objected to provisions in the constitutions of Alabama (Congressional Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 1937, 2197), Arkansas (Globe, p. 2395), Louisiana (Globe, p. 2449), and South Carolina (Globe, p. 2447), which they thought required mixed schools.

In the Senate debates on the readmission of Arkansas, Senator Drake of Missouri proposed the following condition:

> That there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed. (Globe, p. 2748.)

Senator Henderson of Missouri offered as a substitute:

> * * * the further condition that no person on account of race or color shall be excluded from the benefits of education, or be deprived of an equal share of the moneys or other funds created or used by public authority to promote education in said State.

In the ensuing colloquy it appeared that Senator Henderson feared that the term "or of any other right" in Senator Drake's proposal might be construed as requiring mixed schools. Accordingly, his substitute was intended explicitly to permit separate schools. (Globe, p. 2748.)

In answer to a question from Senator Henderson, Senator Frelinghuysen of New Jersey (not a member of Congress when the Fourteenth Amendment was proposed) stated his view that neither the Drake proposal nor the Amendment "touches that question, as to what school they shall be educated in * * *." (Globe, p. 2748.) Senator Henderson explained that:

> I desire that the negroes shall have an equal right in the school moneys, but that the State may require them to be educated in different schools from the whites. * * * But I would not provide here by a condition that the States should extend the same rights to the negroes in regard to office-holding, marrying, or anything else, that they do to the whites * * *

His amendment was defeated, however, by a vote of 30 to 5 (ibid). The Drake amendment was agreed to,[82] but subsequently the Senate accepted the House version of the bill not containing that amendment.

In 1870 Virginia (16 Stat. 62), Mississippi (16 Stat. 67) and Texas (16 Stat. 80) were read-

[82] The omnibus bill for the admission of other Southern states, reported from the Judiciary Committee the next day (Globe, p. 2759), contained the Drake amendment with the words "or any other right" omitted. Senator Trumbull explained that their insertion "might be construed by some persons as applying possibly to social rights, or rights in schools, which the Senator from Missouri did not intend; and as the committee thought there was no importance in the words they are left out of the amendment." (Globe, p. 2858.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

mitted. Each act of admission contained a condition:

> That the constitution * * * shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the school rights and privileges secured by the constitution of said State.

The bill for the admission of Virginia as reported by the Committee on Reconstruction (H. R. 783, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., Globe, p. 362) contained an express prohibition on amending the state constitution:

> * * * to prevent any person on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude from * * * participating equally in the school fund or school privileges provided for in said constitution * * *

Its inclusion was explained as required by the bitter hostility to the common-school system expressed by the newly elected Governor of Virginia. (Globe, pp. 402, 442, 546.) It was justified as essential to a republican form of government. (Globe, pp. 485, 500.) Similarly, the provision concerning school rights in the bill for the admission of Mississippi was justified as a means of preserving a republican form of government. (Globe, pp. 1253, 1255.) The view was also expressed that under the Fourteenth Amendment the colored man was entitled to "the same rights and privileges of schools that the white man has * * *." (Globe, p. 1329.) The debates are concerned, however, with the guarantee of education to the Negroes rather than with the question of separate schools.

Georgia was "reconstructed" a second time (16 Stat. 59, December 22, 1869) and readmitted in July 1870 (16 Stat. 363). The bill for admission of Georgia (H. R. 1335, 41st Cong., 2d Sess.; Globe, p. 1702) contained a condition on school rights similar to that in the Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas acts, but the final act contained no conditions. The debates indicate the same view that opportunity of education for the Negroes was an element of a republican form of government (Globe, p. 1704).

In sum, therefore, the debates on the readmission of the Southern states into the Union fail to disclose any definite understanding as to the effect of the Fourteenth Amendment on school segregation, but it is of some significance that none of the state constitutions submitted to and approved by Congress as being "in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects" provided for segregated schools (see nfra, pp. 97–98).

(b) Legislative Attempts to Abolish School Segregation in the District of Columbia. In 1871 the issue of public schools of the District of Columbia came squarely before the 41st Congress. On January 23, 1871, a bill was introduced in the Senate, S. 1244, to regulate the organization and conduct of the public schools in the District of Columbia. (Globe, 41st Cong., 3d Sess., p. 663.) The bill was reported by the District Committee with an amendment which would abolish racial segregation in the District schools. (Globe, p. 1054.[83]) The amendment was vigorously supported on the floor of the Senate by Senator Sumner, a member of the District Committee, and several other Senators on the ground that it was required by the principle of equality underlying the Fourteenth Amendment. (Globe, pp. 1055, 1056, 1058.) Sumner stated that "Every child, white or black, has a right to be placed under precisely the same influences, with the same teachers, in the same school room, without any discrimination founded on his color". (Globe, p. 1055.) Senator Carpenter of Wisconsin agreed:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> Mr. President, we have said by our Constitution, we have said by our statutes, we have said by our party platforms, we have said through the political press, we have said from every stump in the land, that from this time henceforth forever, where the American flag floats, there shall be no distinction of race or color or on account of previous condition of servitude, but that all men, without regard to these distinctions, shall be equal, undistinguished before the law. Now, Mr. President, that principle covers this whole case. (Globe, p. 1056.)

None of the opponents of the bill explicitly controverted the view that the Amendment's broad [83] This and succeeding references to the Congressional Globe are, until otherwise noted, to the 41st Cong., 3d Sess.

principle applied to racial segregation in the schools. (See Globe, pp. 1054, 1056, 1057, 1059, 1060.) The bill, however, was dropped without any vote, in favor of more pressing business, and was not taken up again. (Globe, p. 1061.)

Another bill was introduced by Senator Sumner in the next Congress on December 12, 1871. (S. 365, Globe, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., p. 68.) This bill, "to secure equal rights in the public schools of Washington and Georgetown," would also have abolished racial segregation in those schools. Like its predecessor, it was put aside, after a brief debate containing nothing of significance here, without any vote, in favor of other business. (Globe, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 2539, 2542, 3057, 3058, 3099–3100, 3122–3125.)

(c) Civil Rights Act of 1875. The issue of racial segregation in public schools came before the Congress for extended but indecisive consideration between 1870 and 1875 in connection with the efforts of Senator Sumner and others for further civil rights legislation.

Sumner, advocate of the 1871 proposals to abolish racial segregation in the District public schools, had in 1870 introduced a bill to secure the right of all citizens throughout the United States to "full and equal enjoyment" in respect of theaters, conveyances, inns, and public schools. (S. 916, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., Globe, p. 3434.) In substantially its original form, it was reintroduced in each subsequent Congress until 1873, but without success. In 1872, it was twice attached to amnesty bills in the Senate. (H. R. 380, H. R. 1050, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., Globe, pp. 919, 3268.) Both of these amnesty bills (with the civil rights rider) failed because they did not receive in the Senate the two-thirds vote required under section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment, although they did receive majority approval. Similarly, efforts during the same session to suspend the House rules to bring up the House counterpart of Sumner's bill failed of the two-thirds vote necessary, despite clear majorities. (Globe, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 1956, 3383, 3932, 4321–4322.) The debates in Congress on these bills proceeded on the understanding that they would require non-segregated schools throughout the country, and this was one of the most controversial points in issue. (Globe, 42d Cong., 1st Sess., App., p. 216; Globe, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 241–243, 384; 2 Cong. Rec. 4088.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In 1873, in the first session of the 43d Congress, Sumner again introduced a bill prohibiting segregation generally, including segregation in the schools. Civil and criminal penalties were provided for violation. (S. 1; 2 Cong. Rec. 10.) In March 1874, a month after Sumner's death, the bill was reported favorably by the Senate Judiciary Committee. (2 Cong. Rec. 3053.) An attempt on the floor to amend the bill by adding a provision permitting "separate but equal" schools failed (2 Cong. Rec. 4167), and in May the bill passed the Senate (2 Cong. Rec. 4176). However, several efforts to bring the bill up for consideration in the House failed because of dilatory tactics on the part of the minority. (2 Cong. Rec. 4242, 4439, 4691, 5162.)

In 1874, in the second session of the 43d Congress, the House Judiciary Committee reported a civil rights bill similar to Sumner's, but containing a provision expressly permitting "separate but equal" schools. (H. R. 796; 3 Cong. Rec. 116.) Consideration on the floor was again impeded by the tactics of the minority, which forced one continuous three-day session. (3 Cong. Rec. 786–829.) A compromise was finally reached (see infra, pp. 82–84), and the bill passed the House on February 4, 1875, after deletion not only of the provision for segregated schools, but also of any reference whatever to schools. (3 Cong. Rec. 1010, 1011.) Senate approval of the bill, in the compromise form, followed shortly thereafter. (3 Cong. Rec. 1870.) The bill, which has come to be known as the Civil Rights Act of 1875, became law on March 1, 1875, 18 Stat. 335.[84]

The members of Congress who throughout this period persisted in their advocacy of unsegregated schools included many who had been prominent [84] This Act was declared unconstitutional in 1883 in the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, the Court holding that the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibitions extended only to state and not to individual actions.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

in the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1866.[85] Sumner was their leader until his death. His view, frequently expressed, was that the Reconstruction Amendments had established the sweeping principle that > all persons without distinction of color shall be equal before the law. Show me, therefore, a legal institution, anything created or regulated by law, and I show you what must be opened equally to all without distinction of color. Notoriously, the hotel is a legal institution, originally established by the common law, subject to minute provisions and regulations; notoriously, public conveyances are in the nature of common carriers subject to a law of their own; notoriously, schools are public institutions created and maintained by law; and now I simply insist that in the enjoyment of those institutions there shall be no exclusion on account of color. (Cong. Globe, 42d Cong., 2d ~~8d~~ Sess., p. 242; see also, supra, p. 77.)

To Sumner, public schools[86] established by law could not be maintained on a segregated basis:

---

[85] For example, in 1874 when the Senate passed Sumner's bill (S. 1) prohibiting racial segregation in the public schools, by a vote of 29 to 16, the majority included nine former members of the 39th Congress—Allison, Boutwell, Conkling, Edmunds, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Stewart, Washburn and Windom. No Senator who had participated in the framing of the Fourteenth Amendment voted with the minority. 2 Cong. Rec. 4176.

[86] Sumner agreed to provisions permitting segregation in private schools, as proposed by Frelinghuysen. (Globe, 42nd Cong., 2d Sess., 435, 487, 3267.)

> The separate school wants the first requisite of the common school, inasmuch as it is not equally open to all; and since this is inconsistent with the declared rule of republican institutions, such a school is not republican in character. Therefore it is not a preparation for the duties of life. The child is not trained in the way he should go; for he is trained under the ban of inequality. How can he grow up to the stature of equal citizenship? He is pinched and dwarfed while the stigma of color is stamped upon him. (Globe, p. 384.)

Senators Conkling, Boutwell and Justin Morrill, all members of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction in 1866, apparently shared Sumner's views. (See, e. g., 2 Cong. Rec. 4151, the vote rejecting the "separate but equal" amendment.) Others of the majority likewise rejected the contention that separate school facilities were permissible under the Fourteenth Amendment. To Morton of Indiana, the Senate majority leader, segregation was a violation of the principle of equality embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment, which had taken "from the States the power to make class legislation." (Cong. Globe, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., p. 847.) Senator Pease of Mississippi agreed that there could be no real equality in "equal advantages in separate schools." (2 Cong. Rec. 4154.) See also footnote 40, infra, p. 103.

The opposition in the Senate was led by Senator Thurman of Ohio, of the minority party, who argued that equal protection of the laws, with regard to public schools, required only that school funds should be applied so that "each citizen shall have an equal advantage from its application." (Globe, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., App. p, 26; see 2 Cong. Rec. 4083–4089.) Other members of the minority expressed the view that the requirement of equality was satisfied if the separate facilities were equivalent. (See, e. g., Globe, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., p. 241.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

As discussed supra, p. 79, the Sumner bill was not reached in the House, which took up instead a similar bill that contained a provision permitting schools to be "separate but equal". (H. R. 796, supra.) The school issue proved a stumbling block, and a compromise was reached on the bill, striking all reference to schools, only a short time before its passage. Congressman Cain of South Carolina, a Negro, indicated that for the sake of unity within the majority party, the Negroes would accede to the elimination of all reference to schools. (3 Cong. Rec. 957, 981–982.) As Congressman Monroe of Ohio stated, the Negroes thought that "their chances for good schools will be better under the Constitution with the protection of the courts than under a bill containing such provisions as this [the "separate but equal" provision]." (3 Cong. Rec. 998.) Moreover, the fear was expressed that if the provision requiring mixed schools was insisted upon "then in certain States of the South schools will be abandoned altogther." (3 Cong. Rec. 981.)

The controversy in the House and the reasons for the compromise effected were fully summarized by Congressman Butler of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who himself had also been a member of the 39th Congress:

> There are two kinds of opinion in the republican party on this question. I myself would legislate equal privileges to white and black in the schools, if I had the power, first, to legislate, and secondly, to enforce the legislation. But the difficulty I find in that is, that there is such a degree of prejudice in the South that I am afraid that the public-school system, which has never yet obtained any special hold in the South, will be broken up if we put that provision into the bill. Then comes the provision of the committee that there shall be separate schools wherever schools are supported by taxation. There are some difficulties with an unwilling people in carrying out that provision, and there is an objection to it on the part of the colored people, because they say they desire no legislation which shall establish any class distinction.
>
> Then comes the proposition * * * to strike out all relating to schools. I should very much rather have all relating to schools struck out than have even the committee's provision for mixed schools. (3 Cong. Rec. 1005–1006.)

It would appear, therefore, that the compromise form of the bill as enacted represented mutual concessions by the opposing groups, not as to the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

substantive issue of the power of Congress to prohibit school segregation, but solely in recognition of the impossibility of securing from the Congress at that time any decision between the conflicting views on this question.

The Congressional actions subsequent to 1866, which have been summarized above, have relevance as early interpretations of the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, as evidence of contemporaneous understanding, their value is doubtful. Although only a few years had elapsed since the adoption of the Amendment, there had occurred a substantial change not only in the membership of the Congress, but in the intensity of the movement, which had reached its high point in 1866 with the proposal of the Fourteenth Amendment, for securing through national action full protection of the Negro's right to equal treatment.

Throughout this period there were consistent legislative attempts to implement the principles of equality embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment. One such attempt, remarkable for its persistence, was the attempt to end segregation in the public schools. While it ended in failure, the consideration and the support it received in Congress indicate that a substantial group in the Congress, at times a majority, regarded it as necessary and appropriate in carrying out the broad principles established in the Fourteenth Amendment. The failure of this effort resulted in part from the use of dilatory parliamentary tactics by the opposition. Another contributory factor was the belief of a substantial number of Congressmen that legislation to prohibit school segregation would destroy the public school system in the South, then in its infancy, and would thus completely deprive Negroes in that section of the benefit of public education.

280315—53——7

The failure to include a provision in the Civil Rights Act of 1875 specifically forbidding public school segregation does not appear to represent a legislative judgment that the Fourteenth Amendment permitted such segregation, or that it could not be judicially construed, in the light of future conditions, to require invalidation of state segregation laws. As has been shown, some members of Congress may have accepted the compromise form of the bill because it would preserve the question of equal educational treatment of Negroes for later judicial determination. No conclusive inferences can be drawn, therefore, from the legislative history of the 1875 Act to show an understanding either that the Amendment precluded or permitted state laws providing for segregation in public schools.

3. State legislation and decisions

At the time when the Fourteenth Amendment was before the states for ratification and during the period immediately after ratification, there was widespread interest and concern in the extension of public education. Prominent in the discussions was the question of education for the Negroes not merely in the South, where four million freedmen had to be educated to meet their new responsibilities as citizens, but also in the North, where the events of the preceding years had called attention to the status of the Negroes in those states as well.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The movement for general public education, which had begun in the 1830's, took on new impetus in both the North and South after the Civil War. Nearly every Governor's message in the postwar period dealt with the problem of public education in the state, making suggestions for improvement and justifying larger expenditures in the interest of general enlightenment. In the South the Reconstruction constitutional conventions were all concerned with public education. Each of the Constitutions specified that it was the duty of the legislature to make provision for education of all the children of the state, and the first legislatures elected under them passed comprehensive common school laws.

Although the governors, both in the Northern and Southern states, in urging education for the Negroes made their recommendations contemporaneously with submission of the Fourteenth Amendment for ratification, and frequently in the same message, there was no reference to the Amendment as relevant to the question. Education of the Negroes was said to be required by state constitutional provisions, by natural justice, and by the desirability of educating the citizens of a republic. The question was dealt with not in the framework of federal constitutional requirements, but as a matter of determining state policy.

Congress also regarded education as important for the protection of the Negroes in their new status. As has been noted supra, pp. 74–75, in the acts restoring Mississippi (16 Stat. 67), Texas (16 Stat. 80) and Virginia (16 Stat. 62) to representation, Congress specified that the state constitutions should never be amended to deprive any citizen of "the school rights and privileges secured by" those constitutions. Similar provisions were considered and rejected in consideration of the readmission of Arkansas (Congressional Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 2748) and Georgia (Congressional Globe, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 4796). These debates are inconclusive, however, on the relevance of the Fourteenth Amendment to this question, with greater attention being given to education as an element in a republican form of government.

Furthermore, there was no apparent awareness in the states that the Fourteenth Amendment required that education for colored children be furnished on a basis of equality. Thus, the laws

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

of California,[87] Indiana,[88] and Ohio[89] at the time did not provide schools for colored children in areas where they were insufficient in number to warrant a separate school. Those of Delaware and Maryland allotted to Negro education only taxes raised among the colored population.[90] In New York in 1869 the Supreme Court in Dallas v. Fosdick[91] sustained the validity of segregated schools in Buffalo, saying that

> The right to be educated in the common schools of the state, is one derived entirely from the legislation of the state; and as such, it has at all times been subject to such restrictions and qualifications as the legislature have from time to time deemed it proper to impose upon its enjoyment.

As is more fully discussed infra, pp. 104–110, this failure to appreciate the applicability of the Fourteenth Amendment to the subject of public education appears to have been widely shared at the time, and conceivably may explain the ratification of the Amendment by legislatures in states where school segregation then existed or was established shortly thereafter.

---

[87] Cal. Laws 1866, c. 342, sec. 57.

[88] Ind. Laws 1869 (Special Session), p. 41, sec. 3.

[89] 51 Ohio Laws, p. 429, sec. 31 (1853), as amended, 61 Ohio Laws 31, sec. 4 (1864).

[90] Del. Laws 1875, c. 48; Md. Laws 1868, c. 407, c. ix.

[91] How. Prac. Rep. 249, 251 (Sup. Ct. 1869).

a. Negro education in the North. At the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, Negroes had been given some share in the public school systems established in the great majority of the Northern and border states.[92] The form and extent of their participation varied greatly, from complete absence of segregation in the New England states to strict segregation in others. Some states made segregation mandatory; others left it to the discretion of the local school boards either by specific authority in the state legislation or under the general powers of the local boards; others prohibited the exclusion of colored children from public schools of their choice.[93] Historically, the usual sequence was the establishment of a public school system for white children, followed either by the admission of colored children or by the creation of separate schools for Negroes.

[92] There were five states outside of the South (Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware, the last three being slavery states), which in their laws, either directly or by implication, excluded colored children entirely from the public schools.

[93] The laws of eight states provided generally for separate schools for colored children: California, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia. Thirteen states had either no segregation law or expressly prohibited segregation: Connecticut, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Wisconsin. The state laws are discussed in detail in the Appendix to this brief. A brief survey is contained in Barnard, Special Report of the Commissioner of Education, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., H. Ex. Doc. No. 315 (1871), p. 323 et seq.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Although in the North the emphasis was on improved public education for all, the emancipation of the Negroes focussed interest on their education. Governor Morton of Indiana, for example, in his message to the legislature in 1865,[94] urged that, as a matter of "natural justice" as well as "sound political economy" and as an example to the Southern states, the Negroes should be given educational opportunities in the public school system. He said:

> An ignorant and degraded element is a burden and injury to society, whatever may be its color. It therefore becomes a matter of sound political economy, as well as absolute justice, that whatever colored population we may have should be educated, and enabled to become intelligent, industrious and useful members of the community.[95]

Along with the question whether education for the Negroes should be provided, was the question of how they were to be educated, whether in mixed schools or in separate schools. This, too, was discussed without reference to the Fourteenth Amendment, at least prior to 1872, when the decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio in State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198, directed public attention to the issue. (See infra, pp. 102–103). In 1870, Governor Bowie, in recommending modification of the Maryland school law to provide education for colored freedmen, made no reference to the Fourteenth Amendment:

[94] Brevier Legislative Reports 1865, pp. 31–32.

[95] Similarly, in 1869 the Superintendent of Public Instruction in Illinois pleaded with the legislature to extend public education to the 7,000 colored children who were excluded from "all the blessings of public education." (Ill. Doc. 1869, vol. 2, p. 557.) Compare the report of the School Superintendent of Indiana to the state legislature in 1867, in which he concluded that "the welfare of the government, i. e., the State requires the education of all the community, hence of the colored man. * * *" (Ind. Doc. 44th Reg. Sess. (1867), Part I, p. 338.)

> * * * If at a period, immediate or remote, they are to become citizens, possessed of the elective franchise, would not sound policy, then, dictate such education of the colored population as would prepare them intelligently to exercise the elective franchise, and as citizens to judge for themselves of the proper workings of our political system, and not be misled by the crafts and clamors of designing and unscrupulous politicians? Education among the colored people of the State would have a beneficial effect in rendering them more valuable in any position they may be destined to fill. It would doubtless render them, as a class, more virtuous and provident, and better members of the community in which they live.[96]

In the decade immediately following the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment the established basic patterns of non-segregation or segregation in the Northern states continued with only slight changes. The changes in the school laws were, as a rule, directed not toward abolition [96] Md. Docs. 1870, H. Doc. A, pp. 14–15.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

of segregation but rather toward strengthening and equalizing the school rights of the colored children. Some states, such as Michigan (in 1867),[97] and Connecticut (in 1868),[98] declared by statute the right of all children to attend any public school in the district where they resided; others enacted penalties for school boards refusing admission of colored children into the common schools (e. g., Kansas, 1867).[99]

Among the states which had, prior to the ratification of the Amendment, excluded Negroes from the public schools, Indiana admitted them on a segregated basis in 1869,[1] with an amendment enacted in 1877[2] which gave them access to "white" schools where no separate schools were provided or where the colored school did not offer the higher grades available at "white" schools. Illinois, while not expressly providing for segregation in its school law of 1872,[3] considered segregation an administrative matter in the discretion of the county and local school authorities,[4] but insisted that colored children be admitted to some school.[5] In Chicago, as early as 1867 more satis-

[97] Mich. Laws 1867, Act No. 34.

[98] Conn. P. L. 1868, p. 206. Similar laws were already in force in Minnesota (1864) and Rhode Island (1866).

[99] Kans. Laws 1867, ch. 125.

[1] Ind. Laws 1869 (Spec. Sess.), p. 41.

[2] Ind. Laws 1877, p. 124.

[3] Ill. P. L. 1872, p. 700.

[4] Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction, 1869–70. Ill. Doc. 1871, part 1, pp. 355–356.

[5] Ill. P. L. 1874, p. 120.

factory experience with mixed schools than with segregated schools was reported.[6]

Kentucky did not provide for a "common school system for the colored children" until 1874,[7] making it unlawful for children of any race to attend a school assigned to the other. Maryland in 1872, and Delaware in 1875, provided for separate public schools for Negroes.[8]

The contemporary discussions on segregated schools that are available do not show that the lawmakers and school administrators were aware of the relevance of the Fourteenth Amendment to the subject. The closest reference found is the remark of the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana in 1868 that "whatever distinctions may have been previously made in the rights and privileges of citizens by our laws, they have been set aside by the emendations of our National Constitution and the 'Civil Rights Bill.'"[9] The context makes it clear that he was referring to the total exclusion of Negroes from the public school system; he pleaded for Negro education, but being aware of the "deeply-seated prejudice in the minds of many citizens," he suggested separate schools,[10] follow-

[6] Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana, 1867–68, pp. 26–27, Ind. Doc. 1867–68, part 1.

[7] Ky. Laws 1873–74, ch. 521.

[8] Md. Laws 1872, c. 377, c. xviii (cf. Md. Laws 1868, c. 407, c. ix); Del. Laws 1875, ch. 48.

[9] Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction, 1867–68, p. 23. Ind. Doc. 1867–68.

[10] Ibid.; and see Report, 1865–66, Ind. Doc. 1867, Part 1, p. 339.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

ing the lead which Governor Morton had taken as early as 1865.[11] The debates on the Indiana school law of 1869 dealt with the question whether the inferior treatment of Negroes in schools satisfied the state constitutional requirements of equality, but no reference was made to the Fourteenth Amendment.[12]

In Illinois, the Superintendent of Public Instruction insisted in strong terms on the Negroes' right to an "equal education" as required by the state constitution of 1870 and implemented by the school law of 1872.[13] In his view,[14] the equality required by the state constitution was satisfied by either separate or mixed schools.[15]

The rulings of the Commissioner of Common Schools in Ohio, in 1869 and 1870, emphasized that colored youths have "precisely the same right to school funds" that white youths have; where their number is too small for a separate school, the school board has discretion either to admit them to the white school or to "have them taught in [11] Brevier Legislative Reports (1865), pp. 31–32.

[12] 10 Brevier Legislative Reports (1869), pp. 193 et seq., 340 et seq., 490 et seq.; 11 id. (1869 Extra Session), pp. 114 et seq., 387 et seq.

[13] Report of Superintendent of Public Instruction, 1871–72, Ill. Doc. 1873, vol. 2, p. 231 et seq.

[14] Id., 1869–70, Ill. Doc. 1871, p. 355, et seq.

[15] Subsequently, the Superintendent adopted the view sustained in State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann. 21 Ohio St. 198 (1872), that the Fourteenth Amendment permitted separate schools. Id., 1873–74, p. 416.

some other way"; "but they must be taught till their funds are exhausted." [16]

In the Constitutional Convention in Ohio in 1873 and 1874 there was a brief discussion of school segregation.[17] A delegate unsuccessfully proposed a constitutional amendment providing for separate schools for the two races, "so as to give each the equal benefit of a common school education," but with local option for mixed schools.[18] He argued that education was a matter exclusively for the states and urged his amendment "in order to have the Constitution of Ohio stand up for its own citizens against Federal usurpation * * *" in the form of the Fourteenth Amendment.[19]

In a debate on segregation in 1867 in the Pennsylvania legislature, in connection with a law providing for homes for soldiers' orphans,[20] the sponsor of a proposal for nonsegregated homes emphasized the inequalities which resulted from segregation in the common school system. No mention was made of the Fourteenth Amendment.

b. Negro Education in the South. In the Southern states there had been no public education for Negroes, and in most states any education for Negroes was prohibited. In the immediate postwar period, schools were established by the Freedmen's Bureau and benevolent associations, [16] 18th Annual Report, Ohio Doc. 1869, p. 885, et seq.

[17] Ohio Constitutional Convention, 1873–74, Debates, vol. 2, part 2, p. 2238, et seq.

[18] Id., pp. 2238–2839.

[19] Id., pp. 2240–2241.

[20] Pa. Legislative Record 1867, Appendix, p. CCCXLII.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

but even for white children the public school systems had been disrupted by the war. (See pp. 8–9, supra.)

In the postwar period, education of the Negroes was regarded by the white leaders as a necessity arising out of emancipation, the changed status of the Negroes, and their obtaining the suffrage in the new state constitutions. Governor Smith of Alabama in 1868, for example, urged a common school system with provision for education for the colored people on the ground that

> With enlarged freedom and full opportunities for individual development should come the most ample facilities for obtaining that information that makes a man the peer of his fellows, and enables him to protect his own interests, at the same time that he is better fitted to discharge his duties as a citizen.[21]

Similar recommendations were made by the Governors of Arkansas,[22] Georgia,[23] Louisiana,[24] and North Carolina.[25]

During the years in which the Fourteenth Amendment was before the states for ratification, the question of separate or mixed schools was extremely controversial in the Southern states. In [21] Alabama Senate Journal 1868, p. 14.

[22] Arkansas House Journal 1868, p. 296.

[23] Georgia House Journal 1870, p. 416.

[24] Louisiana Legislative Documents 1870, Message of the Governor, p. 7.

[25] North Carolina Public Documents 1867–68, Doc. No. 2, Sess. 1868, pp. 5–6.

most of the Reconstruction constitutional conventions, proposals were made to require or to prohibit separate schools.[26] In seven the constitution as adopted contained no specific provision on this point. In Louisiana [27] and South Carolina [28] the constitution required mixed schools, and in Florida [29] the requirement was implied. None required separate schools.[30]

The constitutions were submitted to Congress for approval in accordance with the requirement of the Reconstruction Act that they be "in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects." [31] (See pp. 72–76, supra.) In addition to the provisions on education, these constitutions contained general provisions guar-

[26] Alabama Convention Journal, pp. 153, 237–8; Arkansas Convention Debates and Proceedings, p. 645, et seq.; Georgia Convention Journal, p. 151; Louisiana Convention Journal, pp. 60–61, 94, 200–2, 268–70, 277; Mississippi Convention Journal, pp. 316, 318, 479–80; South Carolina Convention Proceedings, pp. 71, 88, 100, 685–709, 889–894, 899–901; Texas Convention Journal, I, pp. 896, 898, 912; Virginia Convention Journal, pp. 67, 299, 308, 333, 335, 336, 339, 340.

[27] Louisiana Constitution of 1868, Arts. 135, 136.

[28] South Carolina Constitution of 1868, Art. X, sec. 10.

[29] Florida Constitution of 1868, Art. IX, sec. 1.

[30] The debates in Arkansas and South Carolina contain arguments on the policy of having mixed or separate schools, but do not show any specific reference to the applicability or inapplicability of the Fourteenth Amendment to the question, even though the members of the conventions were aware of the impact of the Amendment on other issues. The debates in the other conventions were not reported, except for the early stages of the Virginia convention.

[31] 14 Stat. 428, sec. 5.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

anteeing "equal civil and political rights and public privileges,"[32] or "the same" rights and privileges,[33] or prohibiting "distinctions" on account of race or color.[34] There were instances of a prohibition on discrimination in places of business or public resort,[35] and a prohibition on distinctions in public institutions.[36] In no instance did the constitution submitted to Congress and approved by it state that inequality or segregation was permitted.

The available records in these states do not, however, show an awareness that the Fourteenth Amendment might be relevant in determining the basis on which public education was furnished. The recommendations made concerning education to the same Reconstruction legislatures which ratified the Amendment contained no reference to it. Segregation was not stated to be permitted by the Amendment, nor was equality in education for Negroes stated to be required by the Amendment.

Except for Arkansas and Florida, none of the ten Southern states had a statutory provision for a segregated public school system at the time it ratified the Fourteenth Amendment.[37] In five [32] Alabama Constitution of 1867, Art. I, sec. 2.

[33] Louisiana Constitution of 1868, Art. 2.

[34] South Carolina Constitution of 1868, Art. X, sec. 8.

[35] Louisiana Constitution of 1868, Art. 13.

[36] Mississippi Constitution, 1868, Art. I, sec. 21.

[37] An Arkansas statute in 1867 required Negroes to attend separate schools. (Arkansas Laws 1866–67, No. 35, Sec. 5, p. 100.) The new state constitution adopted in of these ten states, school segregation was established by laws enacted within a year after ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.[38] In Louisiana, the city of New Orleans succeeded in maintaining separate schools despite the state constitutional prohibition.[39] Again, however, no specific references have been found to show that the advocates of separate schools in these states were aware of the relevance of the Fourteenth Amendment to the question.

c. State judicial decisions on Negro education. During the period from 1868 to 1882, the school rights of colored children were litigated in state courts in a number of cases. These cases may be divided into three distinct groups, so far as the relevance of the Fourteenth Amendment is concerned.

April 1868, shortly before the legislature ratified the Amendment, provided generally that free schools for "all persons" should be maintained. Some members of the constitutional convention regarded this as requiring mixed schools. (Arkansas Convention Debates and Proceedings, pp. 660, 666, 672.) In Florida, separate schools for Negroes were established under an 1866 statute. (Florida Laws 1865, No. 12, ch. 1475.) The new state constitution adopted in 1868, before the Amendment was ratified, provided for "the education of all the children residing within its borders, without distinction or preference". (Constitution of 1868, Art. IX, sec. 1.)

[38] Alabama Laws 1868, p. 148 (Act of the Board of Education); Arkansas Laws 1868, No. 52, Sec. 107, p. 163; Georgia Laws 1870, No. 53, Sec. 32; North Carolina Laws 1868–69, ch. 184, Sec. 50, p. 471; Virginia Laws 1869–70, ch. 259, Sec. 47.

[39] Louisiana House Debates 1869, pp. 209–10, 217–20, 246–7.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Some cases were argued and decided solely on the basis of state constitutional and statutory provisions. Thus, the Supreme Court of Iowa held in 1868 that the equality of school rights as guaranteed in the state constitution ("education of all the youths of the State") and as implemented by the school law denied school authorities any discretion to classify school children according to race or color. Clark v. The Board of Directors, etc., 24 Iowa 267. Accord: Smith v. The Directors, etc., 40 Iowa 518, and Dove v. The Independent School District, 41 Iowa 689, both decided in 1875. Similarly, in Illinois the state supreme court held in 1874 that school directors had no power under the state constitution and school law to make racial distinctions so as to deprive colored children of the benefits which white children received in the public schools. Chase v. Stephenson, 71 Ill. 383. A New York court in 1869 sustained the validity of a provision in a city charter requiring separate schools, on the ground that under state law there was no "right" to education. No reference was made to the Fourteenth Amendment. Dallas v. Fosdick, 40 How. Pr. Rep. 249 (Sup. Ct. 1869). (See pp. 88–89, supra.)

In other cases, although the Fourteenth Amendment was mentioned or considered, the decision was placed upon the narrower ground of state constitutional or statutory law. Thus, a Pennsylvania court in 1873 upheld the right of colored children to be admitted to the white school in a district where no colored school was established. Commonwealth ex rel. Brown v. Williamson, 10 Phila. 490. In that case the judge applied what he regarded as the clear mandate of the school law, remarking that he failed to see that any right arising out of the Fourteenth Amendment was involved. The Supreme Court of Illinois, in People ex rel. John Longress v. The Board of Education, etc., 101 Ill. 308 (1882), held that the state constitution and school law did not permit a school board to assign colored pupils to a school outside the district of their residence. It did not therefore reach the question of the applicability of the Amendment. The Supreme Court of Kansas, in deciding that a school board had no power under state law to establish segregated schools, left open the question whether state legislation authorizing segregated schools would violate the Fourteenth Amendment, pointing out that this question could be finally determined only by the Supreme Court of the United States. Board of Education v. Tinnon, 26 Kans. 1 (1881). See also State ex rel. Stoutmeyer v. Duffy, 7 Nev. 342 (1872), which held that the equality of rights guaranteed by the state constitution was violated by the exclusion of Negroes from the public schools, but that the state statute, while "probably" opposed to the spirit of the Fourteenth Amendment, did not violate its letter.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Finally, there is a group of cases in which the Fourteenth Amendment was the main issue and the principal ground of decision. The earliest of these is State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198 (Dec. Term 1871). The Supreme Court of Ohio held that the Amendment had no bearing on such exclusively domestic matters as school legislation, and that if it did, the classification of pupils according to color was not contrary to the Amendment, since all children were provided equal facilities. The McCann case became a leading precedent on the question of the validity of school segregation.[40] It was followed in New York (People v. Easton, 13 Abbott's Pr. R. (N. S.) 159, Sup. Ct., 1872) and Indiana (Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327, 1874), although in the latter case the facilities for educating colored children were plainly unequal. In California, the Supreme Court reached the same conclusion in Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36 (1874), relying exclusively upon Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 198, decided eighteen years before the Amendment was adopted. On the other hand, a lower court in Pennsylvania held that classification of school children according to race or color violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Commonwealth v. Davis, 10 Weekly Notes 156 (1881).

[40] In the debates on the bill which became the Civil Rights Act of 1875, the minority Senators who unsuccessfully opposed a provision prohibiting school segregation expressly relied upon the McCann case, as well as Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 198, decided in 1850. See Congressional Globe, 42nd Cong., 2nd Sess., pp. 3257, 3261. Senator Frelinghuysen, in charge of the bill, distinguished both the McCann case and Clark v. Board of Directors, 24 Iowa 267, on the ground that they were based on state constitutional and statutory provisions and therefore "afford no precedent for the construction of this bill when enacted. The language of this bill secures full and equal privileges in the schools, subject to laws which do not discriminate as to color." 2 Cong. Rec. 3452. And see pp. 80–82, supra.

These various groups of cases, taken in their entirety, thus fail to evidence any general and definite contemporaneous judicial construction of the Amendment as applied to school segregation.

d. Significance of the contemporaneous state laws providing for school segregation. The fact that a number of states had segregated school systems when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, or established them shortly thereafter, does not necessarily reflect a contemporaneous understanding that the Amendment permitted "separate but equal" schools for colored children. It is argued that this must have been the general understanding at the time, for otherwise these states could not consistently have ratified the Amendment.

The difficulty with this argument, however, is that the historical facts on which it is based do not support the conclusions which are drawn from them. The inquiry here must be, what was the state of mind—so far as their understanding of the scope and application of the Fourteenth Amendment is concerned—of those responsible for the simultaneous ratification of the Amendment and enactment or continuation of school segregation legislation? As has been shown (supra, pp. 57–65), virtually no evidence is to be found in the available records of the ratification proceedings indicating that the question of school segregation was considered in connection with the debates on the Amendment itself. Moreover, as has also been shown (supra, pp. 86–100), there is little evidence that the state legislators and other officials responsible for the school laws considered the relevance of the Fourteenth Amendment and deliberately concluded that these laws were not in conflict with the Amendment.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

This absence of evidence showing an awareness that the Fourteenth Amendment might have some relation to school segregation is consistent with at least five different views which might conceivably have been held on this subject at that time: (1) that the Amendment had no application whatsoever to public education furnished by a state; (2) that the Amendment did apply to public education, but only to the extent that if a state provided education for white children, it also had to provide some education (not necessarily equal) for colored children; (3) that the Amendment permitted a state to have separate schools for colored children, provided the facilities afforded them were substantially equal to the schools for white children; (4) that the Amendment was essentially a grant of power to Congress, and unless or until Congress should prohibit it from doing so, a state could make such provision for the education of its children as it deemed proper; or (5) that, while the Amendment required that colored children be treated equally with respect to public education, that requirement was then satisfied, in view of the special circumstances existing in the period following emancipation of the slaves, by establishing separate schools for colored children.

It is submitted that, of these various possible conclusions which might be drawn, the one least supported by the available historical materials is that which finds in them a contemporaneous understanding that the Amendment permitted the states to establish separate schools for white and colored children, so long as the facilities furnished were substantially equal. We believe that, while each of these various possible understandings can summon some support, none can be demonstrated to be valid to the exclusion of the others. This question is one as to which historians can rely only on conjecture and speculation rather than on demonstrable fact. In the circumstances, such inferences as may be drawn from the available data are too tenuous and inconclusive to furnish a reliable basis for present-day judicial interpretation of the Amendment.

Because public education was regarded as a privilege conferred by the state, rather than as a right due the citizen, and was supported wholly by state taxation, it may well have been considered that public schools were wholly within the domestic jurisdiction and discretionary control of each state and therefore unaffected by the Fourteenth Amendment. This possibility is given weight by early decisions of the state courts, e. g., State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198, 207–208 (Dec. Term, 1871); Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36 (1874); Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327, 360 (1874); cf. Cumming v. Board of Education, 175 U. S. 528, 545 (1899), and is perhaps the conclusion which most logically explains the silence of the available contemporary historical materials on the question of the relation of the Fourteenth Amendment to school segregation. As a valid interpretation of the Amendment, however, it has now been emphatically rejected by this Court's repeated holdings that although it is a "privilege," public education, if granted to some citizens, must be extended to all on a basis of equality of right. Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631; Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

One paramount difficulty with the "separate but equal" hypothesis as to the original understanding of the Amendment is its failure to account for the fact that colored children were educated in schools which were not equal even in a physical sense. Patent inequalities were often sanctioned by requiring that schools be established for white children while colored schools were merely authorized or permitted, or were provided only when a given number of colored children lived in the school district. Even where the laws did not discriminate, colored schools were still largely inferior when compared with white schools on a physical or pedagogical basis. This fact is more consistent with an understanding that the Amendment was satisfied if some provision, however unequal, was made for colored children than with a "separate but equal" understanding. But the former conception of the Amendment, if it existed, has been unequivocally rejected by this Court. Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, supra; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, supra; Sweatt v. Painter, supra.

In 1868 public schools had been hardly begun in many states and were still in their infancy. School attendance was, as a general matter, not compulsory. The Negroes had just been released from bondage and were generally illiterate, poor, and retarded socially and culturally. To educate them in the same classes and schools as white children may have been regarded as entirely impracticable. It is possible that state legislatures—while recognizing in the Fourteenth Amendment a clear mandate of equality—may have considered separate schools for colored children as a temporary practical expedient permitted by the Amendment. Many proponents of Negro education regarded separate schools as a more effective means of extending the benefits of the public school system to the colored people; for, since school attendance was generally not compulsory, fear of discrimination might well have deterred Negro children from attending existing "white" schools in many areas.[41]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It is not necessary to assume that these state legislatures considered their segregated schools as completely free from possible attack under the Amendment, nor does it necessarily follow that they were deliberately flouting its prohibitions. It was widely thought that the Amendment was primarily intended to remove constitutional doubts from the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and to give Congress the power to redress inequalities and discriminations imposed on the Negroes in the states. This is echoed in this Court's opinion in Ex Parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 345, which hinted that the federal judiciary might have no power to enforce the Amendment except where expressly authorized by Congress, and also in Senator Sumner's attempts until his death to persuade Congress to use its power under Section 5 to prohibit separate schools. (Supra, pp. 76–86.) It is not unlikely that state legislators may have felt themselves free to exercise their judgment as to the desirability of school segregation until Congress should act. It may also have been thought, although not articulated, that the constitutional issue would ultimately be resolved by this Court, and that the states were not bound to observe any constitutional prohibitions against school segregation unless and until this Court should declare them.

[41] "* * * Previously, such [colored] children were received into any public school at which they presented themselves; but the prevailing prejudice against them was so great that many preferred rather to remain away from school altogether than to face it. The provision for separate schools was practically a boon to the colored people, although it probably grew out of an indisposition to permit their children to attend school with white children." J. P. Wickersham, A History of Education in Pennsylvania (1886), p. 506.

All of these hypotheses are possible. None can be demonstrated to be true. We do not contend for the validity of any one above the others. We conclude only that the historical facts, as distinguished from assumptions, are too equivocal and inconclusive to furnish a solid basis upon which this Court can determine the application of the Amendment to the question of school segregation as it exists today, when school attendance is compulsory and when there are no considerations of an educational character which warrant separation of children of different races in public schools.

In striking down various forms of state legislation as unconstitutional racial discriminations, this Court has not been deterred by the existence of such legislation on the statute books during the period when the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified. Thus, in 1879, the Court held that state laws which excluded Negroes from juries denied them the equal protection of the laws. Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303. Such statutes were to be found in a number of states. E. g., West Virginia (Acts of 1872–1873, p. 102, reenacting chapter 116 of the 1870 Code), Kentucky (Gen. St. 1873 (Bullock & Johnson), ch. 62, Art. III, § 2),

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Missouri (Wagner's Mo. Stat. 1870 (2d ed.), ch. 80, § 2), and Oregon (Gen. Laws of Oregon, 1843–1872, Civil Code, § 918). The Court in the Strauder case observed (p. 306) that at the time the Fourteenth Amendment was incorporated into the Constitution "it required little knowledge of human nature to anticipate that those who had long been regarded as an inferior and subject race would, when suddenly raised to the rank of citizenship, be looked upon with jealousy and positive dislike, and that State laws might be enacted or enforced to perpetuate the distinctions that had before existed. Discriminations against them had been habitual. It was well known that in some States laws making such discriminations then existed, and others might well be expected." [Italics added.]

In the racial restrictive covenant cases (Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1; Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24), there was a background of unbroken judicial enforcement of such covenants in nineteen states and the District of Columbia extending over a period of 33 years (No. 72, 1947 Term, Brief for the United States, pp. 40–45). In overturning the rule applied by these decisions, no reference was made either to their number, their uniformity, or their age. And when the Court held in Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U. S. 536, decided in 1927, that a state statute excluding Negroes from participation in primary elections was a "direct and obvious infringement" of the Fourteenth Amendment, the prevailing view of the state courts, going back as far as 1887 (Commonwealth v. Helm, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 532), was that a primary election is "purely a legislative creation" as to which "the legislature was subjected to no constitutional inhibition" (State ex rel. Hatfield v. Carrington, 194 Iowa 785, 786).[42] Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the Court in Nixon v. Herndon, disposed of the matter in a few words (p. 541): "States may do a good deal of classifying that it is difficult to believe rational, but there are limits, and it is too clear for extended argument that color cannot be made the basis of a statutory classification affecting the right set up in this case."

G. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

(1)

The Congressional history of the Fourteenth Amendment shows that the Amendment was proposed and debated as part of a broad and continuing program to establish full freedom and legal equality for Negroes. Many in the Congress which considered the Thirteenth Amendment understood it to abolish not only slavery but also its concomitant legal discriminations. This understanding rested on a belief that that Amendment had made the Negro an indistinguishable part of the population and hence entitled to the same rights and privileges under the laws as all others. The enactment of the Black Codes in [42] The cases are collected in Mangum, The Legal Status of the Negro (1940) pp. 407–409.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the Southern states made it obvious, however, that additional protection by the national government was required.

The civil rights legislation enacted by the 39th Congress was designed to strike down distinctions based on race or color. From the debates on that legislation, however, there emerged the view that the Thirteenth Amendment alone did not afford a sufficient constitutional basis for such action, and that a further amendment was necessary. In the same debates there was also crystallized the view that only explicit constitutional embodiment of the principle of equality before the law could protect that principle from change by some future Congress.

The attempt in the 39th Congress, through the Bingham "equal rights" amendment, to provide a direct constitutional basis for national legislation guaranteeing equal treatment under the law failed because of the belief that it left the matter open to future congressional change and destroyed the balance between federal and state power. The Fourteenth Amendment was proposed to remedy these deficiencies. Section 1 of that Amendment, to both its proponents and opponents, was an express constitutional recognition of the doctrine of "absolute and perfect" equality under the law—the same doctrine which had underlain the Thirteenth Amendment, the civil rights legislation, and Bingham's unsuccessful "equal rights" amendment.

Neither the majority nor the minority in the 39th Congress evidenced any substantial disagreement as to the broad scope of Section 1 of the Amendment. The majority repeatedly affirmed that it would firmly secure the principle that the "law which operates on one man shall operate equally upon all" and would prohibit all legisation by the states drawn on the basis of race and color. The opposition similarly understood its broad purpose; it was on that basis that they voiced their objections.

While the debates reflect a clear understanding as to the breadth of the principle of equality under law embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment, neither its proponents nor its opponents found it necessary or appropriate to catalog exhaustively the specific application of its general principle. Only a few such examples were given during the debates on the Amendment itself. It is noteworthy that one of the majority spokesmen, at a time when the majority was proceeding under the discipline of party caucus, illustrated the racial discriminations which the Amendment would reach by reference to a state law discriminating against Negroes in public schools. He did not, however, make specific mention of the system of racial segregation which the state law required.

In the debates on the civil rights legislation, which are an integral part of the immediate background of the Fourteenth Amendment, the minority expressed the view that existing state systems of racially-segregated public schools would be stricken down by the broad principle of equal treatment under the law. This view was not disputed by the majority. A like objection was voiced to Bingham's "equal rights" amendment which sought to embody the same general principle. Again, the majority did not take issue with this understanding of its scope. It is also worthy of note that not only were Bingham's proposal and Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment alike in their general purpose; they were also similar in language.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In sum, while the legislative history does not conclusively establish that the Congress which proposed the Fourteenth Amendment specifically understood that it would abolish racial segregation in the public schools, there is ample evidence that it did understand that the Amendment established the broad constitutional principle of full and complete equality of all persons under the law, and that it forbade all legal distinctions based on race or color. Concerned as they were with securing to the Negro freedmen these fundamental rights of liberty and equality, the members of Congress did not pause to enumerate in detail all the specific applications of the basic principle which the Amendment incorporated into the Constitution. There is some evidence that this broad principle was understood to apply to racial discriminations in education, and that it might have the additional effect of invalidating state laws providing for racial segregation in the public schools.

(2)

There is a paucity of available evidence as to the understanding of the state legislatures which ratified the Amendment, in part because of the almost complete absence of records of debates, in part perhaps because their function was to accept or reject a proposal rather than to draft one.

In the states most attention was given to the political aspects of the Republican "plan of reconstruction," which received popular approval in the elections of 1866. It was frequently stated that the Amendment guaranteed to the Negroes full rights of equality as citizens, but the scope and content of those rights were not detailed. The opponents of the Amendment objected to the first section on the ground that it, together with the fifth section, expanded the powers of the Federal Government at the expense of the rights of the states. There were almost no references to schools during consideration of the amendment.

At the time of consideration and ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, some of the Northern states had and continued segregated schools and some of the Southern states, in providing for the first time for public education for Negroes, established separate schools. In the historical context in which these actions were taken, however, they do not evidence an understanding as to the reach of the Fourteenth Amendment. The inferences to be drawn from these actions necessarily rest on conjecture and speculation. The scanty evidence available suggests that the legislatures were probably unaware that the Amendment was relevant to education, even to the extent of requiring equal, though separate, schools. Proponents of education for Negroes based their arguments on grounds other than the Fourteenth Amendment, and made no reference to it.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In sum, the available materials are too sparse, and the specific references to education too few, to justify any definite conclusion that the state legislatures which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment understood either that it permitted or that it prohibited separate schools.

(3)

There is no direct evidence at the time of the adoption of the Amendment that its framers understood specifically that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under section 5, abolish segregation in the public schools. They clearly understood, however, that Congress would have the power to enforce the broad guarantees of the Amendment, and the Amendment was deliberately framed so as to assure that the rights protected by section 1 could not be withdrawn or restricted by future Congresses.

Subsequently, in the debates on the Civil Rights Act of 1875, some of the framers expressed an understanding that segregated schools were contrary to the Amendment and that Congress could and should abolish them. While an express prohibition against segregated schools was not contained in the Act in its final form, its omission did not spring from doubt of the power of Congress to enact such a prohibition; other types of segregation were barred by the Act. Since section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment authorizes Congress only to enforce the provisions of the Amendment, the apparently prevalent understanding in Congress that it could prohibit school segregation is evidence of a tacit assumption that segregation in schools was in conflict with the broad principles declared in section 1.

No specific references have been found in the debates on the Fourteenth Amendment to show any expressed contemporary understanding of its framers as to the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing school segregation of its own force. Some evidence of such an understanding is, however, found in the debates on the Civil Rights Act of 1875.

(4)

In the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, decided on April 14, 1873, less than five years after the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, this Court was called upon for the first time to construe that Amendment. Six years later, in Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, the Court first considered the application of the Amendment to a state law involving a racial discrimination. In each instance the opinion of the Court dwelt at length upon the history and purposes of the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Reconstruction Amendments. The studies which have been made in preparing this brief have only served to confirm the accuracy of the contemporary historical observations made in the Slaughter-House and Strauder opinions by the members of this Court who themselves had lived during the period when the Amendment was adopted. The great events of the Reconstruction period were still fresh in their minds, and required for them no elaborate investigation into recondite historical materials.

Mr. Justice Miller's opinion for the Court in the Slaughter-House Cases noted at the outset (pp. 67–68): "The most cursory glance at these articles [the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments] discloses a unity of purpose, when taken in connection with the history of the times, which cannot fail to have an important bearing on any question of doubt concerning their true meaning. * * * Fortunately that history is fresh within the memory of us all, and its leading features, as they bear upon the matter before us, free from doubt." After referring to the abolition of slavery by the Thirteenth Amendment, the Court pointed out (pp. 70–71):

> The process of restoring to their proper relations with the Federal government and with the other States those which had sided with the rebellion, undertaken under the proclamation of President Johnson in 1865, and before the assembling of Congress, developed the fact that, notwithstanding the formal recognition by those States of the abolition of slavery, the condition of the slave race would, without further protection of the Federal government, be almost as bad as it was before. Among the first acts of legislation adopted by several of the States in the legislative bodies which claimed to be in their normal relations with the Federal government, were laws which imposed upon the colored race onerous disabilities and burdens, and curtailed their rights in the pursuit of life, liberty, and property to such an extent that their freedom was of little value, while they had lost the protection which they had received from their former owners from motives both of interest and humanity.

* * * * *

These circumstances, whatever of falsehood or misconception may have been mingled with their presentation, forced upon the statesmen who had conducted the Federal government in safety through the crisis of the rebellion, and who supposed that by the thirteenth article of amendment they had secured the result of their labors, the conviction that something more was necessary in the way of constitutional protection to the unfortunate race who had suffered so much. They accordingly passed through Congress the proposition for the fourteenth amendment, and they declined to treat as restored to their full participation in the government of the Union the States which had been in insurrection, until they ratified that article by a formal vote of their legislative bodies.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Court concluded its review of the history of the Amendments as follows (pp. 71–72):

> We repeat, then, in the light of this recapitulation of events, almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all; and on the most casual examination of the language of these amendments, no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him. It is true that only the fifteenth amendment, in terms, mentions the negro by speaking of his color and his slavery. But it is just as true that each of the other articles was addressed to the grievances of that race, and designed to remedy them as the fifteenth.
>
> We do not say that no one else but the negro can share in this protection. * * * But what we do say, and what we wish to be understood is, that in any fair and just construction of any section or phrase of these amendments, it is necessary to look to the purpose which we have said was the pervading spirit of them all, the evil which they were designed to remedy, and the process of continued addition to the Constitution, until that purpose was supposed to be accomplished, as far as constitutional law can accomplish it.

In Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, Mr. Justice Strong's opinion for the Court contains a similar exposition of the history and objectives of the Fourteenth Amendment (pp. 306–308):

> This is one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose; namely, securing to a race recently emancipated, a race that through many generations had been held in slavery, all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy. The true spirit and meaning of the amendments, as we said in the Slaughter-House Cases (16 Wall. 36), cannot be understood without keeping in view the history of the times when they were adopted, and the general objects they plainly sought to accomplish. At the time when they were incorporated into the Constitution, it required little knowledge of human nature to anticipate that those who had long been regarded as an inferior and subject race would, when suddenly raised to the rank of citizenship, be looked upon with jealousy and positive dislike, and that State laws might be enacted or enforced to perpetuate the distinctions that had before existed. Discriminations against them had been habitual. It was well known that in some States laws making such discriminations then existed, and others might well be expected. The colored race, as a race, was abject and ignorant, and in that condition was unfitted to command the respect of those who had superior intelligence. Their training had left them mere children, and as such they needed the protection which a wise government extends to those who are unable to protect themselves. They especially needed protection against unfriendly action in the States where they were resident. It was in view of these considerations the Fourteenth Amendment was framed and adopted. It was designed to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the general government, in that enjoyment, whenever it should be denied by the States. * * *

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

If this is the spirit and meaning of the amendment, whether it means more or not, it is to be construed liberally, to carry out the purposes of its framers. * * * It ordains that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. What is this but declaring that the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the States, and, in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color?

> The words of the amendment, it is true, are prohibitory, but they contain a necessary implication of a positive immunity, or right, most valuable to the colored race,—the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctively as colored,—exemption from legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of the rights which others enjoy, and discriminations which are steps towards reducing them to the condition of a subject race.
>
> * * * The very fact that colored people are singled out and expressly denied by a statute all right to participate in the administration of the law, as jurors, because of their color, though they are citizens, and may be in other respects fully qualified, is practically a brand upon them, affixed by the law, an assertion of their inferiority, and a stimulant to that race prejudice which is an impediment to securing to individuals of the race that equal justice which the law aims to secure to all others.

Decided the same day as the Strauder case were Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, and Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, which also involved questions under the Fourteenth Amendment as to exclusion of Negroes from juries. In Virginia v. Rives, the Court, referring to the civil rights statutes (now 8 U. S. C. 41 and 42) enacted by Congress pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment, said (p. 318): "The plain object of these statutes, as of the Constitution which authorized them, was to place the colored race, in respect of civil rights, upon a level with whites. They made the rights and responsibilities, civil and criminal, of the two races exactly the same."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Similarly, in Ex parte Virginia, the Court stated (pp. 344–345): "One great purpose of these [Thirteenth and Fourteenth] amendments was to raise the colored race from that condition of inferiority and servitude in which most of them had previously stood, into perfect equality of civil rights with all other persons within the jurisdiction of the States. They were intended to take away all possibility of oppression by law because of race or color."

Elsewhere in this brief (see pp. 139–141, infra) we have quoted at length from the opinions of this Court, extending over a period of more than three-quarters of a century, which show a consistent recognition that the Fourteenth Amendment is to be construed liberally so as to carry out the great and pervading purpose of its framers to establish complete equality for Negroes in the enjoyment of fundamental human rights and to secure those rights against enforcement of legal distinctions based on race or color.

(5)

As has been shown, no conclusive evidence of a specific understanding as to the effect of the Fourteenth Amendment on school segregation has been found in its legislative history. But this Court has neither declared nor applied any canon of constitutional interpretation that a construction of an amendment which is warranted by its provisions and manifest policy cannot be adopted unless it is also affirmatively supported by specific evidence in the legislative history showing that its framers so "intended." See State Board of Equalization v. Young's Market Co., 299 U. S. 59, 63–64; Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U. S. 277. To be sure, the Court will review "the background and environment" of the period in order to illuminate the broad purposes which an amendment was designed to achieve. E. g., Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U. S. 1, 8; McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1, 27. In attempting to determine the application of the amendment to a specific issue, however, the Court will give scant regard to inconclusive excerpts from debates which are relied upon to show a "legislative intent." The Court's attitude on this subject was summarized in Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 601–602, involving a claim that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to make applicable to the states the jury requirements of the Sixth Amendment:

> Counsel for plaintiff in error has cited from the speech of one of the Senators of the United States, made in the Senate when the proposed Fourteenth Amendment was under consideration by that body, * * * and counsel has argued that this court should, therefore, give that construction to the amendment which was contended for by the Senator in his speech.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

* * * It is clear that what is said in Congress upon such an occasion may or may not express the views of the majority of those who favor the adoption of the measure which may be before that body, and the question whether the proposed amendment itself expresses the meaning which those who spoke in its favor may have assumed that it did, is one to be determined by the language actually therein used and not by the speeches made regarding it.

What individual Senators or Representatives may have urged in debate, in regard to the meaning to be given to a proposed constitutional amendment, * * * does not furnish a firm ground for its proper construction, nor is it important as explanatory of the grounds upon which members voted in adopting it. * * *

In the case of a constitutional amendment it is of less materiality than in that of an ordinary bill or resolution. A constitutional amendment must be agreed to, not only by Senators and Representatives, but it must be ratified by the legislatures, or by conventions, in three-fourths of the States before such amendment can take effect. The safe way is to read its language in connection with the known condition of affairs out of which the occasion for its adoption may have arisen, and then to construe it, if there be therein any doubtful expressions, in a way so far as is reasonably possible, to forward the known purpose or object for which the amendment was adopted.

And see United States v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. 649, 699.[43]

The Court has emphasized in many cases that the process of interpreting and applying the provisions of the Constitution, which as Chief Justice Marshall said was "intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs,"[44] is not comparable to construing a contract or statute, where the judicial task is essentially to ascertain and give effect to the intended meaning of the words used. Constitutional provisions like "due process of law" and "equal protection of the laws" express broad principles of government the essence of which is their vitality and adaptability to the progressive changes and needs of the nation. The Court, speaking through Chief Justice Hughes, has said:[45]

> If by the statement that what the Constitution meant at the time of its adoption it means today, it is intended to say that the great clauses of the Constitution must be confined to the interpretation which the [43] Mr. Justice Frankfurter, concurring in Adamson v. California, 332 U. S. 46, stated (p. 64) that "Remarks of a particular proponent of the [Fourteenth] Amendment, no matter how influential, are not to be deemed part of the Amendment. What was submitted for ratification was his proposal, not his speech." And see the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in the Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 457, 560.

[44] McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 415.

[45] Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U. S. 398, 442–443.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> framers, with the conditions and outlook of their time, would have placed upon them, the statement carries its own refutation. It was to guard against such a narrow conception that Chief Justice Marshall uttered the memorable warning—"We must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding" (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 407) * * *.

The opinions of the Court, particularly those which have come to be recognized as landmarks in the development of American constitutional law, are replete with expressions of a similar nature. They are familiar to the Court, and it is not necessary to repeat them here in extenso. A few examples will suffice to show how clearly and consistently the Court has articulated this rule of constitutional interpretation:

Weems v. United States, 217 U. S. 349, 373–374 (McKenna, J.):

> * * * Time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes. Therefore a principle to be vital must be capable of wider application than the mischief which gave it birth. This is peculiarly true of constitutions. They are not ephemeral enactments, designed to meet passing occasions. They are, to use the words of Chief Justice Marshall, "designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it." The future is their care and provision for events of good and bad tendencies of which > no prophecy can be made. In the application of a constitution, therefore, our contemplation cannot be only of what has been but of what may be. Under any other rule a constitution would indeed be as easy of application as it would be deficient in efficacy and power. Its general principles would have little value and be converted by precedent into impotent and lifeless formulas. Rights declared in words might be lost in reality. * * *

Gompers v. United States, 233 U. S. 604, 610 (Holmes, J.):

> * * * But the provisions of the Constitution are not mathematical formulas having their essence in their form; they are organic living institutions transplanted from English soil. Their significance is vital not formal; it is to be gathered not simply by taking the words and a dictionary, but by considering their origin and the line of their growth. * * *

United States v. Classic, 313 U. S. 299, 316 (Stone, J.):

> * * * in setting up an enduring framework of government they [the framers] undertook to carry out for the indefinite future and in all the vicissitudes of the changing affairs of men, those fundamental purposes which the instrument itself discloses. Hence we read its words, not as we read legislative codes which are subject to continuous revision with the changing course of events, but as the revelation of > the great purposes which were intended to be achieved by the Constitution as a continuing instrument of government.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25, 27 (Frankfurter, J.):

> * * * basic rights do not become petrified as of any one time, even though as a matter of human experience, some may not too rhetorically be called eternal verities. It is of the very nature of a free society to advance in its standards of what is deemed reasonable and right. Representing as it does a living principle, due process is not confined within a permanent catalogue of what may at a given time be deemed the limits or the essentials of fundamental rights.[46]

---

[46] See also Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 104; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 530–531; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 385, 386–387; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S. 437, 448; Helvering v. Davis, 301 U. S. 619, 640–641; Rochin v. California, 342 U. S. 165, 169–172; and cf. Browder v. United States, 312 U. S. 335, 339–340. For non-judicial writings of the members of this Court, see Holmes, The Common Law (1881), pp. 35–36; The Path of the Law, 10 Harv. L. Rev. 457, 469, 472 (1897); Brandeis, The Living Law, 10 Ill. L. Rev. 461 (1916); Hughes, Addresses (1916), pp. 354–355; The Supreme Court of the United States (1928), pp. 142, 152, 196; Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process (1921), pp. 71, 83, 88; The Growth of the Law (1924), pp. 73–74, 104, 105–106; The Paradoxes of Legal Science (1928), p. 99; Stone, Law and Its Administration (1924), pp. 142–143; Fifty Years' Work of the Supreme Court (1928), 14 A. B. A. Journ. 428; Reed, Stare Decisis and Constitutional Law (1938), No. 35 Penna. Bar Ass'n Quarterly, 131, 141, 142–143, 149; Frankfurter, Mr. Justice Holmes' Constitutional Opinions (1923), 36 Harv.

III

IT IS WITHIN THE JUDICIAL POWER, IN CONSTRUING THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, TO DECIDE THAT RACIAL SEGREGATION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Question 3 reads as follows:

> On the assumption that the answers to questions 2 (a) and (b)[47] do not dispose of the issue, is it within the judicial power, in construing the Amendment, to abolish segregation in public schools?

In the cases at bar the plaintiffs seek an adjudication of their claim that rights secured to them by the Constitution are violated by the maintenance of separate schools for white and colored children. Question 3, as we understand it, requests counsel to consider whether this claim is of such a nature that it falls within the exclusive province of the political branches of government

---

L. Rev. 909, 917, 920; Mr. Justice Holmes and the Supreme Court (1938), pp. 8, 75; Law and Politics (1939), pp. 13, 48, 91, 99, 192, 196; Douglas, Stare Decisis (1949), pp. 9, 12; Jackson, The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy (1941), pp. 23, 174; Full Faith and Credit (1945), pp. 42–43, 58.

[47] Question 2 is:

"If neither the Congress in submitting nor the States in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment understood that compliance with it would require the immediate abolition of segregation in public schools, was it nevertheless the understanding of the framers of the Amendment

"(a) that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under section 5 of the Amendment, abolish such segregation, or

"(b) that it would be within the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing such segregation of its own force?"

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

and cannot properly be entertained and decided by the federal courts. In his opinion for the district court in the Briggs case, Chief Judge Parker stated that racial segregation in public schools of the states presents "not questions of constitutional right but of legislative policy * * *. The federal courts would be going far outside their constitutional function were they to attempt to prescribe educational policies for the states in such matters, however desirable such policies might be in the opinion of some sociologists or educators. For the federal courts to do so would result, not only in the interference with local affairs by an agency of the federal government, but also in the substitution of the judicial for the legislative process in what is essentially a legislative matter." (No. 1, R. 186–187.)

1. It is respectfully submitted that the constitutional question before this Court is not the same as that before a state legislature considering whether, solely as a matter of educational and social policy, a system of racially separate or mixed schools should be established. If the Fourteenth Amendment leaves a state entirely free to choose whichever system it considers desirable and beneficial for its people, then, of course, no federal court can substitute its judgment for the choice made by the state. The question presented here, however, is whether the Amendment does give such a freedom of choice to a state. This is a question not of legislative policy but of constitutional power—and it is a question which under our system of government must ultimately be determined by this Court on the basis of its construction of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The plaintiffs in these cases contend that the Amendment should be construed as withdrawing from a state, in providing public education to its citizens, the authority to make legal distinctions based solely on race or color. The defendants, on the other hand, argue that this Court's decisions interpreting the Amendment have established the right of a state to maintain separate schools for white and colored pupils, provided the facilities for education offered to all are substantially equal. The dispute in these cases thus centers on the proper construction to be given the Fourteenth Amendment. The judicial function here is not to review the wisdom of a state's policy favoring segregation in education but rather to determine its constitutional power to adopt such a policy. Such a task clearly falls within the traditional authority and competence of this Court.

The authority under which federal courts act in enforcing rights secured by the Constitution is derived from the Constitution itself. Article III of the Constitution vests the "judicial Power of the United States" in the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts established by Congress, and provides that the judicial power so vested

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution * * *." The right asserted by the plaintiffs in these cases arises under the Constitution, and the relief prayed for (i. e., decrees enjoining continuation of the defendants' allegedly unconstitutional practices) is of the sort which Anglo-American courts of equity have granted for centuries.

2. The judicial power is not lessened because the right invoked arises under the Fourteenth Amendment. Section 5 of the Amendment, which empowers Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation, neither expressly nor impliedly limits the independent power of this Court to vindicate, through appropriate judicial proceedings and remedies, rights guaranteed by the Amendment. In countless cases, too numerous for citation here, the Court has construed the Amendment of its own force, without any implementing act of Congress, as requiring judicial invalidation of state action found to infringe rights protected by the Amendment. In the vast majority of these cases no act of Congress was involved or even suggested. If it should now be held, for the first time since its adoption in 1868, that the power of this Court to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment depends on the enactment of implementing legislation by Congress, literally scores of decisions would have to be overruled. Among these would be the most recent applications of the Amendment to racial discrim-inations in public education: Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631; Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337. If one who claims that his right to equality in the enjoyment of public educational benefits has been violated must present his claim to Congress rather than the courts, then all of these cases—in which violation of that right was found and appropriate judicial relief granted—were erroneously decided.

Congress has, of course, exercised to some extent its power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment. It has provided criminal and civil sanctions for violation of rights secured by the Amendment (18 U. S. C. 241–243; 8 U. S. C. 41–48; cf. Screws v. United States, 325 U. S. 91; Williams v. United States, 341 U. S. 97), and it has conferred jurisdiction on the federal district courts to redress violations of such rights (28 U. S. C. 1343). Referring to the federal statute prohibiting disqualification of jurors in federal and state cases because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude (18 Stat. 336, 8 U. S. C. 44), the Court recently observed in Fay v. New York, 332 U. S. 261, 282–283 (the "blue ribbon" jury case):

> For us the majestic generalities of the Fourteenth Amendment are thus reduced to a concrete statutory command when cases involve race or color which is wanting in every other case of illegal discrimination.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the Fay opinion (p. 283) the Court noted that in Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 345, one of the earliest cases arising under the Fourteenth Amendment, it was "hinted that there might be no judicial power to intervene except in matters authorized by Congress." The question in Ex parte Virginia, however, was whether the Fourteenth Amendment empowered Congress to enact 18 Stat. 336, the Act cited above; no question was involved as to the independent judicial power to enforce the Amendment. It was decided on the same day as Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, and the opinions for the Court in both cases were delivered by Mr. Justice Strong. In the latter case the opinion expressly stated (p. 322) that "Denials of equal rights in the action of the judicial tribunals of the State are left to the revisory powers of this court." And the decisions of this Court have established beyond any possible doubt that its "revisory powers" to invalidate violations of the Fourteenth Amendment extend to every kind of state action, whether judicial, legislative, or executive, civil or criminal, substantive or procedural.

If any exception from this general principle is now to be carved out, so that this Court will decline to exercise its power to enforce the Amendment where the plaintiff is a Negro child complaining that his constitutional right to equal protection of the laws has been violated by a state law compelling him to attend a segregated school, such an exception could not be justified by precedent.

The "hint" in Ex parte Virginia was never followed in subsequent cases. It cannot today be regarded as raising any serious question as to this Court's power and obligation to enforce all rights arising under the Fourteenth Amendment, without awaiting exercise of the independent enforcement power granted Congress in Section 5. When a litigant claims that a state law denies him due process or equal protection, this Court does not remand the case to Congress for remedial action. If the claim is sustained, the Court grants appropriate judicial relief. Congress and the Court have concurrent power, each within its own proper sphere, to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment. Judicial remedies are specific and directed to particular cases and parties; legislative remedies are necessarily general. An available judicial remedy for violation of the Amendment cannot be, and has never been, withheld merely because Congress has not found it necessary to enact general remedial legislation.

3. Of the rights arising under the Amendment which this Court has enforced, none has received more consistent and solicitous judicial vindication than the right to equality before the law and to be free from governmental discriminations based on race or color. The familiar test of the constitutionality of a legislative classification is whether it has a reasonable basis. Railway Express v. New York, 336 U. S. 106, 110. But reasonableness is not measured in the abstract; the standard of rea-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

sonableness is found in the provisions and policy of the Fourteenth Amendment. And that Amendment, as is demonstrated by its history (see pp. 112–116, supra) and by decisions of this Court extending from the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 81, to the Sweatt and McLaurin cases, 339 U. S. 629, 637,[48] has made it unreasonable and [48] The consistency of the Court's position deserves fuller exposition:

Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 71:

"[N]o one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in * * * all [of the reconstruction amendments], lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited domination over him. * * *"

Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 306–307:

"This [the Fourteenth Amendment] is one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose; namely, securing to a race recently emancipated, a race that through many generations had been held in slavery, all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy. * * * It was designed to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the general government, in that enjoyment, whenever it should be denied by the States. * * * What is this but declaring that the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the States, and, in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color? * * *"

Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318:

"The plain object of these statutes [the civil rights laws enacted by Congress under the Fourteenth Amendment], as unconstitutional, at least in the absence of compelling reasons of national security, for a state to establish or enforce legal distinctions based on race or color. Even though other types of legislative classifications are valid if found to have a rational basis, the Court not only refuses to give laws imposing racial distinctions a presumption of constitutionality but regards them as at least prima facie unconstitutional. In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 216, the Court said: of the Constitution which authorized them, was to place the colored race, in respect of civil rights, upon a level with whites. They made the rights and responsibilities, civil and criminal, of the two races exactly the same."

---

Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 344–345:

"One great purpose of these amendments was to raise the colored race from that condition of inferiority and servitude in which most of them had previously stood, into perfect equality of civil rights * * *. They were intended to take away all possibility of oppression by law because of race or color."

Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370, 389:

"The question thus presented is of the highest moment to that race, the security of whose rights of life, liberty, and property, and to the equal protection of the laws, was the primary object of the recent amendments to the national Constitution."

Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 544:

"The object of the [Fourteenth] amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law * * *."

Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 592:

"[T]he primary reason for that [Fourteenth] amendment was to secure the full enjoyment of liberty to the colored race * * *."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> It should be noted, to begin with, that all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. That is not to say that all such restrictions are unconstitutional. It is to say that courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny. Pressing public necessity may sometimes justify the existence of such restrictions; racial antagonism never can.

The standard of reasonableness established by the Fourteenth Amendment is necessarily flexible

---

Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 76:

"[A] principal purpose of the * * * Amendment was to protect persons of color * * *."

Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U. S. 536, 541:

"That Amendment [the Fourteenth], while it applies to all, was passed, as we know, with a special intent to protect the blacks from discrimination against them. * * * States may do a good deal of classifying that it is difficult to believe rational, but there are limits, and it is too clear for extended argument that color cannot be made the basis of a statutory classification affecting the right set up in this case [to vote at a state primary election]."

Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 23:

"The historical context in which the Fourteenth Amendment became a part of the Constitution should not be forgotten. Whatever else the framers sought to achieve, it is clear that the matter of primary concern was the establishment of equality in the enjoyment of basic civil and political rights and the preservation of those rights from discriminatory action on the part of the States based on considerations of race or color. Seventy-five years ago this Court announced that the provisions of the Amendment are to be construed with this fundamental purpose in mind."

and dynamic. Changing conditions can make unjustifiable and unconstitutional today that which yesterday may have been entirely justifiable and constitutional. In Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25, 27, the Court said of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment:

> It is of the very nature of a free society to advance in its standards of what is deemed reasonable and right. Representing as it does a living principle, due process is not confined within a permanent catalogue of what may at a given time be deemed the limits or the essentials of fundamental rights.

Cf. Euclid v. Amber Realty Co., 272 U. S. 365, 387, where the Court observed that the application of constitutional guarantees "must expand or contract to meet the new and different conditions which are constantly coming within the field of their operation. In a changing world, it is impossible that it should be otherwise."

It would be idle, therefore, to speculate whether the principle of equality before the law was violated by the continuation or establishment shortly after the Civil War in many states of separate schools for the children of the newly-freed slaves. Had the issue been raised, constitutional justification for such action might conceivably have been found in the illiteracy and retarded social and economic status of a race so recently liberated from the bonds of slavery, as well as in the rudimentary and inadequate character of then-existing public school systems, which might have made it impracticable to teach the two races in the same classes. Moreover, school attendance was not generally compulsory then, as it is now. (See pp. 9, 110, supra.) The question now before the Court is not whether conditions existing when these school systems began may have justified them, practically and legally. The question, rather, is whether, under the far different conditions existing today, a legal requirement that colored children must attend public schools where they are segregated solely because of their color deprives them of their constitutional right to equality in the enjoyment of public educational advantages and opportunities.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

4. The judicial inquiry, it must be emphasized, is not simply to determine whether there is equality as between schools: the Constitution requires that there be equality as between persons. The Fourteenth Amendment compels a state to grant the benefits of public education to all its people equally, without regard to differences of race or color. This has not always been as clear as it is today. Prior to this Court's decision in 1938 in Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, it could plausibly have been contended, in reliance on cases decided before then, that because public education is a "privilege" furnished at the pleasure of the state and maintained by local taxation, the Fourteenth Amendment does not impose any limitation (apart from a requirement that separate schools must be physically equal) on the state's discretion to prescribe the terms and conditions on which such privilege is granted. Thus, in the first case in this Court involving a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment that a state's public educational system was unconstitutional, Cumming v. Board of Education, 175 U. S. 528, decided in 1899, the Court in an opinion by Mr. Justice Harlan, who had dissented so vigorously in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, stated (p. 545):

> * * * while all admit that the benefits and burdens of public taxation must be shared by citizens without discrimination against any class on account of their race, the education of the people in schools maintained by state taxation is a matter belonging to the respective States, and any interference on the part of Federal authority with the management of such schools cannot be justified except in the case of a clear and unmistakable disregard of rights secured by the supreme law of the land.[49]

[49] See also Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U. S. 45, where the Court upheld a state statute making it unlawful for a state-chartered corporation to operate a private school where white and colored pupils are taught together. Harlan, J., dissented on the ground that the statute was inconsistent with "the great principle of the equality of citizens before the law." (p. 69.) He was careful to add, however: "Of course what I have said has no reference to regulations prescribed for public schools, established at the pleasure of the State and maintained at the public expense. No such question is here presented and it need not be now discussed." (Id.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Similarly, in Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78, decided in 1927, the Court dealt with the question "whether a Chinese citizen of the United States is denied equal protection of the laws when he is classed among the colored races and furnished facilities for education equal to that offered to all, whether white, brown, yellow or black" (p. 85). Answering this question in the negative, the Court, in an opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Taft, held that "The right and power of the state to regulate the method of providing for the education of its youth at public expense is clear" (ibid.), citing and quoting from the Cumming case.

Mr. Chief Justice Taft's opinion in Gong Lum stated (pp. 85–86): "Were this a new question, it would call for very full argument and consideration, but we think that it is the same question which has been many times decided to be within the constitutional power of the state legislature to settle without intervention of the federal courts under the Federal Constitution." In support of this statement were cited fifteen cases, none of them decided by this Court. Twelve were state cases, beginning with Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 198, decided in 1850, eighteen years before the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. At least some of these cases expressed the view that control over public education is a subject-matter inherently within a state's police power, and that the Fourteenth Amendment imposes no limitation on its power in that regard.

E. g., State ex rel. Stoutmeyer v. Duffy, 7 Nev. 342, 346; State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198, 209; Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327, 360.

In Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, supra, however, this Court unequivocally dispelled any notion that because public education is provided as a matter of "privilege" rather than of right, the state has full discretion to determine the terms and conditions on which such privilege is granted. The Court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, said (305 U. S. at pp. 349–350):

> The question here is not of a duty of the State to supply legal training, or of the quality of the training which it does supply, but of its duty when it provides such training to furnish it to the residents of the State upon the basis of an equality of right. By the operation of the laws of Missouri a privilege has been created for white law students which is denied to Negroes by reason of their race. * * * That is a denial of the equality of legal right to the enjoyment of the privilege which the State has set up * * *.

As we read its opinion, the Court in the Gaines case made it clear that its function in cases of this type is not limited to appraising questions of fact concerning the physical equality of schools or facilities, and that its primary concern is whether the individual is being denied, because of race or color, equality of treatment in the opportunities, advantages, and benefits offered by the state. In that case the Court decided that a legal education—assumedly equal in quality—offered in schools outside the state did not meet the required standard of personal equality of right when contrasted with the privilege, afforded only to white students, of legal education in a school within the state. That this was a departure from the approach taken in the Cumming and Gong Lum cases is indicated by the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice McReynolds (305 U. S. at 353–354), who unsuccessfully invoked those cases to support his view that "the settled legislative policy of the State" for "separation of whites and Negroes in schools" should not be upset by the Court.[50]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

[50] In Atkin v. Kansas, 191 U. S. 207, 222, the Court had stated that "it belongs to the State, as the guardian and trustee for its people, and having control of its affairs, to prescribe the conditions upon which it will permit public work to be done on its behalf, or on behalf of its municipalities." This principle was applied in Heim v. McCall, 239 U. S. 175, to uphold the validity of a state law excluding aliens from employment on public works, the Court declaring (pp. 191–193) that regulations on this subject involve only considerations of public policy with which the courts have no concern. To the extent that these cases hold that the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment do not apply at all to public employment because it is a "privilege" wholly subject to the discretion of the state, they have been limited by Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U. S. 183, 191–192, and United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U. S. 75, 100, as well as by the cases cited in the text.

Following the Gaines case came Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631; Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629; and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637. Those cases emphasized the personal character of the right to equal protection of the laws. In Sweatt and McLaurin, the Court directed its attention to the individual plaintiff, and appraised the educational opportunities afforded by the state solely in terms of their value to him, considering all the conditions (tangible and intangible) on which they were offered. In those cases the Court, looking beyond any claimed physical equality of the facilities furnished, found a denial of the plaintiff's constitutional right to equal treatment. Thus, in the McLaurin case, a Negro graduate student was furnished an education not only equal but identical to that offered whites, but he was subjected to such segregated treatment because of his color that this Court, adverting to psychological and sociological considerations such as are urged here, ordered that he be treated completely without reference to his color (p. 642):

> We conclude that the conditions under which this appellant is required to receive his education deprive him of his personal and present right to the equal protection of the laws. See Sweatt v. Painter, ante, p. 629. We hold that under these circumstances the Fourteenth Amendment precludes differences in treatment by the state based upon race. Appellant, having been admitted to a state-supported graduate school, must receive the same treatment at the hands of the state as students of other races.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In one of the cases at bar, No. 1, the Kansas case, the district court found (R. 245–246) that racial segregation in public schools has a detrimental effect on colored children; that it affects their motivation to learn; and that it has a tendency to retard their educational and mental development and to deprive them of benefits they would receive in an integrated school system. The opinions in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases, 339 U. S. at 633–635 and 641–642, show that similar considerations were found persuasive by the Court in concluding that the plaintiffs in those cases were denied the equality of right secured them by the Fourteenth Amendment. In neither of those cases is there any suggestion that the question presented is not justiciable; or that it involves the determination of matters of educational or social policy outside the judicial power; or that the constitutional question of segregation in higher education is in any respect different from segregation in elementary and high schools.

5. Finally, it is clear that the cases at bar do not involve "political questions" beyond the authority and competence of federal courts to decide. The Court has clearly marked out the types of questions which it will not undertake to adjudicate because their nature is such as to make them exclusively the concern of the political depar ments. Thus, the federal courts will decline t determine whether and when a state of war exist leaving such questions to the legislative and exe utive branches of government. The Protector, 1 Wall. 700. Similarly, the constitutional respons bility of each house of Congress to be "the Judg of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of i own Members" (Article I, section 5) implies corollary lack of authority in the courts to de with such "political" questions as apportionmen Colegrove v. Green, 328 U. S. 549; cf. Giles

Harris, 189 U. S. 475. And, of course, it has lo been settled that it is not part of the feder judicial function to enforce the guarantee Article IV, section 4, that every state shall ha a republican form of government. Luther Borden, 7 How. 1; Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall.
Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph Co.
Oregon, 223 U. S. 118.

None of the considerations governing tho cases is applicable here. Determination of t constitutional question presented in the insta cases would in no respect conflict with, or intru upon, any power which the Constitution vests the Congress or the President. Indeed, as is e denced by the countless decisions of this Co enforcing the Fourteenth Amendment, the pri cipal responsibility for vindicating rights secur by that Amendment has properly been assum by the judiciary. A decision that racial segre

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

tion in public elementary and high schools is unconstitutional would be no more "political" or "legislative" than those which have ended segregation in higher levels of public education. Sweatt v. Painter, supra; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, supra.

In answer to any contention that this Court lacks the competence to decide the question of constitutional interpretation which has been placed before it in these cases, we call to mind its words in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624, 638, 639–640:

> The very purpose of a Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. * * *
>
> Nor does our duty to apply the Bill of Rights to assertions of official authority depend upon our possession of marked competence in the field where the invasion of rights occurs. * * * [C]hanged conditions often deprive precedents of reliability and cast us more than we would choose upon our own judgment. But we act in these matters not by authority of our competence but by force of our commissions. We cannot, because of modest estimates of our competence in such specialties as public education, withhold the judgment that history authenticates as the function of this Court when liberty is infringed.

COPY BOUND CLOSE IN CENTER

IV

IF THE COURT HOLDS THAT RACIAL SEGREGATION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL, IT HAS POWER TO DIRECT SUCH RELIEF AS IN ITS JUDGMENT WILL BEST SERVE THE INTERESTS OF JUSTICE IN THE CIRCUMSTANCES

Question 4 reads as follows:

> Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment
>
> (a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or
>
> (b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

This question assumes that the Court will hold that the plaintiffs in these cases have a constitutional right not to be excluded, solely because of their color, from schools which they would otherwise be allowed to attend. The question is addressed solely to the Court's power to fashion an appropriate remedy. Is its power so limited that, if it finds that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional, it must necessarily enter decrees requiring immediate admission of the plaintiffs to nonsegregated schools—or can it direct some other form of relief? The alternative type of relief suggested by the Court's question is to "permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In dealing with question 5, infra, pp. 170–185, we shall consider the problems which may arise, at least in some areas, in giving effect to a decision that segregation in public schools is unconstitutional. We shall there discuss the question whether, and to what extent, it would be equitable and in the public interest for the Court to enter decrees in these cases requiring that Negro children should "forthwith" be admitted to nonsegregated schools.

The shaping of relief in the present cases involves reference to three fundamental principles governing the granting of judicial remedies, each of which is to some degree applicable here: (1) One whose legal rights have been and continue to be violated is entitled to relief which will be effective to redress the wrong. If a court finds that certain conduct is unlawful, it normally enters a decree enjoining the continuation of such conduct. (2) A court of equity is not inflexibly bound to direct any particular form of relief. It has full power to fashion a remedy which will best serve the ends of justice in the particular circumstances. (3) In framing its judgment a court must take into account not only the rights of the parties but the public interest as well. The needs of the public, and the effect of proposed decrees on the general welfare, are always of relevant, if not paramount, concern to a court of justice.

The principal problem here, as so often in the law, is to find a wise accommodation of these principles as applied to the facts presented. "The essential consideration is that the remedy shall be as effective and fair as possible in preventing continued or future violations of the [law] in the light of the facts of the particular case." United States v. National Lead Co., 332 U. S. 319, 335. But, whatever the difficulties of determining what remedy would be most effective and fair in redressing the violation of constitutional right presented in these cases, we believe there can be no doubt of the Court's power to grant such remedy as it finds to be most consonant with the interests of justice.

Congress has expressly empowered the Court, in dealing with cases coming before it, to enter "such appropriate judgment, decree, or order, or require such further proceedings to be had as may be just under the circumstances." 28 U. S. C. 2106. The breadth of this power, and the flexibility of judicial remedies which it permits the Court to utilize, have been demonstrated in a great variety of situations. See Minnesota v. National Tea Co., 309 U. S. 551, 555; Eccles v. Peoples Bank, 333 U. S. 426, 431; Radio Station WOW, Inc. v. Johnson, 326 U. S. 120, 132; Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U. S. 607, 620, 622; Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U. S. 321, 329–

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

330; Alexander v. Hillman, 296 U. S. 222, 239; Atlantic Coast Line v. Florida, 295 U. S. 301, 316; Central Kentucky Co. v. Railroad Commission, 290 U. S. 264, 271; Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Chicago, &c. Railway Co., 163 U. S. 564, 600–601; and see Story, Equity Jurisprudence (14th ed.), §§ 28, 578; Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence (5th ed.), §§ 111, 170, 175a. In Hecht Co. v. Bowles, supra, this Court said (pp. 329–330):

> The essence of equity jurisdiction has been the power of the Chancellor to do equity and to mould each decree to the necessities of the particular case. Flexibility rather than rigidity has distinguished it. The qualities of mercy and practicality have made equity the instrument for nice adjustment and reconciliation between the public interest and private needs as well as between competing private claims.

In Addison v. Holly Hill Co., supra, at 619, the Court emphasized that where governmental action has been in violation of law, the judicial task is to seek a disposition which "is most consonant with justice to all interests in retracing the erroneous course that has been taken." Commenting upon United States v. Morgan, 307 U. S. 183, and other instances of judicial adaptation of conventional remedies to meet the needs of unusual situations, the Court said (pp. 620, 622):

> The creative analogies of the law were drawn upon by which great equity judges, exercising imaginative resourcefulness, > have always escaped the imprisonment of reason and fairness within mechanical concepts of the common law. * * *

>
> * * * * *
>
> In short, the judicial process is not without the resources of flexibility in shaping its remedies, though courts from time to time fail to avail themselves of them.

Where public interests are involved, equitable powers "assume an even broader and more flexible character than when only a private controversy is at stake." Porter v. Warner Co., 328 U. S. 395, 398; and see Radio Station WOW, Inc. v. Johnson, supra, at 132; Yakus v. United States, 321 U. S. 414, 441; Hecht Co. v. Bowles, supra, at 329–330; Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Co., 320 U. S. 661, 670; Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U. S. 496, 500; Inland Steel Co. v. United States, 306 U. S. 153, 157; Virginian Railway Co. v. System Federation, 300 U. S. 515, 552; Beasley v. Texas and Pacific Ry. Co., 191 U. S. 492, 498.

In habeas corpus cases arising out of criminal and deportation proceedings the Court has framed its relief to permit correction of illegality where possible, instead of directing immediate or outright discharge of the petitioner. Thus, in In re Bonner, 151 U. S. 242, where the trial court had exceeded its jurisdiction in sentencing the petitioner, the Court delayed his discharge in order to afford opportunity for the court to correct its error. The Court held that Section 761 of the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Revised Statutes (now contained in 28 U. S. C. 2243), authorizing "the court * * * to dispose of the party as law and justice require," invested it "with the largest power to control and direct the form of judgment to be entered in cases brought up before it on habeas corpus" (p. 261). And see Medley, Petitioner, 134 U. S. 160. Similarly, in Mahler v. Eby, 264 U. S. 32, where the Court held that a warrant of deportation was defective, it stated that "We need not discharge the petitioners at once because of the defective warrant" (p. 45). To the same effect are Tod v. Waldman, 266 U. S. 113, and Butterfield v. Zydok, 342 U. S. 524, 546–47.[51]

In granting relief in civil cases against a practice or condition found to be unlawful, courts have frequently suspended the operation of their decrees on grounds of inconvenience to the public or undue hardship to the wrongdoer, and have allowed sufficient time for removing the illegality. Thus, in Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, an original bill in equity by Georgia to enjoin the defendant copper companies from discharging noxious gas from their works in Tennessee over Georgia's territory, the Court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Holmes, held that, notwithstanding that the defendants' activities were unlawful, an injunction would issue "after allowing a reasonable time to the defendants to complete the structures that they are now building, and the efforts that they are making to stop the fumes" (p. 239).[52] Cf. Harrisonville v. Dickey Clay Co., 289 U. S. 334; Great Central Ry v. Doncaster Rural Council, 87 L. J. R. N. S. 80;[53] Gregory v. Crain, 291 Ky. 194; City of San Diego v. Van Winkle, 69 Cal. App. 2d 237, 241.[54]

[51] Compare United States v. Morgan, 307 U. S. 183, holding that where an order of the Secretary of Agriculture fixing stockyard rates was void for procedural defects but there was no judicial determination of the reasonableness of the rates fixed by the order, the money representing the difference between the rates in effect and the lower rates of the order should be retained in the registry of the District Court to await a further and valid determination of reasonable rates by the Secretary.

[52] Although the decision was rendered in 1907, the matter was still before the Court in 1916. See 237 U. S. 474, 678, and 240 U. S. 650.

[53] Other English cases, each involving abatement of a nuisance, are: City of Manchester v. Farnworth [1930] A. C. 171, 185; Attorney General v. Birmingham, 4 Kay & J. 528, 541, 547–548 (1858); Attorney-General v. Proprietors of the Bradford Canal, L. R. 2 Eq. 71 (1866); Attorney-General v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, 4 Ch. App. 146, 165–166 (1868); Attorney General v. Corporation of Halifax, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 129 (1869); North Staffordshire Ry. Co. v. Board of Health, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 131 (1870); Attorney-General v. Finchley Local Board, 3 Times L. R. 356 (1887). See also 1 Seton, Judgments and Orders (7th ed.), p. 612.

[54] Other state cases in which the effective date of an injunction was suspended to permit time for necessary readjustment, most of them involving abatement of a nuisance, are: Harding v. Stamford Water Co., 41 Conn. 87; Stovern v. Town of Calmar, 204 Ia. 983, 986; Caretti v. Broring Building Co., 150 Md. 198, 210–211; Brehm v. Richards, 152 Md. 126, 136–137; Baltimore v. Brack, 175 Md. 615; Boston Rolling Mills v. Cambridge, 117 Mass. 396, 401; Breed v. City of Lynn, 126 Mass. 367, 370; Suburban Land Co., Inc.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the field of monopolies and illegal combinations federal courts have regarded their powers to be of sufficient flexibility to permit elimination of unlawful practices to take place over a reasonable period of time. Cf. Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197, 360.[85] Thus, where a violation of the antitrust laws has persisted over a long period of time, resulting in a tangled complex of economic arrangements tainted with illegality, it is recognized that a decree calling for complete elimination of the illegal arrangements overnight would, in the particular circumstances, be impracticable. See, for example, the provisions for dissolution of the illegal combinations involved in the Tobacco, Standard

---

v. Billerica, 314 Mass. 184, 194; Gundy v. Village of Merrill, 250 Mich. 416; Lohman v. The St. Paul, etc. R. R. Co., 18 Minn. 174; Doremus v. Mayor and Aldermen of Paterson, 79 N. J. Eq. 63; State v. White, 90 N. J. Eq. 621; Chapman v. City of Rochester, 110 N. Y. 273; Moody v. Village of Saratoga Springs, 17 App. Div. (N. Y.) 207, affirmed, 163 N. Y. 581; Sammons v. City of Gloversville, 34 Misc. (N. Y.) 459; Bailey v. City of New York, 38 Misc. (N. Y.) 641; French v. Chapin-Sacks Mfg. Co., 118 Va. 117; Town of Purcellville v. Potts, 179 Va. 514, 524, 525; Winchell v. City of Waukesha, 110 Wis. 101. See Pomeroy's Eq. Rem. (1905), §§ 531, 535; Beach, Injunctions (1895), §2; High on Injunctions (4th ed.), § 746.

[85] There the Court, in speaking generally of remedies in a civil antitrust suit, said (p. 360):

"This, it must be remembered, is a suit in equity * * *; and the court, in virtue of a well settled rule governing proceedings in equity, may mould its decree so as to accomplish practical results—such results as law and justice demand."

Oil and Motion Picture cases.[56] The decree entered in the Tobacco case furnishes a useful precedent and guide to the disposition of the present cases, and for that reason we quote at length from the Court's opinion there (pp. 185, 187–188):

> * * * In considering the subject [of relief] * * * three dominant influences must guide our action: 1. The duty of giving complete and efficacious effect to the prohibitions of the statute; 2, the accomplishing of this result with as little injury as possible to the interest of the general public; and, 3, a proper regard for the vast interests of private property which may have become vested in many persons as a result of the acquisition either by way of stock ownership or otherwise of interests in the stock or securities of the combination without any guilty knowledge or intent in any way to become actors or participants in the wrongs which we find to have inspired and dominated the combination from the beginning. * * *
>
> * * * * *

---

[56] United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 191 Fed. 371 (S. D. N. Y.); Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1; United States v. Paramount Pictures, 70 F. Supp. 53, 74–75 (S. D. N. Y.), 334 U. S. 131, 85 F. Supp. 881, 899, 339 U. S. 974. See also United States v. National Lead Co., 332 U. S. 319, 329–335, 363; United States v. Aluminum Co., 322 U. S. 716, 148 F. 2d 416 (C. A. 2), 171 F. 2d 285, 91 F. Supp. 333, 419 (S. D. N. Y.); United States v. International Harvester Co., 214 Fed. 987 (D. Minn.), 274 U. S. 693.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

* * * Under these circumstances, taking into mind the complexity of the situation in all of its aspects and giving weight to the many-sided considerations which must control our judgment, we think, so far as the permanent relief to be awarded is concerned, we should decree as follows: 1st. That the combination in and of itself, as well as each and all of the elements composing it, whether corporate or individual, whether considered collectively or separately, be decreed to be in restraint of trade and an attempt to monopolize and a monopolization within the first and second sections of the Antitrust Act. 2d. That the court below, in order to give effective force to our decree in this regard, be directed to hear the parties, by evidence or otherwise, as it may be deemed proper, for the purpose of ascertaining and determining upon some plan or method of dissolving the combination and of recreating, out of the elements now composing it, a new condition which shall be honestly in harmony with and not repugnant to the law. 3d. That for the accomplishment of these purposes, taking into view the difficulty of the situation, a period of six months is allowed from the receipt of our mandate, with leave, however, in the event, in the judgment of the court below, the necessities of the situation require, to extend such period to a further time not to exceed sixty days. 4th. That in the event, before the expiration of the period thus fixed, a condition of disintegra> tion in harmony with the law is not brought about, either as the consequence of the action of the court in determining an issue on the subject or in accepting a plan agreed upon, it shall be the duty of the court, either by way of an injunction restraining the movement of the products of the combination in the channels of interstate or foreign commerce or by the appointment of a receiver, to give effect to the requirement of the statute.[57]

Cf. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, where this Court directed extension of the time for executing the decree from a period of thirty days to at least six months, "in view of the magnitude of the interests involved and their complexity" (p. 81).[58]

[57] A plan was formulated under the supervision of the district court at a series of conferences extending for a period of more than two months. A hearing was held on the plan at which not only the parties but also any person who wished to express his views as a friend of the court was given an opportunity to do so. See 191 Fed. at 373. In the decree approving the plan it was adjudged that it "will recreate out of the elements now composing it [the illegal combination] a new condition which will be honestly in harmony with, and not repugnant to, the law, and without unnecessary injury to the public or the rights of private property." The decree also gave the defendants an extension of the period for carrying the plan into execution and provided for retention of jurisdiction by the court "for the purpose of making such other and further orders and decrees, if any, as may become necessary for carrying out the mandate of the Supreme Court." 191 Fed. at 428, 430–431.

[58] In the International Harvester case (214 Fed. 987 (D. Minn.)), the court directed that "the entire combina-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Court has expressed a reluctance to enter decrees which would involve the judiciary in the administration of complex and detailed matters: "The judiciary is unsuited to affairs of business management; and control through the power of contempt is crude and clumsy and lacking in the flexibility necessary to make continuous and detailed supervision effective." United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U. S. 131, 163; see also Brown v. Board of Trustees, 187 F. 2d 20, 25 (C. A. 5). It is clear, however, that this goes to the exercise of the Court's discretion and not to its power to act in such situations. The choice whether or not the courts are to be thrust into a system involving difficult policing problems "should not be faced unless the need for the system is great and its benefits plain." United States v. Paramount Pictures, supra, at 164. The tion and monopoly be dissolved, that the defendants have 90 days in which to report to the court a plan for the dissolution of the entire unlawful business into at least three substantially equal, separate, distinct, and independent corporations," and it was further provided that "in case the defendants fail to file such plan within the time limit the court will entertain an application for the appointment of a receiver for all the properties of the corporate defendants, and jurisdiction is retained to make such additional decrees as may become necessary to secure the final winding up and dissolution of the combination and monopoly complained of * * *" (214 Fed. at 1001). The decree was entered in August 1914 and modified in October of that year. In November 1918 a consent decree was entered, and in 1927 this Court affirmed dismissal of a supplemental petition of the Government for further relief in the case. See 274 U. S. 693.

---

Court, in rejecting the argument that it should not act because it would be required to embark upon an enterprise involving burdensome administrative functions, said in Nebraska v. Wyoming, 325 U. S. 589, 616: "The difficulties of drafting and enforcing a decree are no justification for us to refuse to perform the important function entrusted to us by the Constitution." See also Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 47; Southern R. Co. v. Franklin &c. C. R. Co., 96 Va. 693; Harper v. Railway Co., 76 W. Va. 788, 794; Pomeroy, Equitable Remedies (1905) § 761. In Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230, 237 U. S. 474, 678, the Court did not hesitate to enter a decree which involved it deeply in the details of effective enforcement.

It may be contended, however, that the powers of a court of equity are not so comprehensive where vindication of the constitutional right to equal protection of the laws is involved. Such right, the Court has pointedly observed, is "personal and present." Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 635; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 642; Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 22; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631, 633; Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 351; McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 235 U. S. 151, 161–162. Thus a complainant must show that his own rights have been unconstitutionally impaired; it is not sufficient for him to establish that the rights of others have been affected (McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co.). Similarly, it is no answer to a particular plaintiff's claim to say that at some time in the future he will receive the equality of treatment which is his constitutional right (Sipuel v. Board of Regents). So, too, in the present cases, the plaintiffs could well say that, as individuals whose constitutional rights have been and are continuing to be violated, it affords them inadequate redress to enter decrees providing only that at some time in the future (perhaps after they are too old themselves to enjoy the benefits of the Court's decision) colored children as a group must be given public education on a non-segregated basis. For these plaintiffs the remedy of immediate admission to non-segregated schools is an indispensable corollary of the constitutional right, for to recognize a litigant's right without affording him an adequate remedy for its violation is to nullify the value of the right.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On the other hand, it is also true that the constitutional issues presented to the Court transcend the particular cases and complainants at bar, and in shaping its decrees the Court may take into account such public considerations as the administrative obstacles involved in making a general transition throughout the country from existing segregated school systems to ones not based on color distinctions. If the Court should hold in these cases that racial segregation per se violates the Constitution, the immediate consequence would be to invalidate the laws of many states which have been based on the contrary assumption. Racial segregation in public schools is not an isolated phenomenon limited to the areas involved in the cases at bar, and it would be reasonable and in accord with its historic practices for the Court in fashioning the relief in these cases to consider the broad implications and consequences of its ruling.

The "personal and present" language appears in cases involving education on the professional and graduate levels. Each case involved a single plaintiff. It is one thing to direct immediate relief where a single individual seeks vindication of his constitutional rights in the relatively narrow area of professional and graduate school education, and an entirely different matter to follow the same course in the broad area of public school education affecting thousands of children, teachers, and schools. We do not think that when the Court in those cases characterized the right to equal protection of the laws as "personal and present", it was thereby rejecting the applicability, to cases involving the right, of settled principles governing equitable relief.[59] On the con-

[59] This Court long ago cautioned "that general expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit, when the very point is presented for decision." Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens v.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

trary, the Court has recognized that such principles are equally applicable to litigation involving fundamental constitutional rights of individuals. Thus, in McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 235 U. S. 151, five Negro citizens brought suit to enjoin the defendant railroads from complying with the Oklahoma "Separate Coach Law" for the reason, among others, that it violated the Fourteenth Amendment. This Court, while it concluded that certain provisions of the law were unconstitutional, held that the complainants were not entitled to the relief sought because they did not show any injury to themselves (235 U. S. at 162, 164):

> The desire to obtain a sweeping injunction cannot be accepted as a substitute for compliance with the general rule that the complainant must present facts sufficient to show that his individual need requires the remedy for which he asks. The bill is wholly destitute of any sufficient ground for injunction and unless we are to ignore settled principles governing equitable relief, the decree must be affirmed.

We conclude, therefore, that the Court has undoubted power in these cases to enter such decrees as it determines will be most effective and just in relation to the interests, private and public, affected by its decision.

Virginia, 6 Wheat, 264, 399. And see Armour & Co. v. Wantock, 323 U. S. 126, 132–133.

V

IF THE COURT HOLDS THAT RACIAL SEGREGATION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL, IT SHOULD REMAND THESE CASES TO THE LOWER COURTS WITH DIRECTIONS TO CARRY OUT THIS COURT'S DECISION AS SPEEDILY AS THE PARTICULAR CIRCUMSTANCES PERMIT

Question 5 is:

> On the assumption on which questions 4 (a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4 (b),[60]
>
> (a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;
>
> (b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;
>
> (c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

---

[60] Question 4 reads as follows:

"4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

"(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

"(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

This question is predicated on three assumptions: (1) that the Court will hold that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional; (2) that it can permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated school systems to ones not based on color distinctions; and (3) that the Court will exercise its equity powers to that end. The question which remains to be considered, therefore, is how the decrees in the present cases should be framed so as to give effective force to the Court's ruling on the constitutional question and at the same time to permit orderly solution of the problems which may arise in eliminating existing racial segregation in public schools.

In this concluding section of the brief, we discuss (a) the difficulties which may be met in carrying out transition to nonsegregated school systems, and (b) the various factors which appear to be relevant in framing the decrees in the cases at bar.

A. Obstacles to Integration. In carrying out an adjustment from existing segregated school systems to new ones not based on color distinctions, the difficulties likely to be encountered fall into two groups: (1) those of an administrative nature; (2) those deriving from the fact that racial segregation in public schools has been in existence for many years in a large part of the country.

1. It is not difficult to envisage some of the kinds of administrative problems which may arise in giving effect to a holding that separate school systems are unconstitutional. Such a decision will necessarily result in invalidation of provisions of constitutions, statutes, and administrative regulations in many states. In many areas existing boundaries of school districts may require extensive revision. School authorities may wish to give pupils a choice of attending one of several schools, a choice now prohibited. Schools may have to be consolidated, teachers and pupils transferred, teaching schedules revised, and transportation arrangements altered. In jurisdictions (e. g., South Carolina, District of Columbia) where by statute the allocation of public school funds depends on the relative number of Negro and white children of school age, changes in the law may be required.[61] In some jurisdictions (e. g., District of Columbia, Maryland) it may be necessary to eliminate duplication of functions arising from the existence of separate sets of supervisory and administration officials for white and Negro schools.[62] In states (e. g., Mississippi, Texas) which have statutory provisions for separate training schools for Negro teachers, the law may require amendment.[63]

[61] South Carolina Code (1952), §§ 21-251, 21-290; D. C. Code (1951 ed.), §§ 31-1110, 31-1112.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It is not unlikely that in many communities, particularly where separate white and colored residential districts still exist, abolition of segregation would produce no serious dislocations, and no wholesale transfers of teachers or pupils would occur. This could result from purely geographical factors, because the pupils of a school ordinarily reflect the composition of the population of the district in which it is located. The extent of the administrative and legal changes required will thus vary in the different jurisdictions involved, depending on these and other factors which now cannot be evaluated or measured. Accordingly, it is impossible to determine at this time what specific period of time would be required to overcome the administrative obstacles to school integration in any particular area.

In this connection it should be noted that financial cost, which would play so large a role in any program for "equalization" of separate schools, [62] D. C. Code (1951 ed.), §§ 31–670, 31–671; Anno. Code of Maryland (Flack ed., 1951), Art. 77, §§ 42 (4), 208.

[63] Mississippi Code (1942 ed.), Art. 15, §§ 6808–6811; Vernon's Texas Civil Statutes, title 49, ch. 8.

furnishes no substantial obstacle to integration. As the Attorney General of Virginia stated in his brief on the merits filed last term in No. 4 (p. 21), "It is crystal clear that segregation is more expensive than amalgamation." It has been estimated that a capital outlay of as much as 2 billion dollars might be required in order to make the separate public schools for Negroes "equal", in a physical sense, to those now maintained for white pupils. On the basis of the 1949–50 level of per capita current expenditure for Negro pupils in the separate school areas, it has been estimated that it would take an additional $134,824,000 to bring the Negro expenditure up to that for the white pupils, an increase of almost 70 per cent. To raise the cost of transporting Negro pupils at the 1949–50 level to a par with that of transporting white pupils would entail an additional $55,574,582.[64]

An additional economic consideration favoring integration results from recent changes in the number and relative proportion of Negroes in the areas which maintain separate public schools for colored children. During the last decade there have been significant changes in the distribution [64] These estimates have been made by the Office of Education, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, on the basis of data contained in Statistics of State School Systems 1949–1950, being chapter 2 of the Biennial Survey of Education in the United States (1948–1950), published by the Office of Education, and in the article School Building Unit Costs about to be published in School Life, an organ of the Office of Education.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

of the Negro population of the country.[65] There has occurred a significant shift of Negroes from the Southern to the Northern, Central, and Western States. A decline in the number and proportion of Negroes in the population has taken place in West Virginia, Georgia, Kentucky, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Oklahoma. The Middle Atlantic, East North Central, and Pacific States had the most appreciable increases in their Negro population, and the percentage increases for Negroes far exceeded those of the white population.[66]

The financial burden of maintaining "separate but equal" public schools becomes increasingly onerous and unjustifiable as the Negro population in a particular area decreases. A community re-

[65] See S. Doc. No. 14, 83d Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 4–8.

[66] Ibid. The following table taken from data published by the Bureau of the Census shows the changes in Negro population in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia:

	1940		1950
	Non-whites	Percent non-white	Non-whites	Percent non-white
Delaware	35,977	13.5	44,207	13.9
Maryland	302,763	16.6	388,014	16.6
District of Columbia	188,765	28.5	284,031	35.4
Virginia	662,190	24.7	737,038	22.2
West Virginia	117,872	6.2	115,268	5.7
North Carolina	1,003,988	28.1	1,078,819	26.6
South Carolina	815,496	42.9	823,624	38.9
Georgia	1,085,445	34.7	1,064,005	30.9
Florida	515,428	27.2	605,258	21.8
Kentucky	214,202	7.5	202,876	6.9
Tennessee	508,035	17.5	631,468	16.1
Alabama	983,864	34.7	982,243	32.1
Mississippi	1,077,469	49.3	990,485	45.5
Arkansas	483,303	24.8	428,003	22.4
Louisiana	852,141	36.0	886,968	33.1
Oklahoma	232,266	9.9	200,796	9.0
Texas	927,279	14.5	984,963	12.8
Missouri	245,477	6.5	299,066	7.6

quired to support for a handful of Negro children a separate school which must be physically equal in all respects to the schools it operates for white children is, from a purely economic standpoint, obviously not receiving the most for the money it expends for the education of its children. The same money, if expended for integrated schools, would result in greater educational benefits for both white and colored children. These economic considerations alone go far to indicate the relative feasibility of integration as a practical alternative to "equalization".

2. Some Southern leaders have expressed the view that considerable popular opposition will be met in the execution of any program for integration of public schools. In their opinion, separation of the races in the public schools is one of the ways of life in the South (see the finding of the district court in No. 4, R. 620). They predict that popular antagonism to elimination of segregation in public schools, arising from a traditional hostility to the mingling of the races, will most likely be reflected in withdrawal of state aid for those schools (see, e. g., the testimony of Dr. Colgate W. Darden, R. 452, No. 4). On the other hand, the conviction has been expressed that these fears are exaggerated and unjustified, and that there is no reason to assume that, once this Court has authoritatively resolved the constitutional question, the people of the entire country, including the South, will not abide by its decision (see e. g., R. 197–198, No. 4).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

We believe it would be futile and irrelevant to enter into such speculation. Recent years have witnessed, on a fairly large scale, an ever-increasing trend towards the elimination of racial segregation and discrimination in all fields and in every part of the country. In almost every instance this progress has been accomplished without disorder or friction. Traditional attitudes on racial relations are in process of constant revision, particularly in the South. As illustrative, we shall here describe (a) New Jersey's successful experience in integrating segregated public schools in the past few years and (b) the notable achievements of the Armed Forces of the United States in carrying out a program of racial integration.[67]

New Jersey.—Following the adoption in 1947 of a state constitution expressly forbidding racial segregation in the public schools of the state, a program for elimination of segregated schools was put into operation. A survey disclosed that there were 43 school districts in New Jersey which had one or more separate Negro schools. These were located in urban areas, agricultural townships, and in some relatively well-to-do suburban communities. Practically all the school officials and a majority of the school board members concerned did not oppose the program of racial integration of pupils.

[67] The materials cited in the following portion of the brief were collected by Dr. Ambrose Caliver, Assistant to the Commissioner of Education, Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Since many of the communities involved had individual problems, no single formula could be applied. In a number of districts the existing small Negro schools were closed; in others new consolidated schools were built. In several communities the Negro elementary schools were converted into intermediate or junior high schools. In the larger towns and cities, school districts were rezoned and transfer regulations adopted that required all pupils to attend the schools nearest their homes.

Varying techniques were used for placing white children under colored teachers for the first time. One device used was as follows: where there were two classes of the same grade in a particular school, one class was given a white teacher, the other, a colored teacher, and a class which had a white teacher in the first grade was given a colored teacher in the second grade and a white teacher in the third grade, and so on. Many communities, however, merely placed colored teachers in the same grades in the new system that they had been teaching in the colored schools, and this appeared to work just as effectively.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Some school boards made a single formal public announcement that the schools under their jurisdiction would be integrated; in other districts public meetings were sponsored by the boards after plans for integration had been formulated and approved. In one community a plan for integration over a two-year period was adopted with the approval of Negro parents. During the first year the superintendent of schools conducted public meetings, and integration was completed by the end of that year.

One of the fears anticipated in many communities was withdrawal of pupils from the public schools and their transfer to parochial or private schools. This, however, did not eventuate. In one community where a few children were withdrawn, most of them later reentered the school. Parents who objected to having their children placed under Negro teachers were requested by school officials to give the new system a chance. Most of the protests evaporated.

The program was also successfully carried out in areas where public opposition might have been expected to present a difficult problem. For example, in Salem, which is in the southern part of the state and directly across the river from Delaware, many of the residents were raised and educated in the traditions of the South. Salem had three schools, two for white children and one for colored children. The latter constituted approximately one-third of the total enrollment.

All three schools were integrated; one of them with a colored principal in charge of five white teachers. The school superintendent reported that this was accomplished without incident or friction.

By September 1951, 40 of the 43 school districts involved in the New Jersey program were completely integrated and the remaining three districts had taken substantial steps towards integration. The state official in charge of the program summarized the New Jersey experience as follows:

> While New Jersey cannot furnish any one formula, it can testify that complete integration in the public schools can and will work. It may even be safe to say once more, that the way to learn to do a thing is to do it, and in this respect, New Jersey has proven again that the best way to integrate is to do it.[68]

---

[68] Bustard, The New Jersey Story: The Development of Racially Integrated Public Schools, 21 Journ. of Negro Education 275, 285 (1952). Other areas where public school systems have successfully been integrated include Indianapolis, Indiana, Topeka, Kansas, and Tucson, Arizona. In the District of Columbia a program of racial integration is under way in the Catholic elementary and secondary schools. The Department of Defense has recently announced that it has set the fall of 1955 as its target date for eliminating racial segregation in state-operated schools located on federal military installations. (New York Times, Aug. 24, 1953, p. 21.)

In the field of higher education, many Southern colleges and universities have opened their doors to Negro students. There are at least 17 public institutions of higher learning

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Armed Forces.—Racial integration on a large scale has been successfully achieved in the Armed Forces. The program for elimination of racial segregation and discrimination in the Armed Forces had its origin in Executive Order No. 9981 of July 26, 1948 (13 F. R. 4313).[69] The order established the policy "that there shall be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed forces without regard to race, color, religion, or national origin." The President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Forces, which was charged with the task of seeing that the policy was implemented effectively, found in its report of May 22, 1950, "Freedom to Serve," that in 12 Southern states which now have Negro students. Negroes have been admitted to 38 private institutions of higher education located in the South and the District of Columbia.

[69] Executive Order 9980 of July 26, 1948, 13 F. R. 4311, declared it to be the policy of the Federal Government that all personnel actions were to be taken without discrimination on account of race, color, religion or national origin. See also 5 C. F. R. 410.1–7 (1952 Supp.) for the regulations implementing this policy. Since 1941, it has been the policy of the Federal Government that there shall be no racial discrimination in employment by Government contractors or subcontractors. See Executive Order 9346 of May 27, 1943, 8 F. R. 7183, and Executive Order 10479 of August 15, 1953, 18 F. R. 4899, for enforcement provisions. Since 1938 public parks and recreational facilities under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior have been operated on a non-segregration basis. This policy has been uniformly successful, and there have been no untoward incidents of racial friction.

broad programs for racial integration adopted by the Navy and the Air Force had been successfully carried out without animosity or incident. The following conclusions of the Committee are significant (Rept. 44):

> Integration of the two races at work, in school, and in living quarters did not present insurmountable difficulties. As a matter of fact, integration in two of the services [the Navy and Air Force] had brought a decrease in racial friction.
>
> The enlisted men were far more ready for integration than the officers had believed.
>
> The attitude of command was a substantial factor in the success of the racial policies of the Air Force and the Navy.

In a recent interview, Dr. John A. Hannah, Assistant Secretary of Defense, stated that "remarkable progress" had been made in the program for ending racial segregation in the Armed Forces and that "In eight months there will be no nonintegrated units in the Army". Dr. Hannah also reported that "Universally the answer from our commanders is that it is desirable and works out very well in spite of contrary predictions," and that there had been no resistance, violence, or demonstrations. (U. S. News & World Report, October 16, 1953, pp. 46, 99.) The success of integration in the Armed Forces furnishes strong evidence of the feasibility of integration in other fields, such as public schools, where contacts are less intimate and constant.[70]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

[70] Other successful experiences have been reported in such fields as industry and labor, housing, the professions, and sports. Both the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations have consistently opposed racial discriminations. In industry, racial differentiations have tended to become less significant. For an account of the successful experience of the International Harvester Company in its plants in Evansville, Louisville, and Memphis, see Selected Studies of Negro Employment in the South: 3 Southern Plants of International Harvester Company (National Planning Association, 1953). The techniques utilized in those plants are said to have involved "a mixture of persuasion, education, and some judiciously applied coersion." (Id., p. 50.)

The Federal Housing and Home Finance Agency has reported that racial integration has been on the whole entirely satisfactory in 268 public housing projects located in the District of Columbia and in 71 other communities. See Open Occupancy in Public Housing (Housing and Home Finance Agency, Public Housing Administration, 1953). Since the ruling by this Court in 1948 that judicial enforcement of racial restrictive covenants is forbidden by the Constitution, Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, there has been a growing and substantial dispersal of Negroes throughout residential areas. This has been accompanied by practically no friction or disorder. See the survey conducted by the United Press and reported in the New York Times, January 22, 1951, p. 19; "The People of Chicago," Report of the Chicago Commission on Human Relations for the 5-year period 1947–1951; Report of the Toledo Board of Community Relations, 1951; "The Transitional Housing Area", report of the Director of the Mayor's Interracial Committee in the city of Detroit (1952).

In recent years a number of Southern law schools and medical colleges have relaxed their restrictions against the admission of Negroes. In 1950 the American Medical Association adopted a resolution, reaffirmed in 1952, declaring its

B. The decrees. On the basis of the foregoing, the considerations which appear to be relevant to the framing of the decrees in the present cases may briefly be summarized as follows:

1. The constitutional right involved in these cases is "personal and present." The plaintiffs can forcefully argue that the only remedy adequate to redress the existing, continuing violation of their constitutional rights is to direct their admission to nonsegregated schools now and not at some future date when such relief would come, at least for some of them, too late to have any benefits. In the absence of compelling reasons to the contrary, vindication of constitutional rights should be as prompt and effective as is possible in the circumstances.

2. On the other hand, the effects of a decision holding school segregation to be unconstitutional would not be limited to the areas and parties involved in the cases at bar. Such a decision would have national significance and consequences. As a binding precedent, the Court's decision would entail revision of school laws and procedures in policy to be against racial qualifications in the admission of physicians to its constituent societies. At the present time Negro doctors have been admitted to 27 constituent societies, located in southern and border states, which had formerly barred Negroes.

---

The field of professional sports evidences a striking change in racial attitudes. Negroes are now common in the ranks of the professional baseball and football teams. See, generally, The Integration of the Negro into American Society (Howard University Press, 1951).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

at least seventeen states and the District of Columbia. Administrative and other obstacles will have to be overcome in order to accomplish complete transition to nonsegregated systems. The nature and extent of such problems will vary throughout the country, and the time required for eliminating school segregation in any particular community will depend on numerous factors which neither this Court nor counsel can now evaluate. Regardless whether this Court should direct that school integration be carried out "forthwith" or "gradually", a brief period of time should be allowed for making necessary administrative adjustments.

3. In some places (such as the District of Columbia, Kansas and Delaware) change-over to a nonsegregated system should be a relatively simple matter, requiring perhaps only a few months to accomplish. In such areas, where there are no serious administrative or other impediments to integration, there can plainly be no valid justification for delay in ending exclusion of colored children from schools which they would otherwise be entitled to attend. In other areas, a longer period of time may be needed, depending on local conditions.

4. Despite a decision by this Court that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional, there will still remain many areas in which, as a practical matter, the schools will be attended by at least a preponderance of children of one color. This could arise from purely geographical factors, even though there is full compliance with the letter and spirit of the decision. There are numerous communities characterized by exclusively Negro or white occupancy of particular residential sections. Even under normal school districting drawn on a wholly geographical and nonracial basis, the pupils of a public school in a district reflect the racial composition of its population. It may reasonably be assumed that this factor alone will have considerable effect in many areas in reducing the extent of the adjustments required by a decision prohibiting racial segregation in public schools.

5. There is no single formula or blueprint which can be uniformly applied in all areas where existing school segregation must be ended. Local conditions vary, and what would be effective and practicable in the District of Columbia, for example, could be inappropriate in Clarendon County, South Carolina. Only a pragmatic approach based on a knowledge of local conditions and problems can determine what is best in a particular place. For this reason, the court of first instance in such area should be charged with the responsibility for supervision of a program for carrying out the Court's decision. This Court should not, either itself or through appointment of a special master, undertake to formulate specific and detailed programs of implementation adapted to the special needs of particular cases.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

6. The burden of (a) showing that, in the particular circumstances, a decree requiring the immediate admission of the plaintiffs to nonsegregated schools would be impracticable or inequitable, and, in that event, of (b) proposing, for the court's approval, an effective program for accomplishing transition to a nonsegregated system as soon as practicable, should rest on the defendants. As the responsible authorities in charge of the public schools, they would be in the best position to develop a program most suited to local conditions and needs, and to indicate the length of time required to put it into effect. In passing upon such a program, the lower court could receive the views not only of the parties but of interested persons and groups in the community. Such a locally-developed program for orderly and progressive transition to nonsegregation would tend to encounter less resistance and thus be more likely to achieve success.

As has previously been noted (pp. 160–162, supra), the decree entered by this Court in United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, furnishes a useful precedent and guide to the disposition of the present cases. Adapting the provisions of that decree to the circumstances here involved, the Government respectfully suggests to the Court that, if it holds school segregation to be unconstitutional, the public interest would be served by entering decrees in the instant cases providing in substance as follows:

(1) That racial segregation in public schools be decreed by this Court to be a violation of rights secured by the Constitution;

(2) That each case be remanded to the appropriate court of first instance for such further proceedings and orders as are necessary and proper to carry out the Court's decision;

(3) That the lower courts be directed on remand to enter decrees under which the defendants shall forthwith be enjoined from using race or color as a basis for determining admission of children to public schools under their authority or control; provided, however, that if the defendants show that it is impracticable or inequitable to grant the plaintiffs the remedy of immediate (i. e., at the beginning of the next school term) admission to nonsegregated schools, the court shall order the defendants to propose and, on approval by the court after a public hearing, to put into effective operation a program for transition to a nonsegregated school system as expeditiously as the circumstances permit;

(4) That for the accomplishment of these purposes, taking into view the difficulties which may be encountered, a period of one year be allowed from the receipt of this Court's mandate, with leave, however, in the event, in the judgment of the lower court, the necessities of the situation so require, to extend such period for a further reasonable time; and that, in the event before the expiration of the period thus fixed, a condition in harmony with the requirements of the Constitution is not brought about, it shall be the duty of the lower court to enter appropriate orders, by way of injunction or otherwise, directing immediate admission of the plaintiffs to nonsegregated schools; and

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(5) That this Court retain jurisdiction for the purpose of making such further orders and decrees, if any, as may become necessary for carrying out its mandate.

CONCLUSION

In response to the questions stated in the Court's order directing reargument of these cases, the United States respectfully submits (1) that the primary and pervasive purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment, as is shown by its history and as has repeatedly been declared by this Court, was to secure for Negroes full and complete equality before the law and to abolish all legal distinctions based on race or color; (2) that the legislative history of the Amendment in Congress is not conclusive; (3) that the available materials relating to the ratification proceedings in the various state legislatures are too scanty and incomplete, and the specific references to school segregation too few and scattered, to justify any definite conclusion as to the existence of a general understanding in such legislatures as to the effect which the Amendment would have on school segregation; (4) that it is within the judicial power to direct such relief as will be effective and just in eliminating existing segregated school systems; and (5) that if the Court holds that laws providing for separate public schools for white and colored children are unconstitutional, it should remand the instant cases to the lower courts with directions to carry out the Court's decision as expeditiously as the particular circumstances permit, as indicated supra.

Respectfully submitted.

HERBERT BROWNELL, JR.,
Attorney General.

J. LEE RANKIN,
Assistant Attorney General.

PHILIP ELMAN,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

LEON ULMAN,
WILLIAM J. LAMONT,
DAVID O. WALTER,
M. MAGDALENA SCHOCH,
JOSEPH A. MULLIN,
JOHN J. COUND,
*Attorneys.

NOVEMBER 1953.

---

*Reginald W. Barnes and Arthur L. Biggins, attorneys in the Department of Justice, also assisted in the historical research.

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1953

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
I. The Federal Materials	1
A. The Thirteenth Amendment	1
B. The Freedmen's Bureau Bill	20
1. The Wilson bill (S. 9)	20
2. The Schurz Report	24
3. The Freedmen's Bureau bill (S. 60)	26
C. Civil Rights Act of 1866	40
D. The Fourteenth Amendment	74
1. The Stevens "Apportionment" Amendment	75
2. The Bingham "Equal Rights" Amendment	83
3. The Fourteenth Amendment	92
E. The Readmission of the Southern States	111
1. Congressional debates in 1868	113
a. Alabama	113
b. Arkansas	116
c. The omnibus bill	124
2. Congressional debates in 1870	128
a. Virginia	128
b. Mississippi	135
c. Texas	137
d. Georgia	138
F. Civil Rights Act of 1875	139
41st Congress, 2d Session (Dec. 1869–July 1870)	139
41st Congress, 3d Session (Dec. 1870–March 1871)	140
42d Congress, 1st Session (March 1871–April 1871)	140
42d Congress, 2d Session (Dec. 1871–June 1872)	140
(1) Senate:
(a) The first Amnesty bill	141
(b) The second Amnesty bill	144
(c) The Sumner bill (S. 99)	147
(2) The House	147
42d Congress, 3d Session (Dec. 1872–March 1873)	148
43d Congress, 1st Session (Dec. 1873–June 1874)	148
(1) Senate	148
(2) House	152
(a) S. 1	152
(b) H. R. 796	153
43d Congress, 2d Session (Dec. 1874–March 1875)	155

281209—53——1

	Page
II. The State Materials	160
Introductory note	160
Alabama	161
Arkansas	166
California	177
Connecticut	182
Delaware	185
Florida	188
Georgia	198
Illinois	204
Indiana	212
Iowa	224
Kansas	228
Kentucky	237
Louisiana	242
Maine	251
Maryland	252
Massachusetts	263
Michigan	274
Minnesota	277
Mississippi	280
Missouri	287
Nebraska	292
Nevada	296
New Hampshire	303
New Jersey	305
New York	310
North Carolina	316
Ohio	323
Oregon	334
Pennsylvania	337
Rhode Island	351
South Carolina	352
Tennessee	363
Texas	368
Vermont	379
Virginia	381
West Virginia	387
Wisconsin	390

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

APPENDIX

I. The Federal Materials

A. THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT

The Thirteenth Amendment originated in S. J. Res. 16, introduced by Senator Henderson of Missouri on January 11, 1864.[1] It was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which Senator Lyman Trumbull of Illinois was chairman (Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 145).[2] The resolution was reported by Trumbull on February 10, 1864

[1] The text of the resolution was as follows:

> Art. 1. Slavery or involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime, shall not exist in the United States.
>
> Art. 2. The Congress, whenever a majority of the members elected to each House shall deem it necessary, may propose amendments to the Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of a majority of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, or by conventions in two thirds thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress (Globe, 38th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 1313).

[2] All references to the Congressional Globe in this section, until otherwise noted, are to the 38th Congress, 1st Session.

(Globe, p. 553), in an amended form.[3] Consideration was postponed until March 28, 1864. At that time Senator Trumbull opened the debate, stating that the measure was intended to remove from the Constitution the inconsistency of the founding fathers in proclaiming the equal rights of all persons to life, liberty and happiness, while denying these rights to a whole race. This was to be accomplished by a constitutional provision abolishing the institution of slavery and all its incidents (Globe, p. 1313). Senator Wilson of Massachusetts described the incidents of slavery which would be removed:

> If this amendment shall be incorporated by the will of the nation into the Constitution of the United States, it will obliterate the last lingering vestiges of the slave system; its chattelizing, degrading and bloody codes; its dark, malignant, barbarizing spirit * * *

---

[3] The amended form, which was the one finally adopted, read as follows:

> (Two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, namely:
>
> ARTICLE XIII
>
> SEC. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.
>
> SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation (Globe, p. 1313).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> * * * Then the slave mart, pen, and auction-block, with their clanking fetters for human limbs, will disappear from the land they have brutalized, and the schoolhouse will rise to enlighten the darkened intellect of a race imbruted by long years of enforced ignorance. Then the sacred rights of human nature, the hallowed family relations of husband and wife, parent and child, will be protected by the guardian spirit of that law which makes sacred alike the proud homes and lowly cabins of freedom. * * * Then the wronged victim of the slave system, the poor white man, the sand-hiller, the clay-eater of the wasted fields of Carolina, impoverished, debased, dishonored by the system that makes toil a badge of disgrace, and the instruction of the brain and soul of man a crime, will lift his abashed forehead to the skies and begin to run the race of improvement, progress, and elevation. Globe, p. 1324.)

On March 30, 1864, the debate continued. Senator Davis of Kentucky, speaking against the amendment, argued that slavery had not caused the war, and that its abolition by federal action would be a serious violation of state sovereignty, and would have a "potency * * * for large and permanent mischief" (Globe, Appendix, pp. 104, 108). On the following day, March 31, he offered an amendment that no Negro could ever hold citizenship or public office in the United States. This was defeated overwhelmingly by a vote of 28 to 6. (Globe, p. 1370.) On that day, Senators Saulsbury of Delaware and Clark of New Hampshire engaged in an extended debate over the constitutional authority of Congress to propose an amendment at a time when several of the states were out of the Union. (Globe, pp. 1364–1370.)

On April 4, Senator Howe of Wisconsin spoke in favor of the joint resolution. (Globe, Appendix, p. 111.) He pointed to the many degrading economic, moral and intellectual effects of the slave system. His speech concluded:

> I think your amendment should go further than as I understand it does. I think that when the American people command that these persons shall be free, they should command that they be educated, or at least that there be no laws enacted in any State to prevent their education * * * the state which enfranchises its people and does not educate them shall be doubly damned. * * *. (Globe, Appendix, p. 118.)

On April 5, 1864, Senator Reverdy Johnson of Maryland declared that the proposed amendment was proper and necessary. "The only practical mischief of the measure is the condition of the slaves. They are uneducated." (Globe, p. 1424.) That ignorance, he asserted, was deliberate, for education would have meant revolt against the "wicked" institution of slavery. (Ibid.). On the same day, Senators Davis and Powell of Kentucky each offered amendments imposing conditions upon the emancipation of the slaves. All these amendments were defeated. (Globe, pp. 1424–1425.)

Senator Harlan of Iowa reviewed the incidents of slavery in a speech on April 6, 1864. (Globe, p. 1437.) He pointed out that slavery necessarily resulted in the abolition of the relation between husband and wife and parent and child; it precluded the relation of person to property, because a slave was declared incapable of acquiring and holding property; it deprived slaves of status in court, and of the right to testify. Nor were the effects of slavery harmful only to the slaves:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> And then another incident of this institution is the suppression of the freedom of speech and of the press, not only among these down-trodden people themselves but among the white race. Slavery cannot exist where its merits can be freely discussed; hence in the slave States it becomes a crime to discuss its claims for protection or the wisdom of its continuance. Its continuance also requires the perpetuity of the ignorance of its victims. It is therefore made a felony to teach slaves to read and write.
>
> It also precludes the practical possibility of maintaining schools for the education of those of the white race who have not the means to provide for their own mental culture. It consequently degrades the white as well as African race. (Globe, p. 1439.)

Senator Saulsbury rose to rebut Harlan. Quoting Biblical authorities, he stated that slavery had existed almost since the flood, and was a fact of nature:

> The theory now common seems to be that the law of God's providence is equality and uniformity. Such a law never did pervade or regulate the works of God's providence to man; but the law of His providence is inequality and diversity. I treat of this inequality of races, of human beings, precisely as I treat of the inequality which I see in inanimate and physical nature all around me. (Globe, p. 1442.)

Senator Saulsbury concluded, therefore, that the Congress should leave the institution of slavery as it was, and not tamper with the will of God. (Ibid.) However, after some further debate, the Committee of the Whole agreed to the Judiciary Committee amendment. (Globe, p. 1447.)

On April 7, 1864, Senator Hendricks of Indiana echoed Saulsbury's views of the natural inferiority of the Negro race. No constitutional amendment could change that, for > * * * they will never associate with the white people of this country upon terms of equality. It may be preached; it may be legislated for; it may be prayed for; but there is that difference between the two races that renders it impossible. If they are among us as a free people, they are among us as an inferior people. (Globe, p. 1457.)

Then Senator Henderson, author of the resolution, spoke for its passage. It must be done, he said, to save the Union. He also said:

> I will not be intimidated by the fears of negro equality. The negro may possess mental qualities entitling him to a position beyond our present belief. If so, I shall put no obstacle in the way of his elevation. * * * Whether he shall be a citizen of any one of the States is a question for that State to determine. If New York or Massachusetts or Louisiana shall confer on him the elective franchise, it is a matter of policy with which I have nothing to do. The qualifications of voters for members of Congress is a question under the exclusive control of the respective States. * * * So in passing this amendment we do not confer > upon the negro the right to vote. We give him no right except his freedom, and leave the rest to the States. (Globe, p. 1465.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On April 8, 1864, the last day of the Senate debate, Senator Charles Sumner took the floor to speak in favor of the Constitutional amendment. It would give completeness and permanence to emancipation, and bring the Constitution into avowed harmony with the Declaration of Independence. However, he preferred that it be phrased differently. He offered the following substitute:

> All persons are equal before the law, so that no person can hold another as a slave; and the Congress may make all laws necessary and proper to carry this article into effect everywhere within the United States and the jurisdiction thereof. (Globe, p. 1843).[4]

Sumner disclaimed any intention of changing the effect of the original resolution; he only wished to express its purpose more forcefully, by explicitly stating the doctrine of equality before the law. He believed that that expression gave precision to the principle of protecting human rights enunciated in the Declaration of Independence. Acknowledging that the language was new in this country, he pointed out that it was already well known in France, and all of Europe, as an overriding principle of human rights. (Ibid.)

---

[4] This amendment in the nature of a substitute was originally offered on February 17, 1864, but had not been discussed prior to this time. (Globe, p. 694.) Sumner had also offered a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 24) on February 8, 1864 (Globe, p. 521), to the same effect.

However, when Senator Trumbull insisted on the Committee version, Sumner withdrew his amendment. Remarking on this decision, Senator Howard of Michigan stated that the Committee version was derived from the "revered" Jeffersonian Ordinance of 1787, whereas Sumner's amendment was of foreign origin. (Globe, p. 1489.) To Senator Howard, the "equality" language might mean that

> A wife would be equal to her husband and as free as her husband before the law. (Globe, p. 1488.)

Senators Davis, Saulsbury and McDougall of California delivered final speeches against the resolution. Saulsbury offered a lenthy substitute amendment, but it was rejected. The final vote was then taken, resulting in passage of the resolution by a vote of 38 to 6. (Globe, p. 1490.)

In the House, the proceedings were more extended. When the resolution was taken up on May 31, 1864, an immediate motion by Representative Holman of Indiana for rejection was defeated by a vote of 76 to 55. (Globe, p. 2612.) Representative Morris of New York then opened the debate, citing the evils of slavery which had led the country away from the principles of equality embodied in the Declaration of Independence. In his opinion, the amendment was necessary to conform the Constitution to those principles. (Globe, p. 2613.) At an evening session that day, Representative Herrick, also from New York, attacked the amendment as a tampering with the Constitution of the fathers which would promote "eternal disunion." (Globe, p. 2615.) Furthermore,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

it would abolish "the right of the States to control their domestic affairs, and to fix each for itself the status, not only of the negro, but of all other people who dwell within their borders." (Globe, p. 2616.) After a speech by another New Yorker, Representative Kellogg, which is of no significance here, the House adjourned. (Globe, p. 2621.)

After a series of postponements caused by the absence of the many members attending the Republican (Union) presidential convention, which had opened on June 7th, the House resumed consideration of the proposed amendment on June 14, 1864. Representative Pruyn, Wood and Kalbfleisch, all of New York, argued that the amendment was an invasion of the reserved rights of the States. (Globe, pp. 2939, 2940, 2945.) On the other side, Representative Higby of California denied that there was no power under the Constitution to amend it in this respect. (Globe, p. 2943.)

In an evening session that day, Mr. Wheeler of Wisconsin offered a proviso to the amendment, that emancipation should not take place in the loyal border states until ten years after ratification. (Globe, Appendix, p. 124.)[5] Representative Shannon of California declared that slavery was inconsistent with the spirit of the institutions of the nation. Not only the slave, but also the non-slaveholding class of white men was harmed by its evils. He noted that

---

[5] On June 15, 1864, just before the final vote was taken on the resolution, Wheeler's amendment was defeated. (Globe, p. 2995.)

> This institution necessarily establishes three conditions of society where it prevails: the master, the slave, and that most degraded condition of all, the middle-man, or the poor white trash, whose vocation is pander and pimp to the vices of both master and slave, and ultimately dependent on both, having no recognized condition, and enjoying none of the privileges of the governing or governed class, but an outcast from both and despised by both.
>
> Now let it never be forgotten that our mission also is to elevate and disinthrall that most injured and dependent class of our fellow white men from their downtrodden and degraded condition, that they too may be men, and enjoy the independence and rights of manhood. (Globe, p. 2948.)

Mr. Shannon concluded with an argument against Wheeler's proviso, insisting that Congress "must not only emancipate the slaves in the seceded States, but we must include the slaves of the border States, leaving no root of the accursed tree to spring up for the future to the peril of the country." (Globe, p. 2949.)

Mr. Marcy of New Hampshire, speaking against emancipation, stated that the resolution was an attempt to overthrow the Constitution, and declared that his constituents did not believe "the black man is equal to the white." (Globe, p. 2950.) However, the "conservative party" will win the impending election and "the Government instituted for white men will again become popular." (Globe, p. 2951.)

Representative Kellogg of Michigan believed that the words "all men are created equal" in the Declaration of Independence were implicit in the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Constitution, and that the proposed amendment merely carried out their purpose. (Globe, p. 2954.)

Representative Ross of Illinois indicated his belief that the amendment was part of the administration's policy to "place the negro as to civil and political rights on an equality with the whites * * *" (Globe, p. 2957.) This was the "negro-equality doctrine tendered by the party in power." (Globe, p. 2959.) Mr. Holman of Indiana was also against freeing the Negro, characterizing the amendment as an invasion of "the domestic policies of States so solemnly guarantied by the Constitution." (Globe, p. 2961.) He presented his interpretation of its scope:

> It confers on Congress the power to invade any State to enforce the freedom of the African in war or peace. What is the meaning of all that? Is freedom the simple exemption from personal servitude? No, sir; in the language of America it means the right to participate in government, the freedom for which our fathers resisted the British empire. Mere exemption from servitude is a miserable idea of freedom. A pariah in the State, a subject, but not a citizen, holding any right at the will of the governing power. What is this but slavery? It exists in my own noble state. (Globe, p. 2962.)

On June 15, 1864, the last day of House debate on the amendment, Representative Farnsworth of Illinois deprecated the opposition fears of Negro equality and miscegenation. (Globe, p. 2979.) Mr. Mallory of Kentucky asserted that passage of the amendment would lead the states to abject submission and slavery:

> Give up our right to have slavery if we choose, submit to have that right wrested from us, and in what right are we secure? One after another will be usurped by the President and Congress, until all State rights will be gone, and perhaps State limits obliterated, and a grand imperial despotism erected on the ruins of our rights and liberties. (Globe, p. 2981.)

Mr. Edgerton of Indiana charged that the object, in part, of the party in power was, by means of this proposed amendment, to make the Negro population of the South an active basis for representation in the Federal Government. He declared:

> First, the negro a citizen of the United States; secondly, the negro a free citizen of the United States, protected everywhere, in defiance of existing State constitutions and laws, as such citizen; and thirdly, the negro a voting citizen of the United States, are all propositions logically involved in the proposed amendment. (Globe, p. 2987.)

His speech concluded with this accusation against the majority in Congress:

> You desire no peace, and you do not intend, if you can help it, to accept peace until you have abolished slavery; deprived if not robbed by confiscation the property-holders of the South of their rightful inheritance; made negroes socially and politically the equal of white men; and remodeled the Constitution to suit your own political purposes. (Globe, p. 2988.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Representative Ingersoll of Illinois, who was in favor of the amendment, gave some idea of his definition of freedom:

> I believe that the black man has certain inalienable rights, which are as sacred in the sight of Heaven as those of any other race. He has the right to live and live in a state of freedom. He has a right to breathe the free air and enjoy God's free sunshine. He has a right to till the soil, to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, and enjoy the rewards of his own labor. (Globe, p. 2990.)

However, in his view, freedom, in a broad sense, would not be given to the slave alone:

> I am in favor of the adoption of this amendment to the Constitution for the sake of the seven millions of poor white people who live in the slave States but who have ever been deprived of the blessings of manhood by reason of this thrice-accursed institution of slavery. Slavery has kept them in ignorance, in poverty, and in degradation. Abolish slavery, and school-houses will rise upon the ruins of the slave mart, intelligence will take the place of ignorance, wealth of poverty, and honor of degradation * * * (Ibid.).

A vote was taken on June 15, 1864: yeas 93, nays 65, not voting 23. Since the required two-thirds majority had not been obtained, the resolution failed. However, Congressman Ashley of Ohio, originally voting in favor of the Amendment, changed his vote for the declared purpose of enabling him, under the rules, to bring on a motion to reconsider. (Globe, p. 2995.) No further action was taken at that session of the House.

In the second session of the 38th Congress, the "lame duck" session, President Lincoln's message on the state of the Union referred to the victory of the Republican party at the polls on the antislavery issue. He recommended the reconsideration and passage of the resolution at that session, pointing out that the next Congress would almost certainly pass the measure if this one did not. (Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Session, App., p. 3.)

Representative Ashley, the floor leader for the measure in the House, opened the discussion on reconsideration on January 6, 1865, again urging that the resolution be passed, and reiterating the harmful effects of slavery upon the non-slaveholding population of the South. (Globe, 38th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 138).[6] Representative Orth of Indiana declared that an amendment prohibiting slavery in the United States would effect a practical application of the self-evident truths embodied in the Declaration of Independence. (Globe, p. 142.)

Representative Bliss of Ohio, in his speech on January 7, 1865, continued his opposition. Even the Negro had sense enough to know, he said, > * * * that politicians cannot reverse the decree of Almighty God and make their race equal, socially or politically, with white men. (Globe, p. 150.)

---

[6] The remaining references to the Congressional Globe in this section are to the 38th Congress, 2d Session.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Mr. Rogers of New Jersey denied the assertion that the amendment would have the effect of conforming our institutions to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. In his view, the Declaration had nothing to do with the slaves, for "neither the persons who had been imported as slaves nor their descendants, whether they had then become free or not, were then included in the general words of the Declaration of Independence or acknowledged as a part of the people. They had for more than a century before been regarded as an inferior race and not fit to associate with whites, socially or politically * * *" (Globe, p. 152.)

Mr. Davis of New York then rose to observe that the definition of civil liberty, as indicated in Mr. Rogers' speech, apparently consisted in the right of one people to enslave another people to whom nature had given equal rights of freedom. He declared that such was not his own interpretation:

> Nature made all men free, and entitled them to equal rights before the law; and this Government of ours must stand upon this principle, which, sooner or later, will be recognized throughout the civilized world. (Globe, p. 154.)

His speech concluded with the plea that > when we speak of civil liberty let it not be that which represents only the blood of a particular race; let it be that which represents man, no matter what land may have given him birth, no matter what may have been his political condition.

> I am not, sir, one of those who believe that the emancipation of the black race is of itself to elevate them to an equality with the white race. I believe in the distinction of races as existing in the providence of God for his wise and beneficient designs to man; but I would make every race free and equal before the law, permitting to each the elevation to which its own capacity and culture should entitle it * * *. (Globe, p. 155.)

On January 9, 1865, consideration was resumed. Congressman Yeaman of Kentucky, Morrill of Vermont and Odell of New York all spoke in favor of the Amendment. (Globe, pp. 168, 172, 174.) On the other hand, Mr. Ward of New York remained against it; he observed that > * * * we are now called upon to sanction a joint resolution to amend the Constitution so that all persons shall be equal under the law, without regard to color, and so that no person shall hereafter be held in bondage * * *

>
> Sir, it would seem to me that the sum total of the wisdom of the ruling party is contained in the dogma that the negro is exactly like the white man. (Globe, p. 177.)

Nor could Representative Mallory of Kentucky assent to such a proposition, because he foresaw its result would be to give to the Negro "an equality with the white man, socially, civilly, politically." (Globe, p. 179.) He also feared that section 2, giving Congress enforcement powers, would be used to require enfranchisement of the Negro. (Globe, p. 180.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On the following day, January 10, 1865, after remarks by various members, which repeated previous arguments (Globe, pp. 189, 193, 195, 199, 200), Congressman McBride of Oregon undertook to rebut the argument that emancipation meant enfranchisement:

> A recognition of natural rights is one thing, a grant of political franchises is quite another. * * * If political rights must necessarily follow the possession of personal liberty, then all but male citizens in our country are slaves. This illustration alone reduces the conclusion to an absurdity. Sir, let the rights and status of the negro settle themselves as they will and must upon their own just basis. If, as a race, they shall prove themselves worthy the elective franchise, I tell gentlemen they will enjoy the right; they will demand and they will win it, and they ought to have it. If, on the contrary, as a race, they are so far inferior to those with whom they must compete as to be unequal to the high and responsible position of free electors, any attempt to elevate them to that standard will be a signal failure. I have no faith in their ability to contend in the race before them successfully, and no fear of degrading my own race by contact with them, for, sir, there is an antagonism between the races which will prevent anything like a complete blending of them, and I leave all questions of the consequences of emancipation to be settled by justice and expediency as experience shall dictate. (Globe, p. 202.)

On January 13, 1865,[7] Mr. Rollins of Missouri, who had voted against the measure in the spring, now changed his vote, stating:

> I am a believer in the Declaration of Independence wherein it is asserted that "all men are created equal." I believe that when it says "all men" it means every man * * * without regard to race, color, or any other accidental circumstances by which he may be surrounded. (Globe, p. 260.)

After additional speeches in favor of the Amendment by Representatives Garfield of Ohio, Stevens of Pennsylvania[8] and Baldwin of Massachusetts (Globe, pp. 263, 265, 266), the House adjourned for the day.

Consideration of the resolution was postponed, and not resumed until January 28, 1865. On that day, the debate consisted of a number of short addresses which added little to the discussion. (Globe, pp. 478, 480, 481, 482, 485, 487.) However, in the course of one speech, Representative Patterson of New Hampshire indicated that all

---

[7] On January 12, 1865, Representatives Smith of Kentucky, Cox of Ohio, Woodbridge of Vermont, and Thayer of Pennsylvania debated the question of state rights. (Globe, pp. 235–246.) However, the discussion is not particularly relevant.

[8] This was the speech in which Thaddeus Stevens declared what he hoped would be his epitaph after his death:

> Here lies one who never rose to any eminence, and who only courted the low ambition to have it said that he had striven to ameliorate the condition of the poor, the lowly, the downtrodden of every race and language and color. (Globe, p. 266.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the previous remarks about "negro equality" were irrelevant to the discussion of the resolution. He pointed out that

> In seeking to purge our institutions of the mortal taint of slavery, in seeking to rescue our liberties by an organic change from the fatal imperium in imperio, it is not necessary to fix the ethnological position of the African or to prove his equality with the white races. (Globe, p. 484.)

When debate opened on January 31, 1865, the day on which the final vote was to be taken, Representatives McAllister and Coffroth of Pennsylvania, and Herrick of New York, who had all voted against the resolution in the first session, rose to announce that they had changed their minds and would now support the proposed amendment. (Globe, pp. 523, 524.) Congressman Brown of Wisconsin, however, remained opposed, on the ground, inter alia, that immediate emancipation > * * * utterly ignores the greatest evil of slavery; [which] extends through generations its effect in completely debasing the subject of it and making him unfit either to be a good citizen or a good man. (Globe, p. 527.)

After Mr. Ashley's pending motion to reconsider had been agreed to, the final vote was taken on the resolution. It passed by a vote of 119 to 56, slightly more than the required two-thirds, and the House immediately adjourned, "in honor of this immortal and sublime event." (Globe, p. 531.)

B. THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU BILL

The first bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau (S. 60, 39th Cong., 1st Sess.) [9] originated, in part, from an earlier bill introduced by Senator Henry Wilson to maintain the freedom of the inhabitants in the rebelling states (S. 9), and, in part, on the basis of a report by Major General Carl Schurz on conditions in the South (S. Ex. Doc. No. 2).

1. The Wilson bill (S. 9)

On December 4, 1865, the opening day of the first session of the 39th Congress, Senator Wilson of Massachusetts introduced in the Senate a bill (S. 9) providing for the nullification of all laws of the Southern States which recognized, authorized, or maintained any inequality of civil rights or immunities because of color, race or previous servitude. (Globe, pp. 2, 39.) On December 13, he moved to take up the bill without committee reference. In urging immediate adoption of his measure, Wilson noted that "whatever differences of opinion may exist in regard to the right of suffrage, I am sure there can be no difference of opinion among honest and just men in regard to maintaining the civil rights and immunities of these freedmen; they should stand at any rate like the non-voting white population of those States." (Globe, p. 39.) Wilson added that not only did the "old slave codes still exist," in many of the Southern States, but that "four or five of those States are passing other codes inhuman, un-[9] All references to bill numbers, executive documents and the Congressional Globe in this section are to the 39th Congress, 1st Session.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

christian, and inconsistent with the idea that these freedmen have rights." (Globe, p. 41.)

Senator Johnson of Maryland, although in favor of the general proposition, thought that the bill raised several serious questions. He believed, therefore, that it should be referred to committee for further study. (Globe, p. 40.) Senator Cowan of Pennsylvania expressed himself as "exceedingly desirous that by some means or other the natural rights of all people in the country shall be secured to them, no matter what their color or complexion may be, and may be secured to them in such a way as that States themselves cannot hereafter wrest them away from them." (Globe, p. 40.) However, he thought that this aim could only be attained by means of an amendment to the Constitution. (Globe, p. 41.) Senator Wilson rose to state his understanding that the Thirteenth Amendment had already been adopted,[10] and that under its second section, "we have the power to pass not only a bill that shall apply these provisions to the rebel States, but to Kentucky, to Maryland, to Delaware, and to all the loyal States." (Globe, p. 41.)

Senator Sherman of Ohio felt that the measure ought to be postponed until the amendment was finally ratified. There would then be no doubt of the power of Congress to pass the bill, and to make it definite and general in its terms, and applicable throughout the United States. However, he objected that the bill did not specify what rights were to be protected. He wished it to be more specific, for there was "scarcely a State in the Union that does not make distinctions on account of color." (Globe, p. 41.) He preferred that > when we legislate on this subject we should secure to the freedmen of the southern States certain rights, naming them, defining precisely that they should be. For instance, we could agree that every man should have the right to sue and be sued in any court of justice * * *. So with the right to testify, * * * the right to acquire and hold property, to enjoy the fruits of their own labor, to be protected in their homes and family, the right to be educated, and to go and come at pleasure. These are among the natural rights of free men." (Globe, p. 42.)

[10] This statement was made on December 13, 1865. The Thirteenth Amendment was actually declared to have been adopted on December 18, 1865, by a proclamation of the Secretary of State, 13 Stat. 774.

Senator Saulsbury of Delaware indicated his doubts that the proposals just mentioned were authorized, or even necessary. He believed that such measures could not be authorized under the second section of the Thirteenth Amendment. (Globe, p. 43.) On the other hand, Senator Trumbull of Illinois declared that that section was inserted for the very purpose "of preventing State Legislatures from enslaving, under any pretense, those whom the first clause declared should be free." (Globe, p. 43.) He thought it was idle to say that a man was free who could not go and come at pleasure, who could not buy and sell property, and who could not enforce his rights. Trumbull then gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill that would secure to the former slaves every one of those rights. (Ibid.)

On December 20, 1865, Senator Sumner of

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Massachusetts declared that the bill "proposes nothing less than to establish Equality before the Law, at least so far as civil rights are concerned, in the rebel States." (Globe, p. 91.) He referred to the emancipation of serfs in Russia as a model for imitation, cataloging the rights there granted—the rights of family, contract, and property; equality in the courts; and equality in political rights. He continued:

> By still another section the freedman is secured Equality at schools and in Education; thus:
>
> "He may place his children in the establishments for public education, to embrace the career of instruction, or the scientific career, or to take service in the corps of surveyors."
>
> Surely here again is an example for us. (Globe, p. 91.)

On the following day, December 21, 1865, Senator Stewart of Nevada opened the debate. He was against the bill, as being too radical a measure. (Globe, p. 109.) However, he avowed that he was "in favor of legislation on this subject, and such legislation as shall secure the freedom of those who were formerly slaves, and their equality before the law * * *." But, he maintained, these rights could be fully secured without holding the Southern states in subjugation. (Globe, p. 111.)

Senator Wilson rose to declare, on behalf of his bill, that the Black Codes must be annulled, so that the > man made free by the Constitution of the United States, sanctioned by the voice of the American people, is a freeman indeed; that > he can go where the pleases, work when and for whom he pleases; that he can sue and be sued; that he can lease and buy and sell and own property, real and personal; that he can go into the schools and educate himself and his children; that the rights and guarantees of the good old common law are his, and that he walks the earth, proud and erect in the conscious dignity of a free man * * *. (Globe, p. 111.)

The policy of emancipation "that carries with it equality of civil rights and immunities" was, he said, preferable to "that other policy that makes the enfranchised bondman a serf or peon, the slave of society, its soulless laws and customs." (Ibid.) However, he noted that the bill would be postponed over the Christmas recess. Possibly, he said, it would not be acted upon at all, now that the constitutional amendment had been declared adopted. After the holidays, the Congress would "probably enter on the discussion of the broader question of annulling all the black laws in the country and putting these people under the protection of humane, equal, and just laws." (Ibid.) After the adjournment on this day, the bill was not brought up again.

2. The Schurz Report

On December 12, 1865, during the consideration of the Wilson bill, the Senate passed a resolution requesting the President to submit "information of the state of that portion of the Union lately in rebellion," the information to include the report to the President made by Major General Carl Schurz, which was based on a lengthy tour of the South. (Globe, p. 30.) The requested information was submitted by the President, and ordered printed, on December 19, 1865. (Globe, pp. 78–80.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The data was prefaced by a brief message from the President to the effect that the Southern states were civilly tranquil, local government was being quickly restored, and effective measures were being taken by those states "to confer upon freedmen rights and privileges which are essential to their comfort, protection and security." (S. Ex. Doc. No. 2, p. 1.) The Schurz report, however, indicated that the Southern states were not tranquil, and that Union soldiers, people from the North, and loyal Unionists in those states went abroad at peril of their lives. (Id., pp. 7, 8.) The measures taken by the Southern states relating to the freedmen were not to be mistaken for real measures of protection, for > ordinances abolishing slavery passed by the conventions under the pressure of circumstances, will not be looked upon as barring the establishment of a new form of servitude. (Id., p. 45.)

Although the emancipation of the slaves would be submitted to so long as no alternative was possible, the freedman was > considered the slave of society, and all independent State legislation will share the tendency to make him such. (Ibid.)

Since the war had come from the conflicts over slavery and the status of the Negro, the position of the Negro was to be considered as an integral part of any plan of reconstruction. (Id., p. 15.) Special consideration had to be given to the need for educating the freedman, to be promoted as an integral part of the educational systems of the states. (Id., p. 25.) This would be a difficult task, for the prevailing temper of the South would not allow even rudimentary education of the Negro, since it would spoil him for work. (Ibid.) Schoolhouses were being burned in unsettled areas; and even in more stabilized areas of the South the white population was unwilling to permit use of tax funds for colored schools, even though the colored population contributed to the tax. (Id., p. 26.)

3. The Freedmen's Bureau bill (S. 60)

The first "reconstruction" action following the submission of the Schurz report was consideration of the bill to extend the Freedmen's Bureau (S. 60). Senator Trumbull, its sponsor, reported it from the Judiciary Committee, of which he was chairman, on January 12, 1866. (Globe, p. 209.) The bill provided for the broadening of the administrative establishment and powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, created by the preceding Congress. Act of March 3, 1865, 13 Stat. 507. The measure contained an express provision requiring the President to extend protection through the Freedmen's Bureau whenever it appeared that any of the civil rights or immunities of white persons were being refused or denied to freedmen on the basis of color. (Globe, p. 209.)[11]

[11] The provision read as follows:

SEC. 7. Whenever, in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and wherein, in consequence of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, custom, or prejudice, any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons, including the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

After certain committee amendments were agreed to, none of which is of importance here, a date was set for debate on the bill.

On January 18, 1866, consideration of the measure began. Senator Stewart of Nevada remarked that > * * * here is a practical measure before the Senate for the benefit of the freedman, carrying out the constitutional provision to protect him in his civil rights. I am in favor of this bill. It goes to the utmost extent that I think we are entitled to go under the constitutional amendment. There is another bill introduced by the Senator from Illinois which must go along with it, which right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence; to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, are refused or denied to negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or any other persons, on account of race, color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or wherein they or any of them are subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalties, for the commission of any act or offense than are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, through the Commissioner, to extend military protection and jurisdiction over all cases affecting such persons so discriminated against. (Globe, p. 318.)

---

The following section provided criminal penalties for anyone depriving such a person of these civil rights. It also declared that the jurisdiction of the Freedmen's Bureau should cease in a Southern state after it "shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States." (Globe, p. 320.)

> provides civil jurisdiction for the protection of the freedman. Under this constitutional amendment we can protect the freedman and accomplish something for his real benefit. (Globe, p. 297.)

However, Stewart was opposed to the movement to grant suffrage to the Negro. While he was "in favor of legislation under the constitutional amendment that shall secure to him a chance to live, a chance to hold property, a chance to be heard in the courts, a chance to enjoy his civil rights, a chance to rise in the scale of humanity, a chance to be a man" (Globe, p. 298), still he thought that Negro suffrage was not one of the issues of the war. If pushed, it would result in further conflict in the South. "Let no mere theory of the equality of races deprive us of peace and union." (Ibid.)

On the following day, January 19, 1866, Senator Hendricks of Indiana, a member of the Judiciary Committee, delivered a lengthy speech in opposition to the bill. Referring to the comprehensive language of section 7 of the bill, the civil rights section (supra, footnote 11), he questioned whether it might not even include Indiana, which had seen some fighting, and where some court proceedings might have been interrupted. If so, then anyone who attempted to execute the constitution and laws of the State would be liable for a violation of this measure, for

> We do not allow to colored people there many civil rights and immunities which are enjoyed by the white people. It became the policy of the State in 1852 to prohibit the immigration of colored people into that State * * * Under that constitutional provision, and the laws enacted in pursuance > of it, a colored man coming into the State since 1852 cannot acquire a title to real estate, cannot make certain contracts, and no negro man is allowed to intermarry with a white woman. These are civil rights that are denied, and yet this bill proposes if they are still denied in any State whose courts have been interrupted by the rebellion, the military protection of the Government shall be extended over the person who is thus denied such civil rights or immunities. (Globe, p. 318.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Senator Hendricks asserted that the Thirteenth Amendment, under which Congress purported to derive its power to enact such legislation, merely abolished the personal relation between master and slave. The law of the State authorizing this relation was annulled, but no new rights were conferred upon the freedman. (Ibid.) He offered his interpretation of section two of the Thirteenth Amendment:

> If a man has been, by this provision of the Constitution, made free from his master, and that master undertakes to make him a slave again, we may pass such laws as are sufficient in our judgment to prevent that act; but if the Legislature of the State denies to the citizen as he is now called, the freedman, equal privileges with the white man, I want to know if that Legislature, and each member of that Legislature, is responsible to the penalties prescribed in this bill? It is not an act of the old master; it is an act of the State government, which defines and regulates the civil rights of the people. (Globe, p. 319.)

Senator Trumbull rose to defend his measure from this attack. The purpose of the legislation, he stated, was to secure the rights of the freedman, as guaranteed by the Constitution. Congress was authorized to do so, not only under the war powers and the Thirteenth Amendment, but also under the Constitutional provisions relating to the privileges and immunities of citizens and to the guaranty of a republican form of government to the States. (Globe, p. 319.) To be sure, the measure was to be based on the Thirteenth Amendment, for its purpose was to prevent enforcement of the Black Codes and of any laws restraining the liberty of the free Negro, all of which had been enacted in the interests of slavery and were abolished when slavery was abolished. (Globe, p. 322.) The bill would also permit the Negro to be made an independent man, for it is "to educate, improve, enlighten, and Christianize the negro * * *." (Ibid.)

> I have no doubt that under this provision of the Constitution we may destroy all these discriminations in civil rights against the black man; and if we cannot, our constitutional amendment amounts to nothing. It was for that purpose that the second clause of that amendment was adopted * * *. (Ibid.)

As for Hendricks' remarks about the Indiana miscegenation laws, Senator Trumbull thought that those laws would not be affected at all. One of the purposes of the bill was to secure the same civil rights and subject to the same punishment persons of all races and colors. Since the miscegenation laws operated alike on both races, without discrimination against either in this respect that did not apply to both, he believed that this bill would not interfere with them. (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

A brief debate occurred on January 20, 1866. Both Senators Cowan of Pennsylvania and Guthrie of Kentucky objected to the possibility that the bill might apply to their states. Cowan proposed an amendment restricting its coverage exclusively to states lately in rebellion. Both Senators claimed that Negroes already received equal protection of the laws in their states. (Globe, pp. 334, 335.) However, Senator Pomeroy of Kansas pointed out that it could not be true that the civil rights of persons of color in Kentucky were the same as those of white men, for he had never known a state that had permitted slavery which admitted testimony of colored persons to be received against white men. While Senator Guthrie conceded that that was still true in Kentucky, he said that the legislature was presently working on the problem. (Globe, p. 337.)

When debate resumed on January 22, Senator Creswell of Maryland voiced opposition to Cowan's amendment. He welcomed the operation of the measure in his own state, because "combinations of returned rebel soldiers have been formed for the express purpose of persecuting, beating mostly cruelly, and in some cases actually murdering the returned colored soldiers of the Republic. In certain sections of my State the civil law affords no remedy at all. It is impossible there to enforce against these people so violating the law the penalties which the law has prescribed for these offenses." (Globe, p. 339.)

Senator Cowan protested the necessity of these new laws. The present Constitution, he asserted, was sufficient to protect everyone in his rights.

If these so-called Black Codes were a thinly-disguised form of slavery, then, he said, they were clearly unconstitutional, and > there is no possible difficulty in obtaining a remedy for it anywhere and everywhere. The Supreme Court of the United States is sitting here for that purpose today, and the freedman is just as much entitled to the benefit of its protection, as I read the laws, as if he were a man of the fairest complexion and of the brightest Saxon mold. (Globe, p. 342.)

Cowan confessed an inability to understand, from the generalities used, just what was the equality the proponents were aiming for. What was meant by equality, as he understood it, was "in the language of the Declaration of Independence, * * * that each man shall have the right to pursue in his own way life, liberty, and happiness. That is the whole of it." (Ibid.)

Senator Wilson rose to answer that the equality which was to be enforced by this bill was not a matter of uniformity of person, "that all men shall be six feet high," as Cowan had suggested, but it did mean that the "poorest man, be he black or white, that treads the soil of this continent, is as much entitled to the protection of the law as the richest and proudest man in the land." (Globe, p. 343.) Cowan's amendment was then defeated by a vote of 33 to 11. (Globe, p. 347.) Senator Davis of Kentucky proposed an amendment to make the Freedmen's Bureau subject to the jurisdiction of the state courts. It was dedefeated by a vote of 31 to 8. (Globe, p. 348.) Before the Senate adjourned for the day, various other amendments on details of the bill were offered and disposed of. (Globe, pp. 348–349.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On January 23, 1866, Senator Saulsbury of Delaware expressed his opposition to the bill. (Globe, p. 362.) From a practical point of view the measure would require too great an expenditure of money, and the patronage possibilities were too great. Besides, he claimed, the power to pass such a measure could not be derived from the Thirteenth Amendment, which only abolished the status of slavery. That Amendment could be carried into effect, and the status of freedom established, he asserted, without the exercise of such broad power, which encroached upon the fundamental rights of the states. (Ibid.)

These views were echoed by Senators McDougall, Hendricks and Davis. (Globe, pp. 367, 368, 370.) Senator Reverdy Johnson of Maryland announced that he would have liked to vote for the measure because he was very anxious to provide for the Negroes to a certain extent; unfortunately, he, too, had doubts as to the constitutionality of some of its provisions. (Globe, p. 372.)

Consideration on January 24, 1866, was largely devoted to the proposal of a series of amendments by various members of the opposition. They were all decisively defeated. (Globe, pp. 392–402.) On January 25, 1866, the final vote on the passage of the bill was taken. The measure passed by a vote of 37 to 10, and the Senate turned immediately to the consideration of Trumbull's Civil Rights bill. (Globe, p. 421.) (See infra, p. 40.)

In the House, a substitute bill was reported from the Select Committee on Freedmen by its Chairman, Representative Eliot of Massachusetts, on January 30, 1866. (Globe, p. 512.) The substitute was the same as the Senate bill, except for some minor differences in details. The basic part of the bill relating to civil rights was left unchanged. Representative Donnelly of Minnesota immediately offered an amendment to empower the Bureau to provide "a common-school education for all refugees or freedmen who shall apply therefor." [12] (Globe, p. 513.)

The debate on the measure the following day, January 31, 1866, was confined largely to a long speech against Reconstruction policies generally by Mr. Dawson of Pennsylvania, in which he accused the majority of seeking to enforce absolute equality for the Negroes, so that > negroes should be received on an equality in white families, should be admitted to the same tables at hotels, should be permitted to occupy the same seats in railroad cars and the same pews in churches; that they should be allowed to hold offices, to sit on juries, to vote, to be eligible to seats in the State and national Legislatures, and to be judges, or to make and expound laws for the government of white men. Their children are to attend the same schools with white children, and to sit side by side with them. (Globe, p. 541.)

On February 1, 1866, Representative Donnelly took the floor for the bill and his amendment. He discussed the general reconstruction policies of [12] On the final day of consideration of the bill, this amendment became ensnarled in procedural difficulties, and did not become a part of the measure. See infra, p. 39.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the majority, but asserted the need to go further and provide for the education of the freedman. (Globe, p. 585.) Admittedly, this would be a revolutionary attempt, he said, but the Union had won the war and could dictate the terms. Those terms should provide for sweeping changes, for

> He is indeed fearfully cramped by the old technicalities who can see in this enormous struggle only the suppression of a riot and the dispersion of a mob. This struggle has been as organic in its great meanings as the Constitution itself. (Globe, p. 586.)

The care of the freedman could not be left to the Southern states, for that would mean "the reenslavement of the freedman or his reduction to a condition of peonage * * *. [The] indignation of the world would once more isolate the South; and they would meet that indignation as they met it in the old days of slavery, with dark and defiant brows." (Globe, p. 585.)

Mr. Donnelly turned then to the field of education:

> The one great error of our country has been that education was not from the very first made a matter of the State, and as essential to the citizen as liberty itself. Education means the intelligent exercise of liberty, and surely without this liberty is a calamity, since it means simply the unlimited right to err. (Globe, p. 586.)

He cited the 1860 statistics of illiteracy in the nation, and particularly in the South, an illiteracy which he analyzed by comparison with the vote for Breckenridge in 1860, as being largely responsible for secession. Therefore, since the Congress was already "interfering in behalf of the negro," let it "interfere to educate him." By this, he said,

> We thus strike out at one blow a large proportion of the ignorance of the South; we shame the whites into an effort to educate themselves, and we prepare thus both classes for the proper exercise of the right of suffrage. (Globe, p. 587.)

However, if the bill was not passed, Donnelly asked, what would be the fate of the black man in the South? He turned to a consideration of the Black Codes, observing that a Negro "may be oppressed by a convocation of masters called a Legislature as fully as by a single master." (Globe, p. 588.) In the course of his review, he noted that the Black Code of Tennessee provided that "colored children shall not be admitted into the same schools with white children, while it makes no provision for their education in separate schools." (Globe, p. 589.) His conclusion was that these codes represented "slavery, less the protection which the master formerly afforded his chattel. The slave now has a mob for his master." (Ibid.)

Mr. Garfield of Ohio then spoke at length in favor of the bill. He declared that the Thirteenth Amendment did more than merely break off the chains of the slaves. It added four million citizens to the Republic. (Globe, Appendix, p. 66). And it must be declared that in this country the humblest, the lowest, the meanest of our citizens shall not be prevented from passing to the highest place he is worthy to attain; and > we must see to it, that hereafter, personal liberty and personal rights are placed in the keeping of the nation; that the right to life, liberty, and property shall be guarantied to the citizen in reality as they now are in the words of the Constitution, and no longer left to the caprice of mobs or the contingencies of local legislation. If our Constitution does not now afford all the powers necessary to that end, we must ask the people to add them. We must give full force and effect to the provision that "no citizen shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." We must make it as true in fact as it is in law, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." We must make American citizenship the shield that protects every citizen, on every foot of our soil. The bill now before the House is one of the means for reaching this desirable result. (Globe, Appendix, p. 67.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Consideration of the bill on February 2, 1866, was given over to a long speech in opposition by Representative Kerr of Indiana. (Globe, p. 618.) He believed that the Thirteenth Amendment did not confer the power for such an encroachment upon the rights of the states. In addition, the measure opened the way for patronage abuses.

On February 3, 1866, Representative Rousseau of Kentucky voiced his opposition to the bill, to the Donnelly amendment, and particularly to the Freedmen's Bureau efforts at educating the Negro. To him, the Bureau had been too high-handed in this matter, as evidenced by its taking over of the four white public schools in Charleston, S. C., for colored students because the trustees had refused to permit the colored children to share in the facilities:

> Here are four schoolhouses taken possession of, and unless they mix up white children with black, the white children can have no chance in these schools for instruction. (Globe, Appendix, p. 71.)

Representative Chanler, also of Kentucky, also referred to the same example of "usurpation and unlawfulness" of the Bureau in seizing the "only public schools of Charleston formerly used for the poor white children." (Globe, Appendix, p. 82.) It was his position that the "preemptive right in the soil is in the white race. The sovereignty of this Government springs from and belongs to the white race exclusively." (Globe, Appendix, p. 85.)

On February 5, 1866, Congressman Grinnell of Iowa responded that education of the freedman was essential, but that the opposition within the South was so strong that "loyal teachers" were closing their schools. (Globe, p. 651.) Even in Maryland, the resistance to Negro education was great:

> Their schoolhouses have been burned since the sitting of this Congress, and so near to us that the very flames of the conflagration might have lighted up this Capitol. (Globe, p. 652.)

Mr. McKee of Kentucky observed that the Negroes had been emancipated as one of the natural results of the war; they could never be reenslaved: "As freedmen they must have the civil rights of freemen." (Globe, p. 654.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

At this time Representative Eliot withdrew the Committee bill, and offered another as a substitute. By this action, Mr. Donnelly's school amendment also was lost. (Globe, p. 654.) However, that proposal was incorporated in an amendment by Thaddeus Stevens to the substitute bill, which was in the nature of another substitute bill. (Globe, p. 655.) Both of these substitute bills made changes in details in the original Senate bill, but left the basic civil rights provisions untouched. Representative Smith of Kentucky also offered an amendment to exclude the State of Kentucky from the operation of the bill. (Globe, p. 659.)

On the following day, February 6, 1866, the House vote was to be taken. At that time, the Smith and Stevens amendments were both decisively defeated, while the Committee bill passed the House by a vote of 136 to 33. (Globe, p. 688.)

The House substitute bill was returned to the Senate for its concurrence. It was reported from the Judiciary Committee by Senator Trumbull on February 8, 1866, with additional amendments (Globe, p. 742), which are of no relevance here. The House bill, as amended, was concurred in, and the measure was returned to the House. (Globe, p. 748.) Final concurrence by the House took place on the following day, February 9, 1866, without discussion. (Globe, p. 775.)

The President vetoed the bill on February 19, 1866. His message echoed the arguments made by the opponents to the bill: The bill contained provisions which were not warranted by the Constitution; the bill would provide too much patronage; and the States would adequately protect the rights of the freedmen. (Globe, p. 915.) By a vote of 30 to 18, the Senate failed to override the veto. (Globe, p. 943.) No further action was taken on this bill in either House.

C. CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1866

The Civil Rights Act of 1866, 14 Stat. 27, originated in a bill (S. 61)[13] "to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication," offered by Senator Trumbull of Illinois as complementary legislation to his Freedmen's Bureau bill (S. 60). The measures were introduced together on January 5, 1866 (Globe, p. 129); both were reported favorably from the Judiciary Committee on January 11, 1866 (Globe, p. 184), and were explained by Senator Trumbull together, on the following day (Globe, pp. 209, 211).

The Freedmen's Bureau bill was considered first by the Senate.[14] On January 25, 1866, immediately after the final vote was taken on that measure, Senator Trumbull moved to take up the Civil Rights bill, and it was made the order of the day (Globe, pp. 421–422).

As reported, the bill provided that

> There shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; but the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary [13] All references to bill numbers and the Congressional Globe in this section are to the 39th Congress, 1st Session.

[14] See supra, p. 26.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for security of person and property, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding. (Globe, p. 474.)

Should any person deprive an inhabitant of any right secured or protected by the bill, acting under color of law, statute, ordinance, or custom, he was subject to criminal proceedings in the Federal courts; and all civil suits involving the rights protected by the bill were removable to the Federal courts. (Globe, p. 475.) Section 3 of the bill, which provided additional facilities to the Federal courts for arrest and examination of alleged offenders, specifically declared that its purpose was to afford > reasonable protection to all persons in their constitutional rights of equality before the law without distinction of race or color * * *. (Globe p. 211.)

Consideration of the bill began on January 29, 1866. Before proceeding with his opening argument on behalf of the bill, Senator Trumbull offered an amendment to the first section of the bill, inserting a clause that > all persons of African descent born in the United States are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States * * *. (Globe, p. 474.)

Mr. Trumbull then reviewed the importance and necessity of providing national machinery to enforce the freedom which the Thirteenth Amendment guaranteed all persons:

> There is very little importance in the general declaration of abstract truths and principles unless they can be carried into effect, unless the persons who are to be affected by them have some means of availing themserves of their benefits. (Ibid.)

The affirmation, he said, of the abstract truth of equality and freedom in the Declaration of Independence had been of no value to the enslaved Negro; the "privileges and immunities of citizens" had been of no aid to Mr. Hoar of Massachusetts some years before when he sought to enforce a constitutional right in the courts of South Carolina; and the emancipation of the Negro was of no benefit if the laws of the Southern States, then being enacted and enforced, deprived a freedman of the "privileges which are essential to freemen." (Ibid.) With the promulgation of the Thirteenth Amendment, he said, the Black Codes, which made distinctions on account of color, became null and void as a part of slavery; but since they had been reenacted to discriminate against freedmen, it was necessary to enact the bill to carry the Amendment into effect, for > any statute which is not equal to all, and which deprives any citizen of civil rights which are secured to other citizens, is an unjust encroachment upon his liberty; and is, in fact, a badge of servitude which, by the Constitution, is prohibited. (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

These Black Codes, in many instances, he continued, were founded upon a misunderstanding of the concept of citizenship:

> The people of those States have not regarded the colored race as citizens, and on that principle many of their laws making discrimination between the whites and the colored people are based * * *. (Globe, p. 475.)

Therefore, it was necessary to declare Negroes citizens, in order to entitle them to equality of treatment with all other citizens, and to have the means of enforcing their equal rights. When it would be fully understood > in all parts of the United States that any person who shall deprive another of any right or subject him to any punishment in consequence of his color or race will expose himself to fine and imprisonment * * *, such acts would cease. (Ibid.)

Senator Saulsbury asserted that this was one of the most dangerous bills ever introduced into the Senate of the United States. He denied that there was any power under the Constitution to enact such a measure. The Thirteenth Amendment only broke the bonds of slavery, making it impossible for one man to own another, and it placed the former slaves upon a par with the free Negro population. But that Amendment conferred no power to elevate the whole race to an equality with the white race (Globe, p. 476); for a man "may be a free man and not possess the same civil rights as other men." (Globe, p. 477.) If the proponents of the Thirteenth Amendment had "intended to bestow upon the freed slave all the rights of a free citizen, you ought to have gone further in your constitutional amendment, and provided that * * * there should be no inequality in civil rights." (Ibid.)

In examining the bill itself, Senator Saulsbury inquired as to the meaning of the broad term "civil rights," which were to be guaranteed to the freedmen. Although Senator Trumbull had denied that he had intended to confer the political right of suffrage by this bill, Saulsbury thought that the bill could be so interpreted:

> A civil right I define to be a right belonging to the citizen, and which he possesses only by virtue of citizenship * * * the rights which I have by reason of the law of the State under which I live, whether they be rights secured by the fundamental law, the constitution of the State, or be secured by enactments of the Legislature.
>
> The right to vote is not a natural right; I did not possess it by nature, I only possess it by virtue of law. * * * it is a civil right, and is a right of no other class or character. (Globe, pp. 477–478.)

To Senator Saulsbury, such legislation invaded the field reserved to the operation of state laws and he could not support it. (Globe, p. 478.)

Consideration of the bill was resumed on January 30, 1866, with a speech by Senator Van Winkle of West Virginia. (Globe, p. 497.) He doubted that the Negroes were presently citizens of the United States, or that they could become citizens other than by a constitutional amendment. But if they should be made citizens, "I should feel that they were entitled to the right of suffrage." (Ibid.) In any event, he did not believe citizenship could be established by this clause in Trumbull's bill, even under the naturalization power of Congress. (Globe, p. 498.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

At this point Senator Trumbull withdrew his earlier amendment to the bill, and moved to insert the following clause:

> All persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color * * *. (Ibid.)[15]

Senator Cowan objected to this clause, pointing out that it would make citizens of Indians and Asiatics as well as Negroes. (Ibid.) To him, the Thirteenth Amendment conferred no such power. It merely broke the bond by which the Negro slave was held by his master. It was not intended "to overturn this Government and to revolutionize all the laws of the various States everywhere." (Globe, p. 499.) As for the bill as a whole, > * * * as I understand the meaning and intent of this bill, it is that there shall be no discrimination made between the inhabitants of the several States of this Union, none in any way. In Pennsylvania, for the greater convenience of the people, and for the greater convenience, I may say, of [15] With this amendment, the first section read:

> That all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color, and there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery * * *.

> both classes of the people, in certain districts the Legislature has provided schools for colored children, has discriminated as between the two classes of children. We put the African children in this school-house and the white children over in that school-house, and educate them there as we best can. Is this amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery to break up that system which Pennsylvania has adopted for the education of her white and colored children? Are the school directors who carry out that law and who make this distinction between these classes of children to be punished for a violation of this statute of the United States? To me it is monstrous. How anybody desiring to be fair, desiring to construe the Constitution according to its fair intent and meaning, can drag out of it such a conclusion, such a monstrous conclusion as this, I cannot see. (Globe, p. 500.)

Cowan stated that he was perfectly willing to vote for an amendment to the Constitution "which will secure to all men of every color and of every race and of every condition their natural rights, the rights which God has given them, the right to life, the right to liberty, the right to property." But this bill was an attempt to do the same thing without any constitutional authorization. (Ibid.)

Senator Howard, a member of the Judiciary Committee at that time, took occasion to point out that in drafting the Thirteenth Amendment > it was in contemplation of its friends and advocates to give to Congress precisely the power over the subject of slavery and

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> the freedmen which is proposed to be exercised by the bill now under our consideration. (Globe, p. 503.)

The intention had been to make the Negro the opposite of a slave, to make him a freeman, entitled to "those rights which we concede to a man who is free," so that > in respect to all civil rights * * * there is to be hereafter no distinction between the white race and the black race. (Globe, p. 504.)

Senator Reverdy Johnson, counsel for the defendant in the Dred Scott Case, argued that under that decision Congress could not by statute naturalize a native-born Negro. (Globe, p. 504.) His opinion was that the citizenship of the Negro could "only be safely and surely attained by an amendment of the Constitution." (Ibid.)

On January 31, 1866, Senator Garrett Davis rose to speak against Trumbull's amendment. (Globe, p. 522.) He denied the power of Congress to make citizens in this manner. (Globe, p. 523.) It was his contention that Negroes were not citizens when the Constitution was adopted (Globe, p. 524); that the free Negroes were not citizens before the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment (Globe, p. 525); and that they could not now become citizens, even under the naturalization power of Congress. (Globe, p. 529.) Senator Johnson interposed to state that, but for the Dred Scott decision, Congress could legislate directly to make citizens of the Negroes. Even in the face of that decision, he conceded that, since the point was argumentative, it was not unreasonable to suppose that the present Supreme Court might sustain the authority of Congress in this regard. (Globe, p. 530.) Senator Davis, however, remained of the view that it was a principle of this Government that "nobody but white people are or can be parties to it." (Ibid.)

On February 1, 1866, Senator Morrill of Maine spoke in favor of the citizenship clause. (Globe, p. 570.) He stated that it was an extraordinary act, unparalleled in the history of this or any country; however, he found Senator Davis' assertion that the proposition was revolutionary as furnishing no reason for its rejection:

> I freely concede that it is revolutionary. I admit that this species of legislation is absolutely revolutionary. But are we not in the midst of revolution? * * * Are we not in the midst of a civil and political revolution which has changed the fundamental principles of our Government in some respects? (Ibid.)

Senator Morrill denied a previous assertion by Senator Cowan that American society had been established upon the principle of exclusion of inferior races. To the contrary, American society, either civil or political, was not formed in the interest of any race or class. America had, since the earliest days, been held up as a land of refuge, an asylum for the oppressed of all nations and all races. He denied that our Government > was organized in the interest of any race or color, and there is neither "race" nor "color" in our history politically or civilly—not a bit of it. Is there any "color" or "race" in the Declaration of Independ> ence, allow me to ask? "All men are created equal" excludes the idea of race or color or caste. There never was in the history of this country any other distinction than that of condition, and it was all founded on condition. (Globe, pp. 570–571.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The speech concluded with an examination of the Dred Scott decision, and the assertion that the Negro had been denied citizenship there, not on account of his race or color, but only because of his enslaved condition. (Globe, p. 571.)

A discussion then arose over the inclusion of Indians in Senator Trumbull's citizenship clause (Globe, pp. 571–574), and concerning the phrase "without distinction of color" (Globe, p. 573). Senator Trumbull stated that the words of the Declaration of Independence applied to the black as well as the white man. He agreed that the meaning of the clause would be the same without the phrase, but pointed out that he wished to place the matter beyond any question. (Globe, pp. 573–574.) Senator Hendricks of Indiana dissented entirely from this construction of the Declaration of Independence, but agreed that > in defining the right of citizenship there should be no room for doubt. The question that is before this Congress, and that must now go to the country, is that which was started by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner], whether all persons living in this country are to be equal before the law without distinction of color. * * * I am perfectly content that that question shall go to the country. If the people agree to the proposition, I am content; if it is satisfactory to the white > men of this country to admit into the political community Indians and other colored people, I shall no longer object; but I am gratified that the Senator from Illinois makes it in plain words, so that the issue shall be distinctly before the people. (Globe, p. 574.)

The citizenship clause was revised by Senator Trumbull to read as follows:

> All persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color.

In this form Senator Trumbull's amendment to section one of the bill was agreed to by the Senate, by a vote of 31 to 10. (Globe, p. 575.)

On February 2, 1866, the day set for the final vote, Senator Davis of Kentucky renewed his opposition to the measure. (Globe, p. 595.) He held that there was no power to pass any law connected with the subject of this bill except what was contained in the "privileges and immunities" clause in the Constitution. Since Senator Trumbull had declared that his measure was merely declaratory of the principles of the Constitution, he (Davis) offered an amendment, as a substitute for the entire bill. Section one of Senator Davis' substitute merely repeated the language of the "privileges and immunities" clause, while section two provided for civil and criminal penalties against anyone who would deprive "a citizen of any of the United States * * * of any privilege or immunity in any other State to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution and laws of the United States * * *." (Ibid.) This substitute, he asserted, would preserve the integrity of the states, leaving them free to determine their own citizens. Under it, the United States could enforce their citizens' rights in other states. (Ibid.) On the other hand, Senator Trumbull's measure, if enacted, would be "centralizing with a vengeance and by wholesale." (Globe, p. 598.) It "breaks down all the domestic systems of law that prevail in all the States, so far not only as the negro, but as any man without regard to color is concerned, and [it] breaks down all the penal laws that inflict punishment or penalty upon all the people of the States except so far as those laws shall be entirely uniform in their application." (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Senator Trumbull repeated that his measure was merely a bill providing that all people shall have equal rights. It was not deserving, he said, of the epithets Senator Davis had applied to it. He denied that it was for the sole benefit of Negroes:

> Sir, this bill applies to white men as well as black men. It declares that all persons in the United States shall be entitled to the same civil rights * * *. With what consistency and with what face can a Senator in his place here say to the Senate and the country that this is a bill for the benefit of black men exclusively when there is no such distinction in it, and when the very object of the bill is to break down all discrimination between black men and white men?
>
> Now sir, what becomes of all the Senator's denunciation? The bill is applicable exclusively to civil rights. It does not propose to regulate the political rights of indi> viduals; it has nothing to do with the right of suffrage, or any other political right; but is simply intended to carry out a constitutional provision, and guaranty to every person of every color the same civil rights. (Globe, p. 599.)

Believing that all the laws authorizing slavery had fallen, Senator Guthrie of Kentucky claimed that he had advised the people of his state > to put these Africans upon the same footing that the whites are in relation to civil rights. They have all the rights that were formerly accorded to the free colored population in all the States just as fully this day as they will have after this bill has passed, and they will continue to have them. (Globe, p. 600.)

He asserted that, in carrying out the amendment to the Constitution, he was determined to do as equal justice to the black man as to the white man in all respects. But he did not believe that > there is any authority under it to overturn the State governments, and permitting the Federal Government to run into the States to make laws on this subject when it enters into the States for nothing else. (Globe, p. 601.)

Senator Hendricks observed that the bill provides "that the civil rights of all men, without regard to color, shall be equal * * *" in order to "place all men upon an equality before the law * * *." (Globe, p. 601.) But, "in the State of Indiana we do not recognize the civil equality of the races." (Globe, p. 602.) He was opposed to the measure, therefore, because of the conflicts to which it would lead between the state and national governments. Concluding, he suggested an amendment to strike out some of the enforcement provisions of the bill. (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Senator Lane of Indiana, favoring the bill, said that its object was to secure the freedmen in the possession of all the rights, privileges, and immunities of free men. In other words, he asserted, Congress was merely giving effect to the proclamation of emancipation and the Thirteenth Amendment. (Ibid.) Senator Wilson of Massachusetts claimed that the measure was necessary because the new Southern legislatures, "in defiance of the rights of the freedmen and the will of the nation embodied in the amendment to the Constitution, have enacted laws nearly as iniquitous as the old slave codes that darkened the legislation of other days." (Globe, p. 603.)

However, Senator Cowan of Pennsylvania expressed the objection that

> This is a proposition to repeal by act of Congress all State laws, all State legislation, which in any way create distinctions between black men and white men in so far as their civil rights and immunities extend. It is not to repeal legislation in regard to slaves. (Ibid.)

Finally, the time set aside for the vote was reached. The Hendricks and Davis amendments were rejected, and the bill itself was passed by the Senate on February 2, 1866, by a vote of 33 to 12. (Globe, p. 606.)

In the House, on March 1, 1866, Representative James A. Wilson of Iowa, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, reported the bill favorably, but with amendments. (Globe, p. 1115.) The only relevant amendment, which consisted of replacing the term "inhabitants of" by "citizens of the United States in," in the first section, was > intended to confine the operation of this bill to citizens of the United States, instead of extending it to the inhabitants of the several States, as there seems to be some doubt concerning the power of Congress to extend this protection to such inhabitants as are not citizens. (Ibid.) [16]

After all the Committee amendments had been agreed to, Wilson moved to recommit the bill, as a procedural device explicitly intended to cut off further amendments. In his opening speech, he admitted that the questions raised by the bill were difficult, and the precedents in sharp conflict. (Globe, p. 1115.) It was, however, plain to him that Negroes freed under the Thirteenth Amendment were citizens, even without the declaration in the bill, a conclusion which he bolstered by citations of administrative precedents and by [16] Another amendment, added, as asserted by Wilson, to conform the rest of the section to the change made by this amendment, was the insertion of the phrase "as is enjoyed by white citizens," so that the section read:

---

> * * * shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, * * * (Ibid.)

The place where this phrase was inserted was the wrong one, either through an error in the Congressional Globe or an inadvertence by Mr. Wilson. The later debates, see infra, p. 62, and the final Act itself, 14 Stat. 27, show that the phrase was intended to be inserted after the clause "and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for security of person and property," and not just before that clause.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

castigation of the Dred Scott case for holding otherwise. (Globe, p. 1116.) It was competent, he said, for the Congress, and not a matter for the states, to declare who were citizens of the United States. As for the remainder of the first section, it provided for the equality of citizens in the enjoyment of certain "civil rights and immunities":

> What do these terms mean? Do they mean that in all things civil, social, political, all citizens, without distinction of race or color, shall be equal? By no means can they so be construed. Do they mean that all citizens shall vote in the several States? No; for suffrage is a political right which has been left under the control of the several States, subject to the action of Congress only when it becomes necessary to enforce the guarantee of a republican form of government. Nor do they mean that all citizens shall sit on the juries, or that their children shall attend the same schools. These are not civil rights or immunities. (Globe, p. 1117.)

On the other hand, civil rights did include, he asserted, those rights included in the definition of the term in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, those rights which "have no relation to the establishment, support, or management of government." Wilson concluded > that it is easy to gather an understanding that civil rights are the natural rights of man; and these are the rights which this bill proposes to protect every citizen in the enjoyment of throughout the entire dominion of the Republic. (Ibid.)

The term "immunities" was clearer in its meaning—in this regard the bill merely "secures to citizens of the United States equality in the exemptions of the law." (Ibid.)

There was no question, Mr. Wilson said, in his mind that Congress could enact the measure, for > this bill, so far as it declares the equality of all citizens in the enjoyment of civil rights and immunities, merely affirms existing law. We are following the Constitution. We are reducing to statute form the spirit of the Constitution. (Ibid.)

The rights to be protected already belong to every citizen, as part of the "privileges and immunities" of United States citizenship under Article 4 of the Constitution. (Ibid.) If every state acknowledged and guaranteed this protection, this measure would not be necessary. But the practice of the states forced the Federal Government to supply the protection which the states denied:

> Mr. Speaker, if all our citizens were of one race and one color we would be relieved of most of the difficulties which surround us. This bill would be almost, if not entirely, unnecessary, and if the States, seeing that we have citizens of different races and colors, would but shut their eyes to these differences and legislate, so far at least as regards civil rights and immunities, as though all citizens were of one race and color, our troubles as a nation would be well-nigh over. But such is not the case, and we must do as best we can to protect our citizens, from the highest to the lowest, from the whitest to the blackest, in the enjoyment of the great fundamental rights which belong to all men. (Globe, p. 1118.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

As to those citizens in danger of involuntary servitude through deprivation of civil rights, power rested also in the Thirteenth Amendment. (Ibid.) For all others, it rested on the general powers to protect national citizens:

> If citizens of the United States, as such, are entitled to possess and enjoy the great fundamental civil rights which it is the true office of Government to protect, and to equality in the exemptions of the law, we must of necessity be clothed with the power to insure to each and every citizen these things which belong to him as a constituent member of the great national family. (Ibid.)

Representative Raymond of New York offered, as a possible amendment, striking the words "free white" from the naturalization laws, and declaring everyone born in the United States to be a citizen. (Globe, p. 1120.) An amendment was also offered by Representative Shanklin of Kentucky to declare that nothing in the bill would confer the right to vote on Negroes, mulattoes and Indians. (Ibid.)

Representative Rogers of New Jersey, a member of the Judiciary Committee, objected to the bill on constitutional grounds. There was, he said, no authorization under the Constitution for such a measure. As a matter of fact, Representative Bingham's current proposal to amend the Constitution in order to confer this very power [17] implied an opinion by the majority of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction that there was no such power at present. (Ibid.) If Congress had the power to pass this bill, then it had the right > not only to extend all the rights and privileges to colored men that are enjoyed by white men, but has the right to take [them] away. (Ibid.)

---

[17] This reference was to Bingham's "equal rights" amendment, see infra, p. 83.

Under this view, Mr. Rogers concluded that a fair interpretation of the bill would mean that Congress could enter a State, and supersede its normal domestic regulations:

> In the State of Pennsylvania there is a discrimination made between the schools for white children and the schools for black. The laws there provide that certain schools shall be set apart for black persons, and certain schools shall be set apart for white persons. Now, if this Congress has a right, by such a bill as this, to enter the sovereign domain of a State and interfere with these statutes and the local regulations of a State, then, by parity of reasoning, it has a right to enter the domain of that State, and inflict upon the people there, without their consent, the right of the negro to enjoy the elective franchise to the same extent that it is accorded to the white men in that State, * * *. (Globe, p. 1121.)

Mr. Cook of Illinois expressed surprise at Rogers' apprehension that the bill was designed to deprive somebody in some state of the Union of some right which he had previously enjoyed. It was his belief that the bill was constitutional and would deprive no one, black or white, of any rights. (Globe, p. 1123.) "It is said," he remarked, "that this measure is unconstitutional. Then let us amend the Constitution so as to render such legislation proper." (Globe, p. 1125.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

At the opening of debate on March 2, 1866, Representative Thayer of Pennsylvania contended that under statutory rules of construction the bill could not be construed to alter state laws on suffrage, as Rogers had feared, for, > the words themselves are "civil rights and immunities," not political privileges; and nobody can successfully contend that a bill guarantying simply civil rights and immunities is a bill under which you could extend the right of suffrage, which is a political privilege and not a civil right.

>
> Then, again, the matter is put beyond all doubt by the subsequent particular definition of the general language which has been just used; and when those civil rights which are first referred to in general terms in the bill are subsequently enumerated, that enumeration precludes any possibility that the general words which have been used can be extended beyond the particulars which have been enumerated. (Globe, p. 1151.)

Thayer also was concerned with the issue of power to declare a freedman a citizen. It was his view that > by virtue of the second section of the amendment of the Constitution Congress has express power to pass laws which will guaranty and insure these great rights and immunities of citizenship to those who, by the act of emancipation and the amendment of the Constitution, were made freemen, and who in becoming freemen became citizens. (Globe, p. 1152.)

If there should be any doubt as to the status of the Negro, the Congress had "ample authority to confer the rights of citizenship upon this class of persons" under the naturalization power. (Globe, pp. 1152, 1153.) He concluded by stating his approval of Bingham's proposition to put the protection of equal rights into the Constitution, although he doubted the necessity of such action. Still, "in order to make things doubly secure," he would vote for Bingham's proposal. (Globe, p. 1153.)

Representative Eldridge of Wisconsin pointed out that when the Bingham joint resolution to amend the Constitution had been proposed, Mr. Thayer had supported it on the ground, advanced by Bingham, that under the present Constitution there was no warrant to enter a state to protect a citizen in his rights of life, liberty, and property. Now, he observed, Mr. Thayer seemed to differ in all his claims from Mr. Bingham. (Globe, p. 1155.)

Although Representative Thornton of Illinois was opposed to the bill, he conceded that the Thirteenth Amendment necessarily made the Negro a citizen in the act of making him a free man. (Globe, p. 1157.) Representative Windom of Minnesota expressed the belief that the bill was in strict conformity with the spirit and design of the original architects of the Republic. Had this design been followed by those who built the superstructure, he felt that the country might have been spared the horror of the war. For,

> A true republic rests upon the absolute equality of rights of the whole people, high and low, rich and poor, white and black.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> Upon this, the only foundation which can permanently endure, we professed to build our Republic; but at the same time we not only denied to a large portion of the people equality of rights, but we robbed them of every right known to human nature. (Globe, p. 1159.)

At this point, Mr. Wilson withdrew his motion to recommit the bill, and proceeded to offer some amendments. Most were technical, and not material here; one, however, was an express proviso excluding the right of suffrage from the rights protected by the bill. Wilson stated that this addition did not change his construction of the bill, since he did not believe the term "civil rights" included the right of suffrage. After all of these amendments were adopted, he renewed his motion to recommit, and the House moved on to the consideration of other measures. (Globe, pp. 1161–1162.)

Debate on the Civil Rights bill was not resumed until March 8, 1866. At that time Representative Broomall of Pennsylvania argued that the evils which the bill would correct were not limited in their scope to the black man. He contended that white men, citizens of the United States, had been and were then being punished under color of state laws for having refused to commit treason; that soldiers of the Republic had been arraigned in state courts, under state laws, for the crime of shooting traitors on the field of battle by command of military superiors, and had been saved from punishment only by the interposition of the Freedmen's Bureau. He maintained, further, that > white men, citizens of the United States, have been driven from their homes, and > have had their lands confiscated in State courts, under State laws, for the crime of loyalty to their country, and that now they are begging in vain for a redress of wrongs in the courts of the reconstructed South. (Globe, p. 1263.)

Representative Raymond of New York spoke in behalf of his substitute bill.[18] He declared that the pending measure had worthy objects, and that he would gladly vote for any such bill if convinced of its constitutionality. Unfortunately, he had doubts as to the constitutionality of section two, the penal section. (Globe, pp. 1266–1267.)

Mr. Delano of Ohio stated his belief that no law was necessary to make the emancipated people citizens. In his opinion, they were already citizens. (Globe, Appendix, p. 156.) However, as for the rest of the bill he had doubts as to the power of Congress under the existing Constitution to pass such a measure. Despite Mr. Wilson's disclaimer that the bill conferred the right to act as a juror, Delano felt that section one necessarily conferred that right in the clause, "to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens." (Globe, Appendix, p. 157.) Wilson replied that those words had not been in the original bill, but were inserted by an amendment offered by himself:[19] "It was thought by some persons that unless these qualifying words were incorporated in the bill, those rights might be ex-

---

[18] See, supra, p. 57.

[19] See, supra, note 16.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

tended to all citizens, whether male or female, majors or minors. So that the words are intended to operate as a limitation and not as an extension * * *." (Ibid.) Delano continued his objections by pointing to the phrase in the same section, "That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the citizens of the United States in any State or Territory." He supposed that the enumeration of specific rights following this general declaration operated as a limitation upon it. But then the phrase to which he had previously referred followed after this enumeration, and, in his view, seemed to be an enlargement or extension of the specific rights enumerated in the bill. Under this construction, he asserted, the question whether the right to be a juror was conferred by the measure was still a debatable one. (Ibid.) Delano thought, therefore, that the bill could be interpreted to encroach upon the reserved rights of the state under the Constitution. It appeared to him that "the authority assumed as the warrant for this bill would enable Congress to exercise almost any power over a State." (Globe, Appendix, p. 158.) He expressed strong doubts as to the authority of Congress > to go into the States and manage and legislate with regard to all the personal rights of the citizen * * *. (Ibid.)

Mentioning, as examples, state laws defining who would be entitled to testify in court, Mr. Delano continued, > we once had in the State of Ohio a law excluding the black population from any participation in the public schools or in the > funds raised for the support of those schools. That law did not place, of course, the black population upon an equal footing with the white, and would, therefore, under the terms of this bill be void, and those attempting to execute it would be subjected to punishment by fine or imprisonment. (Ibid.)

While the extreme assertion of state rights was a contributing cause of the war, to him

> it is just as important that we should not swing back into the assertion of powers in this Government that do not belong to it * * *. (Globe, Appendix, p. 159.)

He concluded, therefore, that since authority for this bill was not conferred by the Thirteenth Amendment, Congress should first take up and submit for ratification the amendment to the Constitution offered by Mr. Bingham. When that amendment had become part of the fundamental law, then Congress could proceed "to secure the rights of these persons in a way in which we shall not be trampling down or endangering the fundamental law of the land." (Ibid.)

Upon the conclusion of this speech, Representative Kerr of Indiana rose to present his objections to the measure. In his view, the declaration of citizenship was wholly unauthorized, for the naturalization power did not permit Congress to declare native-born non-citizens to be citizens. (Globe, p. 1267.) The Thirteenth Amendment did not grant that authority, nor did it authorize civil rights legislation to enlarge > the rights and privileges of negroes, not as subjects of the Federal Government, but

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> as subjects or citizens of the several States." (Globe, p. 1268.)

All that amendment had done was to sever the relation of master and slave, and to prevent involuntary servitude. He asked:

> Is it slavery or involuntary servitude to forbid a free negro, on account of race and color, to testify against a white man? Is it either to deny to free negroes, on the same account, the privilege of engaging in certain kinds of business in a State in which white men may engage, such as retailing spirituous liquors? Is it either to deny to children of free negroes or mulattoes, on the like account, the privilege of attending the common schools of a State with the children of white men? * * * It will require a most vigorous exercise of the imagination to give affirmative answers to those questions. (Ibid.)

Mr. Kerr then elaborated on the problems of the differing character of State and national citizenship:

> We should not confound the rights of citizenship which a State may confer within its own limits and the rights of citizenship as a member of the Union. (Ibid.)

Before the adoption of the Constitution, he asserted, a State could confer on whomsoever it pleased the character and rights of citizenship. (Ibid.) Moreover:

> The States have not surrendered the power of conferring these rights and privileges by adopting the Constitution of the United States. Each State may still confer them upon an alien, or anyone it thinks proper, or upon any class or description of per> sons; yet they would not be citizens in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution of the United States, nor entitled to sue as such in its courts, nor to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the other States. (Ibid.)

The naturalization power of Congress extended only to confer a "general citizenship" in the Union, which had nothing whatever to do with conferring the rights inherent in State citizenship. (Ibid.) All the privileges and immunities clause of Article 4 conferred was the negative right of a citizen of the Union, domiciled in one State and sojourning in another, to be free from discrimination on account of his "foreign" residence. (Globe, p. 1269.) He was not, however, specially protected against being accorded the treatment ordinarily due to others of the same general class in which he fell, apart from residence. (Ibid.) Consequently, Congress could not claim to be empowered, in protecting its own citizens, to invade the States in order to prescribe what rights the States should accord to State citizens, and others sojourning there. (Globe, p. 1270.)

Moreover, Mr. Kerr did not agree with any narrow definition of the term "civil rights and immunities," and pointed to the confused definitions offered by the proponents of the bill. (Ibid.) He referred to the statutes of Indiana, forbidding licenses to sell spirituous liquors to any but white males, a discrimination of both color and race. The right to the license was probably to be deemed a civil right; but even if it were not, > yet a license is a contract, and this bill says the negro shall have "the same right to make

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> and enforce contracts" as the white man. * * * Again, the constitution of Indiana has dedicated a munificent fund to the support of common schools for the education of the children of the State. But negro and mulatto children are by law excluded from those schools. Negroes and mulattoes are exempt by law from school tax. They are denied a civil right, on account of race and color, and are granted an immunity, (from school taxation) but are taxed for all other purposes. Now, a negro or mulatto takes his child to the common schoolhouse and demands of the teacher that it be admitted to the school and taught as the white children are, which is refused. The teacher then becomes a wrong-doer and is liable to the same punishments, to be administered in the same way; because all the persons referred to would be acting under color of some law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom. (Globe, p. 1271.)

After Mr. Kerr had concluded his speech, Representative Bingham offered an amendment to the motion to recommit, to instruct the Committee to strike out the broad language relating to "civil rights and immunities." He also wished stricken all the penal provisions of the bill, substituting therefor a provision granting the remedy of a civil action for damages to one whose rights had been violated. (Ibid.) [20]

The following day, March 9, 1866, Bingham was allowed thirty minutes to speak on behalf of his amendment. (Globe, p. 1290.) He stated, at the outset, that even if his proposed changes were adopted, the Congress had no authority to pass the bill; but by striking out the broad language of the bill, and removing its criminal penalties, he asserted, its "oppressive" effects would be eliminated. (Ibid.)

---

[20] This proposal by Bingham had already been endorsed, in advance of its offer, in preceding speeches by Representatives Raymond (Globe, p. 1267), and Delano. (Globe, App., p. 156.)

To Bingham, there was no objection to the declaration of the citizenship of the Negro, for that was a fully authorized exercise of power by Congress; but, > in view of the text of the Constitution of my country, in view of all of its past interpretations, in view of the manifest and declared intent of the men who framed it, the enforcement of the bill of rights, touching the life, liberty, and property of every citizen of the Republic within every organized State of the Union, is of the reserved powers of the States, to be enforced by State tribunals and by State officials acting under the solemn obligations of an oath imposed upon them by the Constitution of the United States. (Globe, p. 1291.)

In discussing the general language of the first section of the bill, Mr. Bingham referred to Representative Wilson's views. He pointed out that the latter had privately said that he did not regard the "clause in the first section as an obligatory requirement." (Globe, p. 1291.) To Mr. Bingham, however, that clause was "as obligatory as any other clause of the section." Consequently, since "civil rights" was a very broad term, including every right of the citizen, not excepting suffrage, > * * * what, then, is proposed by the provision of the first section? Simply to strike down by congressional enactment

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> every State constitution which makes a discrimination on account of race or color in any of the civil rights of the citizen. (Ibid.)

Most states did have such discriminatory laws. With the objective of eliminating such laws, Bingham agreed entirely, but that should be achieved by the law and voluntary act of each State:

> The law in every State should be just; it should be no respecter of persons. It is otherwise now, and it has been otherwise for many years in many of the States of the Union. I should remedy that not by an arbitrary assumption of power, but by amending the Constitution of the United States, expressly prohibiting the States from any such abuse of power in the future. (Ibid.)

In limiting the operation of the bill to "citizens," he claimed, the House revisers of the bill had discriminated against aliens; to reach all equally with protection, it was necessary to use "persons," for, while > the bill of rights, as has been solemnly ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States, does not limit the powers of States and prohibit such gross injustice by States, it does limit the power of Congress and prohibit any such legislation by Congress. (Globe, p. 1292.)

The Freedman's Bureau bill he distinguished by reason of its application only to the insurrectionary States, and only so long as the courts were "stopped in the peaceable course of justice" by civil unrest. (Ibid.) But when peace should be restored and the courts opened, the ordinary limitations of the Constitution would apply, under which > the care of the property, the liberty, and the life of the citizen, under the solemn sanction of an oath imposed by your Federal Constitution, is in the States, and not in the Federal Government. (Ibid.)

Mr. Bingham asserted that even his proposed constitutional amendment did not seek to disturb that traditional limitation. It sought > to affect no change in that respect in the Constitution of the country. (Ibid.)

On the contrary, it sought only to provide power in Congress to punish all violations by State officers of their obligations to uphold the Constitution and the bill of rights, > * * * but leaving those officers to discharge the duties enjoined upon them as citizens of the United States by that oath and by that Constitution. (Ibid.)

Borrowing de Tocqueville's phrase, this would continue "centralized government, decentralized administration" (Ibid.), which is the strength of this country:

> I have always believed that the protection in time of peace within the States of all of the rights of person and citizen was of the powers reserved to the States. And so I still believe. (Globe, p. 1293.)

Representative Shellabarger of Ohio echoed Bingham's constitutional doubts, but, in view of the great need for such protection, he resolved his doubts in favor of the bill. "Its whole effect," he said, "is not to confer or regulate rights, but to require that whatever of these enumerated rights and obligations are imposed by State laws shall be for and upon all citizens alike without distinctions based on race or former condition in slavery." (Globe, p. 1293.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Wilson again took the floor to rebut these objections, many of which had come from members of his own party. (Globe, p. 1294.) To him, it was wholly beyond reason that the United States, which > can draw the citizen by the strong bond of allegiance to the battle-field, has no power to intervene and set aside a State law, and give the citizen protection under the laws of Congress in the courts of the United States * * *. (Ibid.)

Wilson stated that the term "civil rights and immunities" as used in this bill, and as properly construed, did not comprise all civil rights and immunities. Mr. Bingham had tried to tell the House, he asserted, that in the terms of this bill, > are embraced those rights which belong to the citizen of the United States as such, and those which belong to a citizen of a State as such; and that this bill is not intended merely to enforce equality of rights, so far as they relate to citizens of the United States, but invades the States to enforce equality of rights in respect to those things which properly and rightfully depend on State regulations and laws. (Ibid.)

Mr. Wilson, however, observed that the "gentleman from Ohio" was too able a lawyer to put forth seriously such a construction of the bill; for > when he talks of setting aside the school laws and jury laws and franchise laws of the States by the bill now under consideration, he steps beyond what he must know to be the rule of construction which must apply here, and as the result of which this bill can only relate to matters within the control of Congress. (Ibid.)

Four days later, on March 13, 1866, the bill was reported again with amendments, as urged by Representatives Delano and Bingham, striking out the general language relating to "civil rights or immunities", and leaving only the individual rights specified. (Globe, p. 1366.) Mr. Wilson explained that the elimination of the general language did not materially change the bill, for, he still maintained, under accepted rules of construction, the specific language had limited the general. However, > some gentlemen were apprehensive that the words we propose to strike out might give warrant for a latitudinarian construction not intended. (Ibid.)

A few other amendments, not relevant here, were also reported. All the amendments were adopted by the House. In answer to an inquiry on the omission from the final bill of the proviso explicitly excluding the right of suffrage from the operation of the bill, Wilson replied that

> Some members of the House thought, in the general words of the first section in relation to civil rights, it might be held by the courts that the right of suffrage was included in those rights. To obviate that difficulty and the difficulty growing out of any other construction beyond the specific > rights named in the section, our amendment strikes out all of those general terms and leaves the bill with the rights specified in the section. Therefore the amendment referred to by the gentleman is unnecessary. (Globe, p. 1367.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

With these changes, on March 13, 1866, the bill then passed the House by a vote of 111 to 38, although Bingham still voted against it. (Ibid.) The Senate, after a brief and largely immaterial discussion on March 15, 1866, concurred in all the House amendments, and sent the measure to the President. (Globe, pp. 1413–1416.)

On March 27, the President returned the bill without approval. (Globe, pp. 1679–1681.) His message was in large part a repetition of the arguments in the Congress against the bill. The former slaves, he asserted, did not possess as yet the requisite qualifications to entitle them to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. Moreover, the President believed that Congress did not have the authority to destroy the federative system by such a centralization of power as that required to provide the proposed safeguards for the colored race, which went beyond anything that the General Government had ever provided for the white race. (Ibid.)

The veto did not come up for discussion until April 4, 1866, when Senator Trumbull reviewed what he claimed to be the inadequacies and errors of the message, point by point. (Globe, pp. 1755–1761.) He regretted that the President should have thus alienated himself "from those who elevated him to power." (Globe, p. 1755.) On April 5, 1866, Senator Reverdy Johnson, who supported the veto, again reviewed the Dred Scott case, noting that under that decision the Congress might be able to make a Negro a citizen of the United States but not a citizen of a State. (Globe, p. 1776.) Since this legislation related to rights inherent in State citizenship, it was an unconstitutional attempt to invade the powers reserved to the States. (Globe, pp. 1777, 1778.) For the most part, the few remaining Senate speeches were devoted to repetition of previous arguments or to general Reconstruction matters. (Globe, pp. 1781–1786; 1801–1809.) On April 6, the vote was taken, and the veto was overridden by 33 to 15. (Globe, p. 1809.) In the House, on April 9, 1866, there was no discussion at all. After some dilatory tactics by the opposition, Representative Wilson called the previous question, and the House overrode the veto by a vote of 122 to 41. (Globe, p. 1861.)

D. THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

The legislative history of the Fourteenth Amendment itself is preceded by summaries of two other proposals for constitutional amendments introduced earlier in the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress. These proposals were: a constitutional amendment reducing the congressional representation of any state which denied citizens suffrage on the basis of race or color (the Stevens "apportionment" amendment); and a constitutional amendment empowering Congress to enact legislation to guarantee equal rights to all persons (the Bingham "equal rights" amendment).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

These proposals were the immediate precursors of sections one and two of the Fourteenth Amendment.

1. The Stevens "Apportionment" Amendment

On December 5, 1865, Representative Thaddeus Stevens introduced in the House a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, providing for apportionment of representatives among the States on the basis of their respective legally-qualified voters. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee. (Congressional Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 10.)[21]

At the second meeting of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, on January 9, 1866, Stevens submitted the same resolution to that body.[22] On January 12, 1866, it was referred, along with other proposals, to a subcommittee consisting of Messrs. Fessenden, Stevens, Howard, Conkling and Bingham. (Committee Journal, pp. 9–10.) On January 20, 1866, the subcommittee reported, and, after further amendments, the Joint Committee approved, by vote of 13 to 1, the following proposed article of amendment:

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed; provided that whenever the elective fran> chise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation. (Committee Journal, p. 13.)

[21] All references to the Congressional Globe in this section are to the 39th Congress, 1st Session.

[22] Journal of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, S. Doc. No. 711, 63d Cong., 3d Sess., p. 7, hereafter cited as "Committee Journal."

Representative Stevens introduced this proposed amendment, embodied in a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 51), on January 22, 1866. (Globe, p. 351.) He indicated that he wished to have it passed "before the sun goes down." However, after objections by Representatives Rogers of New Jersey and Chanler of New York indicating a minority view, Stevens agreed to postpone the vote, and debate commenced. (Globe, pp. 352–353.)

Representative Rogers, a member of the Joint Committee, presented the minority report of that body on the proposed amendment. He stated that the amendment contemplated a change in the fundamental principle that taxation and representation should always go together. Its object, he asserted, was to force Negro suffrage, in this indirect way, upon an unwilling population in order to prevent deprivation of its rightful representation. Whereas formerly, a state was entitled to three-fifths representation for its Negro slaves, now, under this amendment, the state would receive no representation at all for that class of population, if any kind of suffrage qualification were imposed on even one Negro. (Globe, pp. 353–356.)

Mr. Conkling, also on the Joint Committee, spoke in favor of the amendment. (Globe, p. 356.) He pointed out that the former slaves would now receive full representation under the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Constitution although not enfranchised at all. This would enable the Southern states to claim 28 more representatives in Congress. In effect, there would be, he said,

> Twenty-eight votes, to be more or less controlled by those who once betrayed the Government, and for those so destitute, we are assured, of intelligent instinct as not to be fit for free agency. (Globe, p. 357.)

To remedy this situation, Conkling stated, the Committee had considered the possibility of a proposal to deprive the states of the power to disqualify or discriminate politically on account of race or color. However, this plan had been rejected because it trenched upon the principle of state sovereignty, denying to the people of the several states the right to regulate their own affairs in their own way. (Globe, p. 358.) The pending proposal had been adopted because it left every state free to extend or withhold the elective franchise on such terms as it pleased, and this without losing anything in representation if the terms were impartial as to all. But if any race "is so vile or worthless that to belong to it is alone cause of exclusion from political action, the race is not to be counted here in Congress." (Ibid.)

On January 23, 1866, Representative Blaine of Maine suggested that the amendment should be rephrased so that if Negroes were removed from the basis of representation, they should also be excluded from the basis of direct taxation. (Globe, p. 377.) Chanler of New York, reviewing the action of the Constitutional Convention on this subject, remarked at the different spirit there prevailing:

> All differences were compromised in a spirit of patriotism and justice. How different is all this from the hasty partisan legislation on this very suffrage question by the present Congress.
>
> A caucus met before Congress organized and chalked out a line of policy and action for the Republican party on the floor of Congress. The whole matter of reconstruction was referred to a grinding committee, whose dictation should govern Congress in every measure brought before it for consideration. (Globe, p. 382.)

Representative Jenckes of Rhode Island objected to the amendment because an essential element of injustice was infused in it. By this express constiutional authorization,

> We yield to States the power to exclude an entire race living among them, which has hitherto been a class by themselves, but who must now be counted as citizens. They may exclude not only that race, but people of other races who immigrate to this country, and thus contravene the long-settled policy upon which we open our ports to immigrants from all climes, and of all nations and races, and seek here to build up a nation which will not rest upon the basis of any narrow or clannish origin, but which will embrace the best blood of the whole human race. (Globe, p. 386.)

On January 24, 1866, Mr. Lawrence of Ohio expressed a desire that the Constitution be amended to apportion representation on the basis of citizens of the United States who were male

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

adult voters. (Globe, p. 404.) He believed that if any class > is unfit to be an element of political strength, it is unjust to clothe a favored class with political power on its behalf. Whatever protection it demands should be entrusted equally to all the Representatives of the people. (Ibid.)

Representative Shellabarger of Ohio objected to the amendment because it would be a declaration sanctioning the deprivation of political rights from a whole race of men, providing only that they be not represented in the government. As such, it would violate the basic principle of our government, require different constructions of other Constitutional clauses, and spoil the free spirit and sense of the Constitution. (Globe, p. 405.) Representative Kelley of Pennsylvania echoed this objection, and urged that the Congress follow > a rule of action which, if adhered to, will settle all our difficulties and establish the fact that there is on earth a Republic founded upon the imprescriptible rights of man, in which the humblest man, when he recounts his political rights, sets forth all that the strongest, the wisest, and the proudest may claim. Social inequalities there will be, and natural inequalities are ordained of God; but when our fathers gave us the Constitution they meant that within the wide limits of our country the measure of one man's political rights should ascertain the extent of those of every other man dwelling beneath that dome which is the fit canopy of a continent, the Constitution of the United States. (Globe, pp. 408–409.)

281209—53——6

On January 25, 1866, Representative Bingham of Ohio expressed his belief that the proposed amendment was desirable, and reminded those who found various faults with it, that it was not the only amendment under consideration. Others would bolster this one, and remedy its defects. He informed the House that the Joint Committee > has under consideration another general amendment to the Constitution which looks to the grant of express power to the Congress of the United States to enforce in behalf of every citizen of every State and of every Territory in the Union the rights which were guarantied to him from the beginning,[23] but which guarantee has unhappily been disregarded by more than one State of this Union, defiantly disregarded, simply because of a want of power in Congress to enforce that guarantee. (Globe, p. 429.)

It was Bingham's belief that every slave when emancipated became a "free citizen" in the words of the old Articles of Confederation, and a "free person," a term which embraced all citizens, in the words of the Constitution. He thus became equal before the law with every other citizen of the United States. (Globe, p. 430.) Therefore, Bingham asserted,

> I want the American people by adopting such amendments to declare their purpose to stand by the foundation principle of their own institutions, the absolute equality of all citizens of the United States politically and civilly before their own laws.

[23] Bingham was referring to his own "equal rights" amendment. See infra, p. 83.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> That is the issue involved in the amendment presented by the committee. (Globe, p. 431.)

Congressman Raymond of New York, on January 29, 1866, spoke at length on the nature of the constitutional relation of the Southern states to the Union. (Globe, p. 483.) In the course of his remarks he stated that he "put no great faith in these so-called guarantees of the Constitution for objects which can only rest upon the public conscience and the public will." (Globe, p. 491.) Representative Julian of Indiana urged the adoption of an amendment which would directly prohibit the disfranchisement of anyone on account of race or color. (Globe, Appendix, pp. 56–58.)

On January 30, 1866, the joint resolution was recommitted without instructions to the Joint Committee on Reconstruction. (Globe, p. 508.) At a meeting of the Committee on the following day, Thaddeus Stevens moved to amend it by striking out the reference to direct taxes. This motion was agreed to, and in that amended form the joint resolution was ordered to be reported back to the House. (Committee Journal, pp. 15–16.)

Stevens reported the resolution to the House on the same day, January 31, 1866, and urged its passage. (Globe, p. 535.) The joint resolution was then passed by a vote of 120 to 46, more than the necessary two-thirds. (Globe, p. 538.)

Consideration of the joint resolution in the Senate began on February 6, 1866, with a speech in opposition by Senate Sumner. (Globe, p. 673.) He regarded it as "another Compromise of Human Rights," introducing "discord and defilement" into the Constitution (ibid.), and a renunciation of all power under the Constitution to apply a remedy for a grievous wrong, when the remedy was available. (Globe, p. 674.) He felt that Congress had ample power to establish the right of suffrage for the Negro, even without any further constitutional amendment. Enfranchisement in his view was the complement to Emancipation, and was justifiable under the constitutional amendment which ordained the latter. (Globe, p. 675.)

> But the Senate has already by solemn vote asserted this very jurisdiction. You have, sir, decreed that colored persons shall enjoy the same civil rights as white persons; in other words, that, with regard to civil rights, there shall be no Oligarchy, Aristocracy, Caste, or Monopoly, but that all should be equal before the law without distinction of color. And this great decree you have made as "appropriate legislation" under the Constitutional Amendment "to enforce" the abolition of slavery. Surely you have not erred in this act. Beyond all question the protection of colored persons in civil rights is essential to complete the abolition of slavery; but the protection of colored persons in political rights is not less essential; and the power is as ample in one case as in the other. (Globe, p. 684.)

Senator Fessenden, Chairman of the Joint Committee, opposed Sumner on February 7, 1866, arguing the necessity of the proposed apportionment amendment, although he admitted that he himself would prefer

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> a distinct proposition that all provisions in the constitution or laws of any State making any distinction in civil or political rights, or privileges, or immunities whatever, should be held unconstitutional, inoperative, and void, or words to that effect. (Globe, p. 704.)

But any such proposition was probably too extreme to secure the concurrence of the states. (Ibid.)

On February 14, 1866, Senator Clark of New Hampshire agreed that the real question was the guaranty of political rights—suffrage—for the Negro (Globe, p. 831), since enfranchisement was one of the basic rights of every free man. (Globe, p. 832.) A similar analysis was presented by Senator Yates of Illinois, on February 19, 1866. He stated that the rights granted by the Thirteenth Amendment included both the civil and political rights of every free man. (Globe, Appendix, p. 100–101.) By the Amendment, the Negro "became a part of the people" and, as such, "entitled to the same rights and privileges with all the other citizens of the United States." (Globe, Appendix, p. 101.)

The vote on the joint resolution was taken on March 9, 1866. The constitutional amendment was defeated, for, although it received a majority vote of 25 to 22, it lacked the constitutional two-thirds. (Globe, p. 1289.)

2. The Bingham "Equal Rights" Amendment

On January 12, 1866, the Joint Committee on Reconstruction received two proposals for amendment of the Constitution. (Committee Journal, p. 9.) The first, by Bingham, provided:

> The Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to secure to all persons in every State within this Union equal protection in their rights of life, liberty, and property.

The second, by Thaddeus Stevens, Chairman of the House group of the Committee, was a simpler declaration:

> All laws, State or national, shall operate impartially and equally on all persons without regard to race or color.

Both were referred to the subcommittee on the apportionment of representatives in Congress, which included both Bingham and Stevens. (Ibid.)

A week later, on January 20, 1866, the subcommittee reported a proposal which, although obviously patterned after Bingham's insofar as civil rights were concerned, also contained language to insure equal political rights, i. e., suffrage:

> Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to secure to all citizens of the United States, in every State, the same political rights and privileges; and to all persons in every State equal protection in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property. (Committee Journal, p. 12.)

This proposal was held in the Committee until after the apportionment proposal had passed the House, although the Committee continued to consider it actively. (Committee Journal, pp. 14–15.) After disagreement on the proposed terminology, it was referred, on January 24, 1866, to a special subcommittee consisting of Bingham, Boutwell of Massachusetts, and Andrew Jackson Rogers of New Jersey. (Committee Journal, p. 14.) This subcommittee reported the proposal back on January 27, 1866, in a form more closely akin to Bingham's original proposal:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure all persons in every State full protection in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property; and to all citizens of the United States, in any State, the same immunities and also equal political rights and privileges. (Committee Journal, pp. 14–15.)

This form, however, did not meet with the Committee's entire approval (ibid.), so Bingham proposed a substitute on February 3, 1866:

> The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States (Art. 4, sec. 2); and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property (5th amendment). (Committee Journal, p. 17.)

This was adopted by a narrow margin, and agreed on for report to Congress. (Ibid.)

The "equal rights" amendment proposal (H. J. Res. 63) was reported to the House on February 26, 1866. (Globe, pp. 813, 1033.) Bingham's report stated that the language of the proposal "stands in the very words of the Constitution." (Globe, p. 1034.) It was intended to remedy "the want of the Republic that there was not an express grant of power in the Constitution to enable the whole people of every State, by congressional enactment, to enforce obedience to these requirements of the Constitution." (Ibid.) Had there been such a power in the Congress to enforce the privileges and immunities and due-process clauses, the "immortal bill of rights embodied in the Constitution," instead of resting them on the fidelity of the States, there would have been no rebellion. (Ibid.)

Representative Rogers of New Jersey answered that the addition of Congressional enforcement power to Article IV of the Constitution, such as proposed, would be the "embodiment of centralization" and the "disfranchisement" of "sacred and immutable State rights." (Globe, Appendix, p. 133.) If this amendment were necessary, Rogers asked, what authorized the enactment of the Civil Rights Act? (Ibid.) While he expressly favored the "protection, security, advancement, and improvement, physically and intellectually, of all classes," that end should be accomplished by State legislation:

> Negroes should have the channels of education opened to them by the States, and by the States they should be protected in life, liberty, and property * * *. (Globe, Appendix, p. 134.)

They should be permitted by the States to do everything a white man could do, except to vote and hold office. (Ibid.) However, according to him, the proposed amendment would take from

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the states the power to regulate such personal rights as education:

> In the State of Pennsylvania there are laws which make a distinction with regard to the schooling of white children and the schooling of black children. It is provided that certain schools shall be designated and set apart for white children, and certain other schools designated and set apart for black children. Under this amendment, Congress would have power to compel the State to provide for white children and black children to attend the same school, upon the principle that all the people in the several States shall have equal protection in all the rights of life, liberty, and property, and all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." (Globe, Appendix, p. 134.)

The proposed amendment would operate > under this broad principle of equality which during the last five years has been proclaimed throughout the land to empower the Federal Government to exercise an absolute, despotic, uncontrollable power of entering the domain of the States and saying to them, "Your State laws must be repealed wherever they do not give to the colored population of the country the same rights and privileges to which your white citizens are entitled." (Globe, Appendix, p. 135.)

On February 27, 1866, Representative Higby of California expressed himself in favor of Reconstruction and equality for the Negro, agreeing with Bingham that the purpose of the amendment was to supply a power of enforcement to provisions of the Constitution that lacked vitality without it. (Globe, p. 1054.) Congressman Kelley of Pennsylvania felt that the existing provisions of the Constitution, guaranteeing the "privileges and immunities" of citizens, included a right to have a republican form of government; that is, one in which all citizens were equal. Therefore, he felt, the proposal was really unnecessary, although its adoption would serve to allay the doubts of the unreasonable. (Globe, pp. 1057–1059.)

Representative Hale of New York objected to the proposal for the reason that > it is in effect a provision under which all State legislation, in its codes of civil and criminal jurisprudence and procedure, affecting the individual citizen, may be overridden, may be repealed or abolished, and the law of Congress established instead. (Globe, p. 1063.)

Thaddeus Stevens inquired rhetorically if Hale really meant that under the amendment, "Congress could interfere in any case where the legislation of a State was equal, impartial to all?" (Ibid.) Hale replied that the provision was not, as Stevens suggested, one > that when the States undertake to give protection which is unequal Congress may equalize it; it is a grant of power in general terms—a grant of the right to legislate for the protection of life, liberty, and property, simply qualified with the condition that it shall be equal legislation. (Globe, pp. 1063–1064.)

He maintained that the present Constitution offered ample safeguards. However, Bingham interrupted to inquire whether he knew of any decision in which a person within a state had been able to sustain a suit for "vindication of a right or the redress of a wrong" when the organic law of that state forbade such a suit. (Globe, p. 1064.) Hale replied that not having briefed the question, he could not recall any such case. (Ibid.) Bingham also denied Hale's statement that the proposed amendment would apply only to the Negro in the South, for it was "to apply to other States also that have in their constitutions and laws to-day provisions in direct violation of every principle of our Constitution." (Globe, p. 1065.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Representative Hale closed his remarks with a plea for the necessity of maintaining a reasonable balance between the national government and the states—asking > whether we ought not now to seek to strengthen the liberties of the States and the rights of the States as well as the liberties of the citizens. (Globe, p. 1065.)

On the following day, February 28, 1866, Representative Davis of New York also expressed concern over the upset of the federal-state balance. (Globe, p. 1083.) The Thirteenth Amendment, while freeing the Negro, > gives to Congress full power to enact all laws which shall be essential to their protection. They must be made equal before the law, and be permitted to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. (Globe, p. 1085.)

The new proposal, however, would authorize Congress to legislate not merely to ensure equality of protection but to set the measure of equality. (Globe, p. 1087.)

Mr. Bingham then took the floor again for his proposal. To him,

> The proposition pending before the House is simply a proposition to arm the Congress * * * with the power to enforce the bill of rights as it stands in the Constitution today. (Globe, p. 1088.)

The proposal did not invade reserved State rights, for no State could claim to have reserved the authority to withhold privileges or impose burdens on a citizen contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. (Globe, p. 1089.) While he conceded the bill of rights was in terms only a limitation on national powers, it was nonetheless a recognition that the rights enumerated were a part of the rights of a citizen. (Globe, p. 1090.) If a State official denied rights therein declared, he invaded the privileges and immunities of a citizen and thereby violated his oath to uphold and preserve the Constitution. (Globe, p. 1094.) The Constitution, moreover, provided or declared:

> that no man, no matter what his color, no matter beneath what sky he may have been born, no matter in what disastrous conflict or by what tyrannical hand his liberty may have been cloven down, no matter how poor, no matter how friendless, no matter how ignorant, shall be deprived of life or liberty or property without due process of law—law in its highest sense, that law which is the perfection of human reason, and which is impartial, equal, exact justice * * *. (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

To make it possible that every man in the country would be secure in the "equal protection of his personal rights" through the medium of national law, the proposed amendment was required. (Ibid.) This end the amendment would reach, for by the term "equal protection" it would confer "upon Congress power to see to it that the protection given by the laws of the States shall be equal in respect to life and liberty and property to all persons." (Ibid.)

Congressman Hotchkiss of New York expressed dissatisfaction with the measure because it did not accord sufficient protection for the equal rights of citizens. To him, the provision that Congress should guarantee the equality of protection would mean that the protection given would depend upon the caprice of a majority of the Congress. (Globe, p. 1095.) Equal protection should instead be made a > constitutional right that cannot be wrested from any class of citizens, or from the citizens of any State by mere legislation. (Ibid.)

He expressed instead the desire that > the very privileges for which the gentleman is contending shall be secured to the citizens; but I want them secured by a constitutional amendment that legislation cannot override. (Ibid.)

At that point, a motion to postpone consideration was agreed to by a vote of 110 to 37. (Globe, p. 1095.) No further action was taken thereafter on this separate proposal.

3. The Fourteenth Amendment

On April 21, 1866, Thaddeus Stevens laid before the Joint Committee on Reconstruction an overall plan for reconstruction. (Committee Journal, p. 28.) He stated that the plan was not original with him, but was one which he would support. Included in the plan was a constitutional amendment, combining the principal proposals for amendment previously introduced. It contained a guarantee of civil rights and suffrage, and provisions for apportionment revision, repudiation of the Confederate debt, and congressional enforcement power.

Section 1 of the proposed amendment read:

> No discrimination shall be made by any State, nor by the United States, as to the civil rights of persons because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. (Ibid.)

Representative Bingham moved to amend this section by adding:

> Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, nor take private property for public use without just compensation. (Committee Journal, p. 29.)

The committee rejected this amendment, and accepted the original language. (Ibid.) Later, Bingham obtained Committee approval of a new section, in addition to the section 1 already in the proposal, in these words:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. (Committee Journal, p. 30.)

On April 25, this section was deleted from the proposal, but at the next meeting, on the 28th, it was voted back in to replace the original section 1. (Committee Journal, pp. 35, 39.) That same day, April 28, 1866, a final draft of the proposed amendment, containing Bingham's section 1, was adopted for formal report to both Houses. (Committee Journal, pp. 43, 44.) The proposal was received in both Houses on April 30, 1866, without written report, and, in the House, as H. J. Res. 127, it was made a special order for May 8. (Globe, pp. 2265, 2286.)

On that day, the discussion of section 1 commenced with some brief remarks by Stevens on behalf of the Joint Committee. He stated that the provisions of the section > are all asserted, in some form or another, in our Declaration or organic law. But the Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States, so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree. Whatever law protects the white man shall afford 'equal' protection to the black man. Whatever means of redress is afforded to one shall be afforded to all. Whatever law allows the white man > to testify in court shall allow the man of color to do the same. (Globe, p. 2459.)

He referred to state laws which imposed on Negroes disqualifications from testifying in courts, or imposed different methods of trial or different punishment, but said he would not "enumerate these partial and oppressive laws." (Ibid.) However,

> Unless the Constitution should restrain them those States will all, I fear, keep up this discrimination, and crush to death the hated freedmen. (Ibid.)

Representative Stevens stated that he anticipated that objections would be made that the "civil rights bill secures the same things." (Ibid.) But that was only "partly true;" besides,

> a law is repealable by a majority. * * * This amendment once adopted cannot be annulled without two thirds of Congress. That they will hardly get. (Ibid.)

Representative Finck of Ohio was opposed to the amendment, but his only remark about section 1 was that > if it is necessary to adopt it, in order to confer upon Congress power over the matters contained in it, then the civil rights bill, which the President vetoed, was passed without authority, and is clearly unconstitutional. (Globe, p. 2461.)

James A. Garfield of Ohio replied to Mr. Finck, as follows:

> The civil rights bill is now a part of the law of the land. But every gentleman knows it will cease to be a part of the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> law whenever the sad moment arrives when that gentleman's party comes into power. It is precisely for that reason that we propose to lift that great and good law above the reach of political strife, beyond the reach of the plots and machinations of any party, and fix it in the serene sky, in the eternal firmament of the Constitution, where no storm of passion can shake it and no cloud can obscure it. (Globe, p. 2462.)

The first section proposed to hold > over every American citizen, without regard to color, the protecting shield of law. (Ibid.)

Representative Thayer also stated that, while this section contained the "principle of the civil rights bill," it was included not because "that law cannot be sustained as constitutional," but to insure that > that provision so necessary for the equal administration of the law, so just in its operation, so necessary for the protection of the fundamental rights of citizenship, shall be forever incorporated in the Constitution of the United States. (Globe, p. 2465.)

The next day, May 9, 1866, Representative Broomall of Pennsylvania stated his impatience with those who believed that the civil rights bill was unconstitutional, but on "so vital a point I wish to make assurance doubly sure." (Globe, p. 2498.) Mr. Raymond of New York commented on the "somewhat curious history" of the "principle" of the first section, "which secures an equality of rights among all the citizens of the United States":

> It was first embodied in a proposition introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bingham], in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, giving to Congress power to secure an absolute equality of civil rights in every State in the Union. It was discussed somewhat in that form, but encountering considerable opposition from both sides of the House, it was finally postponed, and is still pending. Next it came before us in the form of a bill, by which Congress proposed to exercise precisely the powers which that amendment was intended to confer, and to provide for enforcing against State tribunals the prohibitions against unequal legislation. (Globe, p. 2502.)

Even though the new proposal would amend the Constitution to confer on Congress the power to pass the bill he had twice voted against, he favored the proposal, for he was "heartily in favor of the main object which that bill was intended to secure." That object, he said, was to secure "an equality of rights to all citizens of the United States." All that he had sought was to have this done by constitutional means. (Ibid.)

Section 1 was briefly referred to by Representative Miller of Pennsylvania. In his view, > it is so just * * * and so clearly within the spirit of the Declaration of Independence of the 4th of July, 1776, that no member of this House can seriously object to it. (Globe, p. 2510.)

Representative Eliot of Massachusetts supported the first section "because the doctrine it declares is right," even as he had supported the civil rights bill; but while he was of the view that the bill

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

was amply authorized, he would gladly "incorporate into the Constitution provisions which will settle" any doubt on that question. (Globe, p. 2511.)

On the following day, May 10, 1866, the debate in the House was concluded. Representative Randall of Pennsylvania was the first speaker. Arguing in opposition to section 1, he claimed:

> The first section proposes to make an equality in every respect between the two races, notwithstanding the policy of discrimination which has heretofore been exclusively exercised by the States, which in my judgment should remain and continue. They relate to matters appertaining to State citizenship, and there is no occasion whatever for the Federal power to be exercised between the two races at variance with the wishes of the people of the States. (Globe, p. 2530.)

Another Pennsylvanian, Representative Strouse, continued the opposition, inquiring what necessity there was at the present time that demanded the change which this Amendment called for:

> I am answered that the necessity grows out of the war, that the South is vanquished, the negroes are liberated, and that therefore the organic law must be so amended that the emancipated slave shall in all respects be the equal of the white man. (Globe, p. 2531.)

Representative Rogers of New Jersey asserted that "the first section of this programme of disunion is the most dangerous to liberty." (Globe, p. 2538.) This section, he said, > is no more nor less than an attempt to embody in the Constitution of the United States that outrageous and miserable civil rights bill which * * * was vetoed by the President of the United States upon the ground that it was a direct attempt to consolidate the power of the States and to take away from them the elementary principles which lie at their foundation. (Ibid.)

The breadth of the term "privileges and immunities" guaranteed by the first section would, he claimed, "prevent any State from refusing to allow anything to anybody." The whole purpose of this was the "negro again," but this "Government was made for white men and white women." (Ibid.)

Representative Farnsworth of Illinois, stated that most of the first section was harmless surplusage, except for the provision that no person should be denied the equal protection of the laws. (Globe, p. 2539.) As for that provision, was it not, he asked, "the very foundation of a republican government?" Enjoyment of equal rights of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" required, he thought, the "equal protection of the laws." (Ibid.)

To Bingham, the necessity of the first section was "one of the lessons that have been taught * * * by the history of the past four years of terrific conflict." (Globe, p. 2542.) It would supply the want in the Constitution of a > power in the people, the whole people of the United States, by express authority of the Constitution to do that by congressional enactment which hitherto they have not had the power to do, and have never

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> even attempted to do; that is, to protect by national law the privileges and immunities of all the citizens of the Republic and the inborn rights of every person within its jurisdiction whenever the same shall be abridged or denied by the unconstitutional acts of any State. (Ibid.)

This proposition would not involve taking any rights from the states, for

> No State ever had the right, under the forms of law or otherwise, to deny to any freeman the equal protection of the laws or to abridge the privileges or immunities of any citizen of the Republic, although many of them have assumed and exercised the power, and that without remedy. (Ibid.)

Finally, he asserted, the section would satisfy the great want of the Constitution in protecting citizen and stranger, "protection by national law from unconstitutional state enactments." (Globe, p. 2543.)

After Stevens' final speech dealing generally with reconstruction, the vote was taken, and on May 10, 1866, the Amendment passed the House by a vote of 128 to 37, more than the necessary two-thirds. (Globe, p. 2545.)

In the Senate, the proposal was first brought up on May 23, 1866, nearly two weeks after the House action. (Ibid., p. 2763.) Senator Howard of Michigan made the report for the Committee, in lieu of the Chairman, Senator Fessenden, who was unable to do so because of illness. (Globe, p. 2764.) Howard commented on section one in great detail, particularly with reference to the privileges and immunities of

United States citizenship. (Globe, p. 2765.) Among those privileges and immunities he included the rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights. Because they were expressed as limitations only on the Federal government, they could not, he said, be enforced formerly against the States by the national government. (Ibid.) With respect to the last two clauses of that section, he stated that they applied, not merely to citizens of the United States, but to "any person, whoever he may be"; and that

> This abolishes all class legislation in the States and does away with the injustice of subjecting one caste of persons to a code not applicable to another. (Globe, p. 2766.)

This would protect > the black man in his fundamental rights as a citizen with the same shield which it throws over the white man. (Ibid.)

To Senator Howard, the first section was only a "restriction upon the States", and did not "confer any power upon Congress." The necessary enforcement power was derived from the fifth section of the proposal, giving Congress authority "to pass laws which are appropriate to the attainment of the great object of the amendment." These two sections were very important, he thought, for, if the amendment was adopted by the states, they would > forever disable every one of them from passing laws trenching upon those fundamental rights and privileges which pertain to citizens of the United States, and to all persons who may happen to be within their > jurisdiction. It establishes equality before the law, and it gives to the humblest, the poorest, the most despised of the race the same rights and the same protection before the law as it gives to the most powerful, the most wealthy, or the most haughty. That, sir, is republican government, as I understand it, and the only one which can claim the praise of a just Government. Without this principle of equal justice to all men and equal protection under the shield of the law, there is no republican government and none that is really worth maintaining. (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The fifth section of the proposal, Howard repeated, would enable

> Congress, in case the States shall enact laws in conflict with the principles of the amendment, to correct that legislation by a formal congressional enactment. (Globe, p. 2768.)

Senator Wade of Ohio followed Howard to propose an amendment. (Globe, 2768.) He commented upon the lack of any exact definition of the term "citizen of the United States." While he had "always believed that every person, of whatever race or color, who was born within the United States was a citizen of the United States," and felt that any real doubt on the subject had been settled by the civil rights bill, still > by the decisions of the courts there has been a doubt thrown over that subject; and if the Government should fall into the hands of those who are opposed to the views that some of us maintain, * * * they may construe the provision in such a way as we do not think it liable to construction at this > time, unless we fortify and make it very strong and clear. (Ibid.)

He therefore proposed to fortify section 1 by inserting in the first clause, in lieu of "citizens of the United States", the words "persons born in the United States or naturalized by the laws thereof." (Ibid.)

On May 24, 1866, Senator Stewart of Nevada spoke more generally on the proposal as a plan of reconstruction. (Globe, p. 2798.) However, he referred to the purposes of section one in his discussion of the principal point of difference between the Congress and the President. In his view, the President's restoration plan "ignored the rights and excluded from constitutional liberty four million loyal citizens guilty of no offense"—the freedmen. (Ibid.) The difficulty, as Stewart saw it, was that mere restoration of the Southern states would permit the people of those states to continue "to apply the theories of slavery to a condition of freedom," a dangerous evil; yet

> They were educated to believe that a negro was a slave, possessing no rights that a white man was bound to respect, and they believed it still, and they are astonished at the inconsistencies of the world and its tendency to recognize the rights of man. (Globe, p. 2799.)

Senator Stewart said that Negro suffrage was the only final answer to "slavery and the inequality of human rights," rather than the guarantees afforded by the proposal. (Ibid.)

Following Senator Stewart's speech, further debate was postponed. (Globe, p. 2804.) Consideration of the constitutional amendment was not resumed until five days later, on May 29, 1866. (Globe, p. 2868.) At that time Senator Howard offered various amendments to the proposal, as he stated, "after consultation with some of the friends of this measure." (Globe, p. 2869.) All but the enforcement section were to be amended. In section one the following declaration of citizenship was to be inserted as an opening sentence:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> All persons born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside. (Ibid.)

On the following day, Senator Howard began the discussion on these new amendments. He asserted that the purpose of the first amendment, a "great desideratum," was to settle the "great question of citizenship" and to remove "all doubt as to what persons are or are not citizens of the United States." (Globe, p. 2890.) After objections from Senators Cowan of Pennsylvania and Doolittle of Wisconsin that this phraseology would include, within the group classified as citizens, Gypsies, Chinese and Indians not taxed (Globe, pp. 2890, 2892), the amendment to section 1 was agreed to without a roll call (Globe, p. 2897).

Consideration of section 1 was resumed on June 4, 1866. (Globe, p. 2938.) Senator Hendricks of Indiana called the proposed amendment a matter of party politics, a mere "party programme." (Ibid.) He thought it unthinkable that United States citizenship should be degraded by application to a "mixed population, made up of races that ought not to mingle." (Globe, p.

2939.) The whole proposal, in his view, was merely a centralization of "absolute and despotic power." (Globe, p. 2940.)

On the following day, June 5, 1866, Senator Luke Poland of Vermont spoke in favor of the proposal. (Globe, p. 2961.) He asserted that the privileges and immunities clause of section one of the proposal was largely a restatement of the provision in the original Constitution. The restatement was necessary, he said, because, "by and for the protection of the peculiar system of the South," there had been a "practical repudiation of the existing provision on this subject." (Ibid.) The war and the Thirteenth Amendment, however, made it "eminently proper and necessary that Congress should be invested "with enforcement powers with respect to this provision. (Ibid.) Poland thought that the remainder of section 1 was unobjectionable, for "the whole people of the nation stand upon the basis of freedom", and it was merely in keeping with the very spirit and inspiration of our system of government," as "declared in the Declaration of Independence." However, he said, > we know that State laws exist, and some of them of very recent enactment, in direct violation of these principles. Congress has already shown its desire and intention to uproot and destroy all such partial State legislation in the passage of what is called the civil rights bill. The power of Congress to do this has been doubted and denied by persons entitled to high consideration. It certainly seems desirable that no doubt should be left existing as to the power of Congress to enforce principles lying at > the very foundation of all republican government if they be denied or violated by the States * * *. (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Senator Timothy Howe of Wisconsin, after stating the need for radical reconstruction policies, replied to Senator Hendricks' contention that state rights were invaded by the proposal. (Globe, Appendix, pp. 217, 219.) He felt that no state had a right to have "an appetite so diseased as seeks to abridge these privileges and these immunities, which seeks to deny to all classes of its citizens the protection of equal laws." (Globe, Appendix, p. 219.) It was a known fact, he asserted, that, except for federal authority, the Southern states would have "denied to a large portion of their respective populations the plainest and most necessary rights of citizenship," the right to own land, to collect wages by legal process, to appear in courts, to give testimony. (Ibid.) Most of these states had abandoned their attempts to deny these basic rights, but > these are not the only rights that can be denied; these are not the only particulars in which unequal laws can be imposed. (Ibid.)

He stated that he did not wish to delay the Senate by referring to more than a single instance of unequal laws—"a statute enacted by the Legislature of Florida for the education of her colored people." He asserted that this was reputedly the first Southern state to attempt the work of educating the children of her colored population:

> And now, sir, I ask the attention of the Senate to the provision which that Legislature made for the education of their colored population. They make provision for the education of their white children also, and everybody who has any property there is taxed for the education of the white children. Black and white are taxed alike for that purpose; but for the education of colored children a fund is raised only from colored men. It amounts to one dollar a head upon all colored males between the ages of twenty-one and fifty-five years. There were in 1860 between twelve thousand three hundred and twelve thousand four hundred colored males between the ages of twenty and fifty-five in Florida, so that that fund would yield about twelve thousand dollars dedicated to the work of educating the colored children of Florida—not a magnificent endowment, one would think. But how is it to be expended? First, there is to be a superintendent of colored schools for the State to be paid out of it, and he is to receive a salary of $2000. That reduces it essentially. Next, there is to be an assistant superintendent of colored schools for each county at $200 a year. There are in the State of Florida, I believe, thirty-nine counties, which would give $7800 to the assistant superintendents. Add that to the salary of the State superintendent, and it takes $9800 from the school fund to pay the superintendents, leaving $2200 to pay the teachers. But the fund is not left quite so destitute as that; they require each one of the teachers to pay five dollars to the fund to get a license to teach. They are to be examined, their fitness ascertained, and if permission is given them to teach they are to pay five dollars, and that goes to the fund. That swells it; when that license is purchased they can set up a school.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> Into that school, however, it is worthy of remark that no child can go without permission of the superintendent or his assistant, and no child can stay a day without the permission of the superintendent or his assistant, and the teacher who has paid five dollars for the permission to teach cannot hold that permission a day longer than the superintendent or assistant superintendent sees fit to allow, for the statute expressly authorizes the superintendent or assistant superintendent to vacate or annul the certificate whenever he shall see fit for incompetency or 'other good cause'—any cause which seems good to the superintendent or assistant superintendent." (Globe, Appendix, p. 219.)

Senator Howe then asked if, in view of this statute, touching "one of the great interests not only of this colored population but of the State itself," there could be any hesitation in putting into the Constitution a "positive inhibition upon exercising this power of local government to sanction such a crime as I have just portrayed." (Ibid.)

On June 7, 1866, when consideration of section 1 was resumed, Senator Garrett Davis of Kentucky stated that the majority were playing a "bold and desperate political game," (Globe, Appendix, p. 238), and that he was opposed not merely to the language of the proposal, but to the whole spirit and purpose of such an amendment. (Ibid.) As for the citizenship amendment to the first section, its > real and only object * * * is to make negroes citizens, to prop the civil rights bill, and give them a more plausible, if not a > valid, claim to its provisions, and to press them forward to a full community of civil and political rights with the white race, for which its authors are struggling and mean to continue to struggle. (Globe, Appendix, p. 240)

To Senator Davis, the "perpetual howl for justice and protection to 'the loyal citizens of African descent' * * *" was mere machinery of the radicals for "their continuance in office and power." (Globe, Appendix, p. 243.)

On June 8, 1866, the last day of the Senate debate, consideration of the proposed amendment commenced with a speech by Senator Henderson of Missouri. (Globe, p. 3031.) Speaking in favor of the proposal, he stated:

> The South saw its opportunity and promptly collected together all the elements of prejudice and hatred against the negro for purposes of future party power. They denied him the right to hold real or personal property, excluded him from their courts as a witness, denied him the means of education, and forced upon him unequal burdens. Though nominally free, so far as discriminating legislation could make him so he was yet a slave. (Globe, p. 3034.)

The Southern argument that the Negro was "inferior to the white man" when it came into conflict with the "opposite idea of man's equality * * *, carrying with it equal rights and equal privileges" had been the cause of the war. (Ibid.) It was necessary therefore "to consider whether the cause of disease should be removed entirely or be left in the system to fester again." (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Henderson stated that section 1 of the proposed amendment, in its declaration of citizenship of the United States, and of the States as well, was really unnecessary to overrule the Dred Scott case. (Globe, p. 3032.) By the reasoning used in that case itself, the Thirteenth Amendment had made the freed slaves an indistinguishable part of the "people of the United States." (Ibid.) This section, however, in leaving "citizenship where it now is," made plain "what has been rendered doubtful by the past action of the Government." (Globe, p. 3031.) This being clear, he said, there was no further need to discuss the remaining parts of section one, "for they merely secure the rights that attach to citizenship in all free Governments." (Ibid.)

Senator Yates also stated that, under the Thirteenth Amendment, the Negro was a citizen already, for > that amendment did not confer freedom upon the slave, or upon anybody, without conferring upon him the muniments of freedom, the rights, franchises, privileges that appertain to an American citizen or to freedom, in the proper acceptation of that term. (Globe, p. 3037.)

By virtue of that amendment, the freed slave became "one of the people, one of the body-politic, and entitled to be protected in all his rights and privileges as one of the citizens of the United States." (Ibid.) Since the Negro was "like any other man, and not unlike him in any respect," he had "the same right, the same inherent, if you choose, God-given right * * *." (Ibid.)

Senator Yates referred to the possibility that adoption of the proposed amendment might conceivably be held to restrict the broad operation of the Thirteenth Amendment. He felt that the proposal should contain a declaration that it should not be construed to impair or in any wise affect the rights, privileges or franchise conferred by the Thirteenth Amendment. (Globe, p. 3037.) This was not propounded, he stated, from a belief that it was really necessary, but merely > so that there shall not be even a color for any judicial decision proposing to deprive men of rights which are already guaranteed by the recognized law. (Ibid.)

Senator Fessenden then moved to insert the phrase "or naturalized" in the first sentence of the first section, so that it should read: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the states wherein they reside." The amendment was adopted. (Globe, p. 3040.)

After an attempt to have the sections of the proposal submitted as separate articles (Globe, p. 3040), and to strike out the privileges and immunities clause for vagueness (Globe, p. 3041), the final vote was taken. (Globe, p. 3042.) The amendment then passed the Senate, on June 8, 1866, by a vote of 33 to 11, more than the necessary two-thirds. (Ibid.)

In the House, the proposal was called up by Stevens on June 13, 1866. He pointed out that since the Senate amendments were slight, there was no purpose in discussing the proposal again at length. Therefore, he stated that he would

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

call the previous question at three o'clock. (Globe, p. 3144.) The brief discussion that ensued was without specific application to any particular part of the proposal. (Globe, pp. 3144–3148.) Finally, at three, the House concurred in the Senate amendments by a vote of 120 to 32, and the proposed Fourteenth Amendment was declared passed by the Thirty-ninth Congress. (Globe, p. 3149.)

E. THE READMISSION OF THE SOUTHERN STATES

The Reconstruction Act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 428), set conditions upon the readmission of the Southern states (all of the Confederate states except Tennessee) to representation in Congress. The first sections provided for military government in these States. Section 5 provided:

> * * * That when the people of any one of said rebel States shall have formed a constitution of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects, framed by a convention of delegates elected by the male citizens of said State, twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident in said State for one year previous to the day of such election, except such as may be disenfranchised for participation in the rebellion or for felony at common law, and when such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for electors of delegates, and when such constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the persons voting on the > question of ratification who are qualified as electors for delegates, and when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, and Congress shall have approved the same, and when said State, by a vote of its legislature elected under said constitution shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as Article fourteen and when said article shall have become a part of the Constitution of the United States, said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and senators and representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law, and then and thereafter the preceding sections of this act shall be inoperative in said State: Provided, That no person excluded from the privilege of holding office by said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States shall be eligible to election as a member of the convention to frame a constitution for any of said rebel States, nor shall any such person vote for members of such conventions.

281209—53——8

In compliance with this Act and with supplementary acts of March 23, 1867 (15 Stat. 2), and July 19, 1867 (15 Stat. 14), constitutional conventions were elected in these states, constitutions drawn up and submitted to popular vote, legislatures elected which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, and the constitutions submitted to Congress for examination and approval.

Two of these constitutions specifically provided for mixed schools (South Carolina, Art. X, sec. 10; Louisiana, Art. 135). The constitutions of the other eight states were silent on the question, but all contained provisions making it the duty of the legislature to provide for education.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

1. Congressional debates on the admission of the Southern states in 1868.

(a) Alabama. The first debates took place in 1868 in the Fortieth Congress, Second Session, on bills for the admission of Alabama. H. R. 904 was discussed in the House on March 11 (Congressional Globe, 40th Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 1818–28)[24] and March 17 (Globe, pp. 1934–38), and then recommitted to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The bill provided for the admission of Alabama "as one of the States of the United States" as soon as its legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment and "upon the following fundamental condition":

> That the right of suffrage of citizens of the United States shall never be denied or abridged in said State on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; and Congress shall have power to annul any act of said State in violation or in derogation of the provisions of this act. (Globe, p. 1822.)

In debate, Representative Beck of Kentucky objected to the equal rights provision of the Alabama constitution, Article I, Sec. 2, providing

> That all persons resident in this State, born in the United States or naturalized, or who shall have legally declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, [24] All references to the Congressional Globe in this section are to the 40th Congress, 2d Session.

> are hereby declared citizens of the State of Alabama, possessing equal civil and political rights and public privileges.

He remarked that

> No white man in Boston, Philadelphia, or New York, no Radical member of this House, would today consent to such a provision being incorporated into the constitution of the State in which he resides—that the hotels, the bedrooms, the dinner tables at which his wife and daughters were guests should be used and occupied by negroes of all grades indiscriminately with them * * * (Globe, p. 1824.)

Later, for himself and Representative Brooks of New York, he read a statement setting out eleven reasons why a majority of the Alabama electorate had not ratified the constitution, among them

> 7. Because it makes no provision for and does not make it the duty of the Legislature to appropriate the money raised by law for common schools, equally and separately, for the benefit of the white and black children in the State. (Globe, p. 1937.)

The bill was recommitted for consideration by the Committee on Reconstruction (Globe, p. 1938).

The Committee reported an amended bill as H. R. 970 on March 26 (Globe, p. 2138). In the debate on this bill, Representative Kelley, in arguing for the admission of Alabama, referred to the fact that its constitution provides "for the right of every freeman to hold land and enjoy common schools * * *" (Globe, p. 2141). Later, in objecting to various "scandalous provisions"

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(Globe, p. 2197) in the constitution, Representative Kerr, of Indiana, called attention to its provisions for education:

> Mr. Speaker, I next invite attention to the provisions of this remarkable instrument on the subject of taxation for the maintenance of schools. Now, I desire it to be distinctly understood that I and, so far as I know, every gentleman on this side of the House, entertain as sincere a devotion to the interests and advancement of education everywhere as any men in this country; but we want those interests so advanced, so promoted, as not to make them the very engines of tyranny for the oppression, demoralization, and destruction of social and civil government. This constitution provides for the levying of most onerous taxes for the support of education in the State of Alabama. Those taxes must be nearly all paid by the white men of Alabama. Yet every dollar (and I assert this without the fear of successful contradiction)—every dollar that shall be so raised will go to the education of the negroes of Alabama and to the support of radical officers connected with its expenditure, not to the support and education of white children. Why? Because by your fundamental law you make it a perpetual obligation upon the people of Alabama that they shall educate all their children in the same schools; that they shall practically amalgamate; that they shall educate the white children in debasing, personal association with the black children under the control of your Freedmen's Bureau and the agents of your military despotism, or such other machinery as shall succeed them. Yet we are told that this is a government "republican in form." These white men of Alabama, in order to maintain their self-respect, their manhood, the integrity of their blood and race, will be compelled from their own impoverished pockets to draw whatever they may for the education of their own people, independently of any provisions that may be made by the State under this constitution. Why did you not suffer your political allies in the convention of that State to secure to the negroes their just proportion, or one half, or even more, of the school fund, and give to the white men the balance, so that the races might be educated apart? Would it have been anti-republican to make so just an adjustment? It would have secured justice and equality to both races in the enjoyment of the school funds. The refusal to do it is a disgrace to the convention and to the Radical party, and an outrage upon the white people.

Then this constitution gives to what it calls a school board legislative power, making them a sort of imperium in imperio. They may make laws; they may enforce those laws, no matter how rigid, how cruel, how exacting they may be, they must be obeyed until by the Legislature of Alabama they may be repealed. (Globe, p. 2197.)

Further debate made no reference to this question. (Globe, pp. 2197–2217.) The bill passed the House on March 28 (Globe, p. 2217), but was indefinitely postponed by the Senate (Globe, p. 3266, June 18, 1868).

(b) Arkansas. H. R. 1039, to admit the State of Arkansas to representation in Congress, was reported from the Committee on Reconstruction on May 8, 1868 (Globe, p. 2390).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In opposition to the bill, Representative Beck, of Kentucky, questioned the validity of the popular vote ratifying the constitution, and also objected to its provisions:

> Now, sir, I have not time to discuss the provisions of the constitution itself. Upon the question of education, upon the question of taxation, upon the power given to the commissioners appointed to control the election, and upon a variety of other questions, the constitution is, perhaps, the most objectionable that you ever saw. While they resolve in the ordinance attached to the constitution as follows:
>
> > "That this convention is utterly opposed to all amalgamation between the white and colored races, whether the same is legitimate or illegitimate.
> >
> > "We would therefore recommend that the next General Assembly enact such laws as may effectually prevent the same;"
>
> they require that the school fund, of perhaps $1,000,000, shall be kept for schools to which blacks and whites shall go together, and it compels a white man, if he is unable to educate his children otherwise, to send to the negro schools their sons and daughters between the ages of five and eighteen years for at least three years. The constitution requires the Legislature to pass such laws as will compel them to go. Of course it will be a penal offense if they do not go. That part of the constitution reads thus:
>
> > "The General Assembly shall require by law that every child of sufficient mental and physical ability shall attend the public schools during the period between the ages of five and eighteen years for a term equivalent to three years, unless educated by other means."

> Now, sir, I think this House, even now, after the previous question is seconded, in justice to itself, in justice to the truth of history, should postpone this matter and look into it, and I assert you will find the facts to be as I have stated them, and that there are in this constitution provisions more obnoxious than are contained in any other constitution that has been sent up from these southern States; provisions that no one can, with proper respect for himself, submit to as the fundamental law of the State in which he lives. (Globe, p. 2395.)

Representative Pile, of Missouri, asked to have read the Bill of Rights, the article on the subject of franchise, and the article on the subject of education. (Globe, p. 2397.) After they were read, he stated in support of the bill:

> Mr. Speaker, I think, sir, that these provisions of this constitution are the best answer to the arguments against it. I only wish to say in addition that it is a little remarkable to find the gentlemen who have for two years been clamoring for the admission of the unreconstructed States and abusing this side of the House because we were unwilling to admit them to representation on this floor, on what was alleged to be purely partisan grounds, should now oppose their admission for the simple reason that their constitution secures equal rights to all men, and that their State governments are in the hands of loyal instead of disloyal men. (Globe, p. 2398.)

The debates in the House contained no other reference to education (Globe, pp. 2390–2399), and the bill was passed. (Globe, p. 2399.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The bill was discussed in the Senate on May 13, and referred to the Judiciary Committee. (Globe, pp. 2436–2440.) It was reported back on May 16 (Globe, p. 2487), and debate began on May 27 (Globe, p. 2600).

Senator Drake, of Missouri, proposed in lieu of the House bill, an amendment whereby Arkansas should not be admitted until its legislature agreed to certain fundamental conditions, among them > that the third section of the first article of said constitution, in the words following, to wit: "The equality of all persons before the law is recognized, and shall ever remain inviolate; nor shall any citizen ever be deprived of any right, privilege, or immunity, nor exempted from any burden or duty, on account of race, color, or previous condition," shall never be repealed or changed * * * (Globe, p. 2600.)

Later he modified the amendment to provide the "fundamental condition" of admission > that within the said State there shall be no denial of the elective franchise in all elections by the people or of any other rights to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed * * * (Globe, p. 2608.)

He modified this language slightly on the following day, May 28, to read:

> that there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed * * * (Globe, p. 2628.)

On May 30, Senator Henderson of Missouri announced that he was contemplating offering an amendment to the amendment of his colleague, Senator Drake:

> Now, Mr. President, if the proposition of the Senator [Ferry] from Connecticut prevails [a proposal to strike out all the bill except that part that states that Arkansas be readmitted into the Union], I desire to offer an amendment to be incorporated into the bill upon which I am willing to stand and it is a provision which I think the Senate ought to be willing to make. I would strike out the condition of the bill and insert one I propose to offer. I differ with gentlemen when they say they would insert no provision for security. I think we ought to do so. But what ought we to require? Is it that every negro in the southern States shall vote, whether he is qualified to vote for all time to come? I think not. What shall we do? We should say that the suffrage of the negroes shall be on an equal term with the suffrage of the white men. If the white man is to be excluded for a certain cause, let the negro also be excluded for the same cause; let us not declare, as this provision declares, that every negro, because every negro in Arkansas is entitled to vote under this constitution, shall vote for all time to come. But put him upon terms of equality with the white man; that is going far enough; and let both black and white be excluded from the polls for the same reason, as, for example, for want of sufficient intelligence to vote or for pauperism. Having stricken out the condition in the bill, I would insert a proposition of this character:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "Upon the fundamental condition that said State, in fixing the qualifications of electors therein, shall not be authorized to discriminate against any person on account of race, color, or previous condition; and also upon the further condition that no person on account of race or color shall be excluded from the benefit of education or be deprived of an equal share of the moneys or other funds created or used by public authority to promote education in said State."

Without the second condition of course they could exclude the negroes from any of the benefits of education, and thereby lay a foundation and produce a reason for excluding them from the suffrage; but if both were adopted, of course they are put upon an equality with whites, in reference not only to education, but in reference to the suffrage. (Globe, 2700–1.)

On June 1, Senator Henderson offered his amendment. (Globe, p. 2748.) The following colloquy then ensued:

> The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment to the amendment, and declared that the noes appeared to have it.
>
> Mr. HENDERSON. I call for the yeas and nays.
>
> The yeas and nays were ordered.
>
> Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that all that is contained in this amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDER-SON] is contained in the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand not. To what provision in the fourteenth amendment does the Senator refer?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights on account of race or color; and the only thing we want to provide for now is to prevent that discrimination in political rights, and that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri does.

Mr. HENDERSON. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri does not refer to political rights at all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I mean the amendment of your colleague [Mr. DRAKE].

Mr. HENDERSON. It says they shall not be denied any right.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The exercise of the elective franchise. That is a political right, I believe.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to have the amendment of my colleague read again.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment of Mr. Drake, as follows:

> That there shall never be in said State any denial or abridgment of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason or on account of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed.

Mr. HENDERSON. "Any other right." It does not mean a political right. The language is, shall not be denied "the elective franchise or any other right." I think that includes civil rights. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey whether, upon the adoption of this amendment of my colleague, in his judgment the State is permitted to provide separate schools for whites and blacks, or whether they must not be educated in the same schools?

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I cannot answer that question, for I do not think that either the constitutional amendment or the proposition of the Senator's colleague touches that question, as to what school they shall be educated in; but I think that the amendment as proposed, as well as the constitutional amendment, prevents a discrimination in civil or political rights on account of race or color.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I can state in a few words my view in offering this amendment. I desire that the negroes shall have an equal right in the school moneys, but that the State may require them to be educated in different schools from the whites. I propose that their rights shall be the same in the public funds, just as we have provided in the District of Columbia. Further, I do not desire to take away the right from the States to say who shall hold offices in the States. If they desire to say that the whites shall hold the offices, let them do so. I do not fear any provision of that sort ever being adopted in one of the States, provided this is a valid condition, because the negroes being entitled to the suffrage on equal terms with the whites, of course can protect themselves in that behalf. But I would not provide hereby a condition that the States should extend the same rights to the negroes in regard to office-holding, marrying, or anything else, that they do to the whites, and I think if we adopt a condition at all, we had better adopt it in the form in which I have presented it.

> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.
>
> The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 30 * * * *. (Globe, p. 2748.)

Senator Drake's amendment was agreed to (Globe, p. 2748), and the bill was passed with the condition in that form (Globe, p. 2750).

A conference committee recommended that the Senate recede from its amendment to the House bill, and the report of the conference committee was concurred in. (Globe, pp. 2904, 2938; 15 Stat. 72.)

(c) The omnibus bill. On May 11, 1868, a bill (H. R. 1058) to admit North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama to representation in Congress was reported from the Committee on Reconstruction. (Globe, p. 2412.) Debate began on May 13. (Globe, p. 2445.)

Representative Beck of Kentucky objected to the constitutions as drawn up by "men who had no substantial interest in the community * * *." (Globe, p. 2447.) He said:

> Take the case of South Carolina, for example, and I can only state a few prominent points. Of the men composing that constitutional convention seventy were negroes and about fifty white men. Of the men composing the present Legislature of that State seventy-one are colored and fifty-four white. One item of taxation alone in that State—the taxation for the support of free schools—amounts to $1,000,000. It is provided that the white race shall never > have any public school exclusively for themselves; that the white and the black children, male and female, shall be playmates and schoolmates together; that if the white citizens do not send their boys and their girls to the schools attended by the negroes they shall suffer such penalties as a negro Legislature may see fit to impose. Who are the men thus imposing these conditions upon the people of that State? (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Later he discussed Louisiana:

> Substantially the same provision in regard to education prevails there as in South Carolina. Taxation the most enormous, compulsory education of girls and boys at the same school with the negroes. They are all mixed together. A poor man cannot help himself. It is made a penal offense, or the Legislature has the power, and it is its duty to make it a penal offense, to refuse to allow them to associate together at the common schools. The man who is rich enough may employ a teacher of his own choice, and if he does so the compulsion ceases. But such has been the impoverishment at the South, as gentlemen well know, that few of the most intelligent and respectable people are really able to afford the means of education such as they used to afford, and they will therefore be compelled to send their children, whether they are willing to do so or not, to these mixed schools. I can scarcely conceive of a more despotic, galling, and degrading provision in the fundamental law of a State pretending to be free. (Globe, p. 2449.)

Representative Pruyn the next day made passing reference to this subject:

> The brief time for which I am entitled to the floor does not permit me to enter into any examination of the provisions of the several constitutions. Indeed, no sufficient time has been afforded to us for that purpose, as they were only laid on our tables yesterday. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] called the attention of the House yesterday to several most objectionable provisions which some of them contained, especially as to the compulsory education of whites and blacks together. But I must leave this part of the subject, and content myself with referring to some historical facts connected with the origin of the reconstruction measures. (Globe, p. 2461.)

Representative Bromwell spoke in support of the bill, not disagreeing with this interpretation of the constitutional provisions:

> The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has assailed these constitutions on account of the provisions they contain * * * The next ground of complaint is that common schools are provided for in this constitution. That, of course, awakens a double measure of wrath in this Democratic orator * * *. (Globe, p. 2464.)

The bill was passed by the House on May 14. (Globe, p. 2465.)

The bill was reported from the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on June 2 as a substitute for S. R. 135. (Globe, p. 2759.) Debate began on

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

June 5. Senator Trumbull explained the form of the "fundamental condition:"

> The first part of this fundamental condition is similar to the one which passed the House of Representatives in the Arkansas bill and which the Senate struck out and substituted for it an amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Drake] and the Committee have recommended the striking out of this fundamental condition and inserting the words contained in the amendment which was adopted by the Senate to the Arkansas bill with the exception of the words "or any other rights." These words which were in that amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri are omitted by the Judiciary Committee in reporting this bill, it being thought that there was no necessity for their insertion, and that it might lead to a misunderstanding as to what their true purport was. The citizens of these states are protected in all their civil rights independent of this bill; and it might lead to misconstruction or misapprehension as to what the words "any other right" meant. It might be construed by some persons as applying possibly to social rights, or rights in schools, which the Senator from Missouri did not intend; and as the Committee thought there was no importance in these words they are left out of the amendment. (Globe, p. 2858.)

The Committee on the Judiciary had amended the House bill to omit Alabama (Globe, p. 2858), but subsequently the Senate restored Alabama (Globe, p. 2965) and added Florida (Globe, p. 3018). The debates were concerned primarily with the status of Alabama, the authority of Congress to impose conditions on admission, the propriety of insisting no negro suffrage, and a proviso relating to Georgia. (Globe, pp. 2895–2904, 2927–35, 2963–70, 2998–3029.) There were no further references to education.

281209—53——9

The House agreed to the Senate amendments on June 12 (Globe, p. 3097) and the bill passed both houses on June 25 over the President's veto (Globe, pp. 3466, 3485). The Act (15 Stat. 73) contained no reference to equal rights or to education.

2. Congressional debates on the admission of Southern states in 1870

An Act of April 10, 1869 (16 Stat. 40), authorized the President to submit to popular vote in each state the constitutions of Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi, with power to submit portions to separate vote. After such vote and after ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment by these states Congress could approve the proceedings and restore the states.

(a) Virginia. On January 11, 1870, H. R. 783, to admit the State of Virginia to representation in Congress, was reported from the Committee on Reconstruction (Congressional Globe, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 362).[25] It recited that "the people of Virginia have adopted a constitution republican in form, and by its provisions assuring the equality of right in all citizens of the United States before the law" and declared Virginia entitled to [25] All references to the Congressional Globe in this section are to the 41st Congress, 2d Session.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

representation in Congress upon certain "fundamental conditions," including the following:

> Second. That the constitution of said State shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the right to vote or hold office in said State who are entitled to vote or hold office by said constitution, except as a punishment for such crimes as are now felonies at common law, whereof they shall have been duly convicted under laws equally applicable to all the inhabitants of said State, or to prevent any person on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude from serving as a juror or participating equally in the school fund or school privileges provided for in said constitution: Provided, That any alteration of said constitution, equally applicable to all the voters of said State may be made with regard to the time and place of residence of said voters.

The reason for the inclusion of the condition on schools was explained by Representative Paine as follows:

> I am about to give my reasons for supporting the Virginia bill presented by the Committee on Reconstruction with all its fundamental conditions. Why have we inserted in the bill the condition affecting the common schools? I will answer that question first.
>
> The men who elected Governor Walker manifested during the canvass a most intense and bitter hostility to the common-school system and the system of county organization provided for in the new consitution of Virginia. These two systems are intimately connected together. The fate of the school system hangs on the execution of the provisions relating to the county organization. A vigorous effort was made to induce the President to submit these provisions to a separate vote of the people. Of course the effort failed. It is hard for a northern man able to appreciate the benign influences of common schools upon the fortunes of a free Republic to contemplate this "chivalrous" hostility to the education of the people without unspeakable disgust. Governor Walker was supported and elected by the masses who stood in the ranks of the late rebellion. Outside of those ranks he had not, he has not now, a corporal's guard of supporters. He would have had no Republican votes at all but for a vague impression that the sympathies of the President were in that struggle opposed to the loyal people of Virginia. The Democratic Party abandoned Mr. Withers, the candidate of their choice, because they understood that Governor Walker, although a northern-born man, and a resident of a northern state, had opposed the Government during the Rebellion, and because in his speech at Liberty, in Bedford County, he had given them a pledge in these words, which I read from the address of their State Central Committee:

"If the Constitution expurgated shall be adopted, and you have elected your State ticket and your Legislature, you may proceed at once to propose such amendments to the Constitution as will clear it of all its dangerous characteristics. The County Organization need never be enforced. If I am elected with a Legislature not Radical it will never be put in operation."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> * * * Mr. Speaker, Governor Walker must do one of two things; he must either nullify the county and school systems of Virginia, or he must cheat the people who elected him. * * *
>
> Again, sir, it is admitted on all hands that at the present time colored men, although admitted to juries in the United States Court of Virginia by Chief Justice Chase have been excluded by local judges from all other juries in that State. I am at a loss to understand how the district commander could have permitted such a gross violation of the fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. (Globe, pp. 402–3.)

Later Representative Palmer, in speaking of "the evidences of the present disloyal sentiment of the people of Virginia" (Globe, p. 442), referred to education:

> More than this, it is known that the blacks in the States which have been reconstructed are voters, and they ought to be qualified by education to be intelligent voters. What is the spirit of the whites of Virginia toward the blacks in their midst on this subject of education? Sir, after the so-called Conservatives had accepted the aid of the blacks and had gone side by side with them to the polls, it would have been no more than decent on the part of the former to have extended every possible encouragement in the way of education to the latter. What have they done? They have not afforded a single dollar of aid for the establishment of common schools for either the blacks or the whites. On the other hand, you find that a military school in the city of Lexington, where the Federal flag is only > kept floating by Federal military force, and where the rebel youth of the South are taught to worship the memory of the "lost cause," receives the aid of an annual appropriation of $15,000 for its support from the Virginia treasury. You will find that there is an annuity also from the public treasury for the support of the institution over which presides the head of the rebel army, Robert E. Lee. You will also find a public annuity, and a liberal one, for the support of the university at Charlottesville, all for the benefit of the men who are the ruling class, the rebels of Virginia; but not a dollar, not a farthing for the blacks of that state. (Globe, p. 442.)

Representative Ward referred to the conditions as "simple, just, patriotic" and as necessary to a republican form of government. (Globe, p. 485.) Representative Conger, of Michigan, defended the conditions, asking

> Who desires to prevent any of the people of Virginia from enjoying the privileges of education as provided in this bill? Who would turn her children, of whatever condition, race, or color, away from her free schools, in the enjoyment of which they are guarantied by this bill? (Globe, p. 496.)

Representative Scofield, of Pennsylvania, spoke in support of the conditions:

> Mr. Speaker, this new constitution of Virginia has very wisely provided for equal franchise and equal education in that Commonwealth * * * we admit the State with the qualification that it shall not go back upon those just provisions of its constitution immediately after its admission.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Now, what great harm is there in that? Is there any member of this House who at this time would say, if he was a member of a convention to frame that constitution that he would vote against putting in the constitution a provision in favor of equal education and equal franchise? It is a part and parcel of the policy of the Republican party adopted ever since after the war began.

* * * * *

Then the next question is reconstruction with us was to educate these blacks so that they could not be restored to slavery; to destroy all hope of the restoration of slavery, and therefore all hope of a separate government. We began first with the civil rights bill, then with the Freedmen's Bureau bill, and then with the fourteenth article of amendment, and now with the fifteenth article of amendment to the Constitution.

And then the people of Virginia, in pursuance of that same policy, have provided in their state constitution for the education and the franchise of the blacks.

* * * * *

I have been somewhat surprised, sir, to see the earnestness with which these fundamental conditions have been advocated and opposed. I do not regard them as of so much importance. I regard the first provision, enjoining upon them to keep up free education and free franchise, as merely advisory. It is an intimation that we look upon those features of their constitution as the features that make it republican in form, and that if they strike them out we will undertake to restore them in some way or other. (Globe, p. 500.)

Representative Bingham's substitute containing no conditions was adopted by the House (Globe, p. 502), and the bill was passed on January 14 in that form. (Globe, p. 503.)

On January 17, the Senate took up the House bill. (Globe, p. 512.) Debate on January 18 was largely on the question whether Governor Walker was against a public school system. (Globe, pp. 539–49.) On January 20, Senator Wilson offered as an amendment a condition

> That the constitution of said State shall never be so amended or changed as * * * to prevent any person on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude from serving as a juror, or participating equally in the school fund or school privileges provided for in said constitution.

This was rejected. (Globe, p. 597.) After two more days of debate (Globe, pp. 597–614, 634–43) Senator Wilson again offered an amendment > that the Constitution of Virginia shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the school rights and privileges secured by the constitution of said State which was accepted (Globe, p. 643), and as thus amended the bill was passed (Globe, p. 644).

After brief debate on January 24 (Globe, pp. 715–20) the House concurred in the Senate amendments. Representative Butler, from the Committee on Reconstruction, remarked that > * * * these amendments of the Senate contain the substance of our reconstruction acts. They contain the substance of the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> thirteenth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. (Globe, p. 717.)

The act was approved on January 26 (16 Stat. 62).

(b) Mississippi. H. R. 1096, to admit the State of Mississippi to representation in Congress, was reported by Representative Butler from the Committee on Reconstruction on February 3, 1870. It contained the following condition, identical to that in the Virginia Act:

> third, that the constitution of Mississippi shall never be so amended or changed as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the United States of the school rights and privileges secured by the constitution of said state. (Globe, p. 1013.)

The bill was passed immediately. (Globe, p. 1014.) It passed the Senate on February 17, after six days of debate. (Globe, p. 1366.)

As reported from the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, the bill contained no conditions (Globe, p. 1173), but the House conditions were accepted after prolonged debate. In so far as school rights were concerned, the debate did not turn on the Fourteenth Amendment, but in response to the question of Senator Thurman of Ohio

> When did it become essential to a republican form of government that there should be public schools and that everybody should have an equal right in those schools? (Globe, p. 1218.)

Senator Howard of Michigan defended the condition:

> Now, sir, if there be any one proposition more generally admitted than another > among American citizens, politicians, and statesmen, it is that in order to uphold and maintain a republican form of government such as is understood and practiced on this continent, the diffusion of knowledge by means of primary schools is the greatest, the safest, and the most effectual instrument. Now, if Congress see fit to incorporate in this act for the readmission of Mississippi that she shall never make any discrimination between the races, either in the application of the funds set apart for the enlightenment of the people on whom, and on whom solely, rest the ultimate responsibility and existence of government itself, * * * I am prepared for one to say that Congress are acting justly, constitutionally, and righteously in inserting this condition * * * (Globe, p. 1253.)

In answer to a question from Senator Norton of Minnesota, Senator Howard asserted > * * * that if my State should become so smitten with judicial blindness as to disregard those high principles of republican government which she has carried out since her birth as a State; * * * if she should so far forget her right and duty to the children of the State as to pervert the school fund, which belongs to them, from inuring to their benefit and confer all its benefits upon a privileged class, refusing to extend them to the mass of the people, I should be the first, sir, to appeal to the Congress of the United States to apply the corrective * * * (Globe, p. 1254.)

Senator Norton denied that Congress had any right to regulate the school system of Minnesota. (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Senator Morton of Indiana answered Senator Thurman's question by saying that "definitions advance," that "if we have now amended the Constitution so that its essential character is changed, that amendment operates upon the definition of a republican form of government as defined in the Constitution as fully as if it had been put there in the beginning." (Globe, p. 1254.) He referred to the three amendments and concluded

> Then, to have a republican form of government now there must be no slavery, there must be equal civil rights, there must be protection to all, there must be no taking of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. (Ibid.)

Senator Carpenter disagreed. (Globe, p. 1323.) Senator Stewart of Nevada stated that > * * * if the State of Mississippi should pass a law which would deprive the colored man of the same rights and privileges of the schools that the white man has, or make any other discrimination which would deny him the equal protection and benefit of the laws, we have direct constitutional power to interfere; but I do not believe we can say in advance that she shall not change a particular provision of her constitution * * * (Globe, p. 1329.)

Further debate added little to these arguments. (Globe, pp. 1331–34, 1365.) The bill as received from the House was passed on February 17. (Globe, p. 1366; 16 Stat. 67.)

(c) Texas. The bill to admit Texas, H. R. 1536, containing the same condition, was reported to the House on March 15. (Globe, p. 1969.) It was passed immediately. (Globe, p. 1970.) It was reported to the Senate and passed on March 29, without debate on this condition. (Globe, pp. 2271–72.) The House concurred in a Senate amendment not relevant to schools. (Globe, pp. 2291–94; 16 Stat. 80.)

(d) Georgia. A bill, H. R. 1335, to admit Georgia to representation contained the same conditions as the Virginia bill. (Globe, p. 1701.) Debate began in the House on March 4 and continued to March 8, when the bill was passed. (Globe, pp. 1701–07, 1708–23, 1743–51, 1765–71.) Georgia had previously been admitted in 1868, but had again been placed under military control because of the action of its legislature in expelling colored members. (Globe, pp. 1702–03; 16 Stat. 59.)

In the Senate the bill occupied fourteen days of debate between March 14 and April 19, without reference to the school provisions. (Globe, pp. 1924–30, 1950–61, 1986–96, 2018–26, 2055–68, 2088–93, 2388–2400, 2422–30, 2606–17, 2639–48, 2672–78, 2709–26, 2741–53, 2809–29.) On April 19, the Senate substituted for the House bill admitting Georgia an amendment keeping Georgia under military government. (Globe, pp. 2819, 2821, 2829.)

In the House on June 23, Representative Butler from the Committee on Reconstruction reported the bill in about the same form as originally proposed. (Globe, p. 4749.) He stated that he did not think the conditions important in view of the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment (Globe, p. 4751), and so did not object to a proposed amendment by Representative Dawes which omitted the conditions. Representative Lawrence of Ohio proposed an amendment to the latter amendment to insert the condition relating to school rights and privileges (Globe, p. 4752), which was not agreed to. (Globe, p. 4796.) The Dawes amendment was adopted, and the bill passed by the House on June 24 admitted Georgia without conditions. (Globe, p. 4797.) The bill reported from the Conference Committee and accepted by both houses on July 14 substantially followed the House version, without conditions. (Globe, pp. 5581, 5583, 5621; 16 Stat. 363.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

F. CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1875

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

Whether or not a state should be permitted to segregate its public schools on a racial basis was considered by the Congress in connection with the legislation that became the Civil Rights Act of 1875, 18 Stat. 335. That consideration arose in connection with the Civil Rights bills offered by Senator Sumner and others during the years 1870–1875, bills that were considered in various forms in every session of every Congress between those dates. To simplify the history of that legislation, it is presented on a session-by-session basis.

41st Congress, 2d Session (Dec. 1869–July 1870)

Senator Sumner of Massachusetts introduced his Supplementary Civil Rights bill (S. 916) on May 13, 1870. (Congressional Globe, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 3434.) It provided civil and criminal penalties for any refusal of equal rights "in railroads, steamboats, public conveyances, hotels, licensed theatres, houses of public entertainment, common schools, and institutions of learning authorized by law, church institutions, and cemetery associations incorporated by national or state authority; also on juries in courts, national and state." (Ibid.) Without discussion, this bill was referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee. (Ibid.) Three months later, it was reported adversely by Senator Trumbull, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and further consideration was indefinitely postponed. (Id., p. 5314.)

41st Congress, 3d Session (Dec. 1870–March 1871)

Senator Sumner introduced an identical bill at the third session of the 41st Congress. (S. 1234, Congressional Globe, 41st Cong., 3d Sess., p. 619.) Like its predecessor, this bill was referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee, reported adversely by that Committee, and postponed. (Id., p. 1263.)

42d Congress, 1st Session (March 1871–April 1871)

Shortly after the opening of the 42d Congress, Sumner reintroduced his civil rights bill (S. 99), and, as before, it was referred to the Judiciary Committee. (Globe, 42d Cong., 1st Sess., p. 832.) It was, however, never reported.

42d Congress, 2d Session (Dec. 1871–June 1872)

(1) Senate

The bill, S. 99, which Senator Sumner had introduced in the first session of the 42d Congress, came up for consideration in the second session of that Congress, twice as an amendment attached to amnesty legislation that had already passed the House, and once directly in an amended form.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(a) The first Amnesty Bill. The preceding session the House had passed a bill (H. R. 380) to remove political disabilities imposed under section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment upon certain persons who had aided the Confederacy during the war. This bill came up for consideration in the Senate shortly after the opening of the second session of the 42d Congress in December 1871. (Congressional Globe, 42d Cong., 2d sess., p. 237.)[26] Senator Sumner almost immediately moved to amend the amnesty bill to add his supplementary civil rights bill to it. (Globe, p. 240.) After some discussion, Senator Frelinghuysen suggested certain amendments, among others, to permit churches, schools, cemeteries and institutions of learning, which had been privately established for the exclusive benefit of one race, to continue under the terms of their original establishment. (Globe, p. 435.) Sumner agreed to this modification (Globe, p. 453), and the Senate adopted his civil rights amendment, as thus modified, by a vote of 29 to 28. (Globe, p. 919.) However, when the bill itself as amended was put to a vote, it failed of the two-thirds majority required by section 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment, although a majority voted for passage. (Globe, p. 929.)

In the debate Senator Sumner stated that his civil rights bill was intended to enforce the principle of "equality before the Law" declared both by the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. To him, the term "separate but equal" was a contradiction and the separation of the races was an "indignity to the colored race" that was "Slavery in its last appearance." (Globe, p. 383.) Particularly, he regarded separate schools as unequal:

[26] Until further noted all references to the Congressional Globe are to the 42d Congress, 2d Session.

> The separate school wants the first requisite of the common school, inasmuch as it is not equally open to all; and since this is inconsistent with the declared rule of republican institutions, such a school is not republican in character. Therefore it is not a preparation for the duties of life. The child is not trained in the way he should go; for he is trained under the ban of inequality. How can he grow up to the stature of equal citizenship? He is pinched and dwarfed while the stigma of color is stamped upon him. This is plain oppression, which you, sir, would feel keenly were it directed against you or your child. Surely the race enslaved for generations has suffered enough without being compelled to bear this prolonged proscription. Will not the Republic, redeemed by most costly sacrifice, insist upon justice to the children of the land, making the common school the benign example of republican institutions where merit is the only ground of favor. (Globe, p. 384.)

To him, the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments had clearly established as a constitutional principle that > all persons without distinction of color shall be equal before the law. Show me, therefore, a legal institution, anything created or regulated by law, and I show you what must be opened equally to all without distinction of color. Notoriously, the hotel is a legal institution, originally established by the common law, subject to minute pro> visions and regulations; notoriously, public conveyances are in the nature of common carriers subject to a law of their own; notoriously, schools are public institutions created and maintained by law; and now I simply insist that in the enjoyment of those institutions there shall be no exclusion on account of color. (Globe, p. 242.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Senator Frelinghuysen agreed in principle with Sumner's views, but sought to amend his proposal to make it clear that schools and churches privately > established exclusively for either of the races, shall not be taken from their control, but remain devoted to their use. That provision modifies to some degree the law, but it does not affect the main subjects of the law, to wit, common carriers, innkeepers, schools, &c., but does perpetuate to the colored people their own institutions. (Globe, p. 435.)

As noted, Sumner consented to this exception of private schools. (Globe, p. 453.)

The general argument of the opponents of the bill was that it was unnecessary and an unconstitutional interference with state affairs. (E. g., Senator Thurman of Ohio, Globe, p. 496.) But the special argument against the school provision, as made by Senator Thurman, the minority leader, was that the mere separation of races in school did not mean inequality:

> All that can be claimed is this, that in regard to the schools supported by the public money, that money shall be so applied as that each citizen shall have an equal advantage from its application.

281209—53——10

> Therefore, preserving that equality, the State in the exercise of its power of regulation may apply a part of it to support a school for boys, a part of it to support a school for girls, a part of it to support a school for white children, a part of it to support a school for colored children. That is not denying them the equal protection of the laws in any sense whatsoever. * * * In no sense is it denying their equality before the law. (Globe, Appendix, pp. 26–27.)

Senator Hill of Georgia expressed the same general view:

> Nor do I hold that if you have public schools, and you give all the advantages of education to one class as you do to another, but keep them separate and apart, there is any denial of a civil right in that. (Globe, p. 241.)

(b) The second Amnesty Bill. Meanwhile, the House had passed a slightly different form of amnesty legislation (H. R. 1050), and, when that bill was brought up for Senate consideration, in Committee of the Whole, on May 8, 1872, Senator Sumner moved to substitute his civil rights proposal in lieu of the amnesty provisions. (Globe, p. 3181.) After some discussion, Senator Ferry moved to amend Sumner's proposal to eliminate its prohibitions against racial segregation in public schools. (Globe, p. 3256.) This amendment was rejected. (Globe, p. 3263.) Senator Blair of Missouri offered an amendment to leave the question of mixed schools to the option of local school authorities. (Globe, p. 3258.) This amendment was also defeated. (Globe, p.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

3262.) After several other amendments were considered, a vote was taken on Sumner's proposal to substitute his civil rights bill for the amnesty bill, and it was defeated. (Globe, p. 3268.) Immediately Senator Sumner moved to add his bill to the amnesty bill, and that proposal was adopted, the Vice President voting to break a tie. (Ibid.) The second amnesty bill, as thus amended, then received majority approval (32 to 22), but this was short of the necessary two-thirds for amnesty. (Globe, p. 3270.)

The debate added, to the points of view previously expressed in the consideration of the first amnesty bill, two thoughts. The first, expressed by Senator Trumbull, was that "the right to go to school is not a civil right and never was." (Globe, p. 3189.) Rather, he said, that was a "social right" and beyond proper regulation by the Federal government. (Ibid.) The second additional view was expressed by Senator Ferry of Connecticut. To him, so long as facilities given both races were equal, separation would not as a practical matter at that time violate any rights of either race. (Globe, p. 3190.) Separate schools would provide better educational facilities. He stated that mixed schools in the District of Columbia, for example, would "utterly destroy the school system" in the District, because > there are continually pouring into this District of Columbia colored laboring classes from Virginia, from Maryland, and from the surrounding country; the population of that class is increasing, as statistics show, with unparalleled rapidity every year; and their children, just emerged from the influences of slavery, naturally are felt by the > parents and guardians of those who have been long educated and cultured in schools as having a tendency, at any rate, to endanger those who are thrown into association with them in the common daily life of the common school. It may be true, or may be untrue, but the fact exists; and the tendency of compelling the two races to assemble in the same building is to drive out the very class of the community whom you wish to attach to your schools, by whom the schools are to be built up and fostered; whereas, what you need is to have the entire community interested in their support and preservation. (Globe, p. 3257.)

These views were taken up by Senators Edmunds and Morton. Senator Edmunds said:

> * * * if there is anything in that equality of right under the law, if it be admitted or established that a public school is a part of governmental regulation, designed for the benefit of the whole people, then you cannot get out by saying that there is an equality of right when you declare that you will put the black sheep in one place and the white sheep in another. Globe, p. 3190.)

Senator Morton answered Trumbull's contention, by stating > * * * that where schools are maintained and supported by money collected by taxation upon everybody, there is an equal right to participate in those schools. You may call it a civil right or a political right; and if there be a distinction, if a right to participate in these schools is to be governed by color or any other distinction, I say that is a fraud upon those who pay the taxes. (Globe, p. 3191.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(c) The Sumner Bill (S. 99). In the latter part of the session, Sumner's bill, which he had introduced in the preceding session, was taken up in his absence. (Globe, p. 3734.) It was amended to exclude reference to schools, among other things, and passed the Senate in that form. (Globe, p. 3736.) The Senate then reconsidered the second amnesty proposal. (Ibid.) Sumner, who was present by that time, again urged his bill as an amendment to the amnesty proposal, claiming that "without any notice" the Senate had adopted a civil rights bill "emasculated" by the removal of safeguards concerning schools and juries. (Globe, p. 3738.) He was unsuccessful in this attempt (ibid.) and Senator Conkling stated that this was because of the general view of the majority that the bill as passed was the "largest civil rights bill we can get." (Globe, p. 3738.)

(2) The House

A House bill (H. R. 1647) that was identical to Senator Sumner's could not be brought up for consideration because of the dilatory tactics of its opponents. (See Globe, pp. 1117, 1956, 2074.) Attempts to suspend the rules to bring up the bill gained majority approval, but not the two-thirds required to amend the rules. (Globe, pp. 1956, 3383.) Later, attempts were made to bring up the Sumner bill, in the amended form the Senate had adopted; again motions for suspension of the rules for that purpose failed to secure the necessary two-thirds. (Globe, pp. 3932, 4321–4322.) No further action was taken in the House during that session.

42d Congress 3d Session (Dec. 1872–March 1873)

During the third session of the 42d Congress, the Sumner bill (S. 99), as it passed the Senate in the form excluding reference to schools, was taken up by the House on March 3, 1873, and amended to add an amnesty proposal. (Congressional Globe, 42d Cong., 3d Sess., p. 2110.) However, although the bill received majority approval, it did not get the necessary two-thirds. (Id., p. 2111.) No further action was taken.

43d Congress, 1st Session (Dec. 1873–June 1874)

(1) Senate

Senator Sumner's bill prohibiting school segregation, was the first bill introduced. (S. 1; 2 Cong. Rec. 2.) After brief discussion, it was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and reported favorably by that Committee April 14, 1874.[27] (2 Cong. Rec. 12, 3053.) In the form reported it contained a prohibition against segregation in public schools. (2 Cong. Rec. 3451.)

The bill was taken up by the Senate on April 29, 1874 (2 Cong. Rec. 3450), postponed for a period, and finally passed May 22, 1874, after an all-night session (2 Cong. Rec. 4176). During the course of its consideration, several amendments were offered with respect to schools. Senator Sargent of California sought an amendment specifically to permit "separate schools for persons of different sex or color, where such separate schools are equal in all respects * * *." This was defeated. (2 Cong. Rec. 4167.) An amendment [27] Sumner died March 11, 1874.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

proposed by Senator Gordon of Georgia to strike out all reference to schools was also defeated. (2 Cong. Rec. 4170.) On the other side, an amendment by Senator Boutwell to prohibit voluntary segregation in schools was also defeated. (2 Cong. Rec. 4170.) The bill, as passed, was substantially as introduced, with a prohibition against segregated schools. (2 Cong. Rec. 4175–4176.)

Senator Frelinghuysen, in reporting the bill, stated its purpose to be the removal of racial discriminations so as to give to all persons in the United States "the equal protection of the laws." With reference to public schools, he stated

> The bill does not permit the exclusion of one from a public school on account of his nationality alone.
>
> The object of the bill is to destroy, not to recognize, the distinctions of race. (2 Cong. Rec. 3452.)

This prohibition, he said, was authorized by "the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, considered together and in connection with the contemporaneous history * * *." (2 Cong. Rec. 3453.)

Senator Pratt of Indiana stated that the bill would permit voluntary segregation, for "where the colored people are numerous enough to have separate schools of their own, they would probably prefer their children should be educated by themselves * * *." (2 Cong. Rec. 4082.) The minority leader, Senator Thurman of Ohio, replied:

> * * * I know that the first section of the bill may to a careless reader seem ambiguous, but I do not think there is one member of the majority of the Judiciary Committee > who will not say, if the question is put directly to him, that the meaning of the section is that there shall be mixed schools. (2 Cong Rec. 4088.)

While the most of Senator Thurman's speech was directed toward the general objection that the bill as a whole exceeded Federal powers, he did voice the objection to the school provision on the grounds that not only was it like the rest of the bill, unconstitutional, but that it would destroy the public school system in the South. (2 Cong. Rec. 4089–4090.)

Senator Stockton of New Jersey, noting that the Republican caucus had agreed to pass the bill and that he was helpless to alter that decision, objected that Equality did not mean Identity. (2 Cong. Rec. 4145.) Senator Howe of Wisconsin spoke in favor of the bill. (2 Cong. Rec. 4147–4152.)

Senator Pease, of Mississippi, summed up the position of the bill's proponents:

> Gentlemen say that if equal advantages in separate schools are provided the law is met so far as privileges and immunities are concerned. I say that whenever a State shall legislate that the races shall be separated, and that legislation is based upon color or race, there is a distinction made; it is a distinction the intent of which is to foster a concomitant of slavery and to degrade him. The colored man understands and appreciates his former condition; and when laws are passed that say that "because you are a black man you shall have a separate school," he looks upon that, and justly, as tending to degrade him. There is no equality in that. (2 Cong. Rec. 4154.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Senator Cooper of Tennessee, opposing the bill, objected to applying it to his home state, for it would > upset the whole common-school system of the State of Tennessee, because the whites are in a decided majority in the State; the colored people are in a minority but a very large minority, forming a large part of the people. Now by this one act of legislation you sweep out of existence the whole common-school system of the State. Whom have you benefited? You have benefited no one. You have injured the colored man as well as the poorer classes of the white race—those who are dependent for the education of their children upon the common schools. You have stripped them of all opportunity to give to their children any education whatever. (2 Cong. Rec. 4155.)

After further general opposition, by Senators Kelly (2 Cong. Rec. 4163–4164) and Merrimon (2 Cong. Rec. 4164–4166), Senator Boutwell offered his amendment to make it clear that segregation was unlawful even if voluntary. (2 Cong. Rec. 4167.) Senator Stewart opposed this amendment on the ground of "expediency," that the practical problem was "whether or not by this legislation you will aid to educate the colored man beyond what he would otherwise get." (2 Cong. Rec. 4167.) He believed that it "ought to be left optional to have schools mixed or separate as the people themselves desire." (Ibid.) Senator Frelinghuysen agreed. (2 Cong. Rec. 4168.) He particularly thought that the bill as drafted would permit such a "voluntary division" of races in the public schools, although he was clear that segregation could not be enforced by law. (2 Cong. Rec. 3452.)

Senator Sargent, who sought a more explicit provision for segregated schools, gave his summary of the problem:

> We ought to legislate here as statesmen, having in view not merely abstract ideas or theoretical principles or sublimated ideas, but to observe the condition of the times and know whether by any law which we may pass here we inflict an injury upon the country; whether we retard its prosperity; whether we overthrow its educational systems; whether we entail ignorance upon the coming generations; whether we destroy institutions which have proved their value, and which no man in his good senses, unbiased by bigotry, can deny are of inestimable value, ay, indispensable to the country. (2 Cong. Rec. 4172.)

His proposal was, however, rejected (2 Cong. Rec. 4175) and, as noted above, the bill passed the Senate with a provision against segregated schools.

(2) House

(a) S. 1. In the House, the Sumner bill (S. 1), after Senate passage, never formally came up for consideration during the remainder of the session. Attempts to bring it up were defeated. (2 Cong. Rec. 4242, 4439, 4691, 5162.) During one such attempt to suspend the rules to facilitate consideration of the bill, Representative Butler, Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, accompanied a motion to suspend with a statement that the suspension would permit a test vote to be taken on the school clause; but the opposition refused to agree to the rules suspension unless the school clause was stricken out. (2 Cong. Rec. 4439.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(b) H. R. 796. A House bill identical to the Sumner bill, had been referred to the Judiciary Committee early in the session. (H. R. 473; 2 Cong. Rec. 97, 98.) The Judiciary Committee, however, introduced its own bill, H. R. 796, containing a prohibition against racial segregation in public schools maintained in whole or in part at public expense, or by "endowment for public use." (2 Cong. Rec. 318.) This bill came up for consideration December 19, 1873, at which time attempts were made to arrange speaking time in order to prevent a filibuster. (2 Cong. Rec. 337, 338.) At that time, several amendments were offered relating to the school clause: Representative Eldredge offered an amendment permitting "separate but equal" accommodations; Representatives Potter and Whitehead moved to strike out all reference to schools. (2 Cong. Rec. 339.) After several days of debate, the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Representative Butler, moved to recommit the bill for reconsideration of the question of "mixed schools." (2 Cong. Rec. 455–458.) The bill not was not brought up again at this session.

Representative Mills of Texas stated that, if the school clause were passed, the Negro would be worse off than before, for

> The Legislatures of every State where the white people have control will repeal the common-school laws. Who, then, will take him by the hand and lead him to the schoolroom and pay for his tuition? (2 Cong. Rec. 385.)

Representative Durham of Kentucky agreed with Mills:

> I believe the passage of this bill will so embitter the white people of Kentucky that it will retard, rather than forward, the educational advantages of the blacks. I believe it will destroy our whole common-school system. (2 Cong. Rec. 406.)

Representative Blount of Georgia stated that enactment of the bill with the school clause would cause the white Southerners to withdraw support from the schools, so that

> The common schools will be abandoned, and the only hope for the moral and intellectual elevation of the negro will sink below the horizon forever. (2 Cong. Rec. 411.)

In answer, Representative Lawrence of Ohio refused to discuss the "expediency" of the bill, for

> It is always expedient to do right. Equality of civil and political rights, of all rights which exist under law, is simple justice. (2 Cong. Rec. 414.)

He supported the bill as drawn, since

> The fourteenth amendment was designed to secure this equality of rights; and we have no discretion to say that we will not enforce its provisions. There is no question of discretion involved, except as to the means we may employ. (Ibid.)

However, others of the majority did desire to give careful consideration to the effect of the bill on schools. Thus, in moving for recommittal, Representative Butler stated that "this question of mixed schools should be very carefully considered." (2 Cong. Rec. 456.) To him, the fact that the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"negroes * * * have never, till the last few years, had any opportunity for education," and the probability that the current feelings as to the "difference in the races" would disappear "in the next generation", justified careful reconsideration and perhaps modification of the mixed school provision. (2 Cong. Rec. 456–457.)

43rd Congress, 2d Session (Dec. 1874–March 1875)

During the second session of the 43rd Congress, nearly all the relevant discussion and action occurred in the House. Attempts were there made to bring up the Sumner bill (S. 1), which had passed the Senate the previous session with a prohibition of segregated schools. (3 Cong. Rec. 704. See supra, p. 149.) These were defeated, and, except for subsequent unsuccessful attempts to substitute its text for the House bill, the Sumner bill was not acted upon. (3 Cong. Rec. 704, 938, 1010.)

The House bill (H. R. 796) which had been recommitted to the Judiciary Committee the previous session, supra, p. 153, was again reported to the House December 16, 1874. (3 Cong. Rec. 116.) However, as reported, it contained an amendment expressly approving the maintenance by a state of "separate schools * * * giving equal advantages in all respects, for different classes of persons * * *." (Ibid.)

Attempts to bring the bill up were unsuccessful because of the dilatory tactics of its opponents, who kept the House from action for one continuous session of over 46 hours by motions to adjourn. (3 Cong. Rec. 786–828.) After amendment of the House rules to prevent a recurrence of this, the House bill was brought up for final consideration. (3 Cong. Rec. 890–902, 938.) After three days of debate, the bill was passed; but, just before passage, an amendment was adopted which struck from the bill all reference to schools, including the provision which permitted "separate but equal" facilities to be maintained. (3 Cong. Rec. 1010, 1011.) In that form, the Senate concurred, and the bill became law March 1, 1875, 18 Stat. 335.

The views expressed on the school issue on final House passage of the bill were mainly repetitive of those expressed in previous sessions. The floor leader for the bill, Representative Butler, stated that he had been given explicit instructions by his Committee:

> As instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, I propose to yield for a motion to substitute for this bill the provisions of the Senate bill on the same subject.[28] I am instructed by the committee then to yield to an amendment to be moved by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. White]. I will then yield to a motion to amend the bill by striking out all relating to schools. I do this in order that all shades of republican opinion may be voted upon. (3 Cong. Rec. 938.)

The amendment striking out all reference to schools, the only one of the series which was successful, was offered by Representative Kellogg.

---

[28]As has been noted, the Senate bill passed with a provision against segregated schools, while the House bill, as reported, contained an express provision for "separate but equal" schools.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(3 Cong. Rec. 939, 1010.) Mr. Kellogg explained the purpose of his proposal:

> The amendment I have proposed is to strike out of the House bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary all that part which relates to schools; and I do it, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of education, and especially in the interest of the education of the colored children of the Southern States. As the bill is now drawn, we recognize a distinction in color which we ought not to recognize by any legislation of the Congress of the United States. Sir, in the legislation of this country I recognize no distinction of color, race, or birthplace. All ought to be equal before the law; and the children of all should have an equal right to the best education they can have in the public schools of the country. But this bill proposes to make a distinction by a national law. The proviso to the first section is one that makes a discrimination as to classes of persons attending public schools; and I do not wish to make any such provision in an act of Congress.
>
> But upon this school question we should be careful that we do not inflict upon the several States of the Union an injury that we ought to avoid. A school system in most of the Southern States has been established since the war of the rebellion, by which the colored children of the South have the advantages of an education that they never could have before that time. I believe, from all the information I can obtain, that you will destroy the schools in many of the Southern States if you insist upon this provision of the bill. You will destroy the work of the past ten years and leave them to the mercy of the unfriendly > legislation of the States where the party opposed to this bill is in power. And besides, this matter of schools is one of the subjects that must be recognized and controlled by State legislation. (3 Cong. Rec. 997.)

Representative Burrows of Michigan stated:

> For the reasons I have urged and many others which might be mentioned I shall not under any consideration give my support to the separate school doctrine. Not only is it pernicious in itself, but it is the beginning of that class legislation which, if once entered upon, will know no end until it has brought to the weaker class of every race subjection and to the country only disaster and ruin. If you cannot legislate free schools, I prefer that the bill should be altogether silent upon the question until other times and other men can do the subject justice. (3 Cong. Rec. 1000.)

Representative Monroe of Ohio stated that the "separate but equal" clause in the bill would be a "dangerous precedent" for the reason that "it introduces formally into the statute law a discrimination" grounded on race. (3 Cong. Rec. 997.) This, he said, could seriously affect the future of the Negro, for

> The representative men of the colored race tell me that they would rather have their people take their chances under the Constitution and its amendments; that they would rather fall back upon the original principles of constitutional law and take refuge under their shadow than to begin with this poor attempt to confer upon them the privilege of education connected with this discrimination. (Ibid.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Rather than enact a provision explicitly approving racial segregation, Mr. Monroe stated that he understood the Negroes would > think their chances for good schools * * * better under the Constitution with the protection of the courts than under a bill containing such provisions as this. (3 Cong. Rec. 998.)

Representative Cain (a Negro) favored the proposed compromise, "for the sake of peace in the republican ranks, if for nothing else—not as a matter of principle—to except the school clause." (3 Cong. Rec. 957.) However, he could not agree to the "invidious discrimination in the laws of this country" involved in the "separate but equal" clause. (3 Cong. Rec. 981.)

The floor leader, Representative Butler, closed, as follows, with respect to the school provisions of the bill:

> There are two kinds of opinion in the republican party on this question. I myself would legislate equal privileges to white and black in the schools, if I had the power, first, to legislate, and, secondly, to enforce the legislation. But the difficulty I find in that is, that there is such a degree of prejudice in the South that I am afraid that the public-school system, which has never yet obtained any special hold in the South, will be broken up if we put that provision into the bill. Then comes the provision of the committee that there shall be separate schools wherever schools are supported by taxation. There are some difficulties with an unwilling people in carrying out that provision, and there is an objection to it on the part of the colored > people, because they say they desire no legislation which shall establish any class distinction.

>
> Then comes the proposition of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. Kellogg] to strike out all relating to schools. I should very much rather have all relating to schools struck out than have even the committee's provision for mixed schools. (3 Cong. Rec. 1005–1006.)

As noted, the Kellogg amendment was adopted, and the bill passed in that form. (3 Cong. Rec. 1010, 1011.)

II. The State Materials

Introductory Note

This portion of the Appendix contains the historical materials concerning the relevant actions of the thirty-seven states to which the Fourteenth Amendment was submitted for ratification.

The materials are arranged alphabetically by states. A brief summary precedes the presentation of the detailed materials for each state. The ratification proceedings are set out first. Then follows a description of the school system in the state in the period immediately preceding and following ratification of the Amendment, and of the legal provisions relating to the status of Negroes. In most instances our research has not extended beyond the year 1880.

In addition to the constitutions, session laws and the reports of court decisions, we have consulted the following state records, all of which are available in the Library of Congress: (1) The printed House and Senate Journals of each state;

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(2) the printed "Documents" submitted to the legislatures, which usually include the periodical reports of the state superintendent of schools; (3) the reports of legislative debates, which at the relevant period were published in only two states, viz. Pennsylvania (verbatim reports) and Indiana (summary reports); (4) the records of constitutional conventions which were held in the period immediately preceding or following the ratification of the Amendment. We have also examined the Microfilm Collection of Early State Records, prepared by the Library of Congress in association with the University of North Carolina, and collected and compiled under the direction of Professor William Sumner Jenkins.

ALABAMA

The Alabama Legislature rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in December, 1866. It ratified in July, 1868. The proceedings were perfunctory. On neither occasion was there any reference to the effect of the Amendment on school segregation. Prior to the Civil War there had been no public education for Negroes. The Constitution of 1867 provided for schools for all children; legislation approved in August, 1868, required separate schools for white and colored children.

RATIFICATION

The Alabama Legislature rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in 1866. In his message of November 12, 1866, Governor Patton recommended rejection. He objected to Section 1 of the Amendment because

> It would enlarge the judicial powers of the General Government to such gigantic dimensions as would not only overshadow and weaken the authority and influence of the State courts, but might possibly reduce them to a complete nullity. It would give to the United States courts complete and unlimited jurisdiction over every conceivable case, however important, or however trivial, which could arise under the State laws. Every individual dissatisfied with the decision of a State court, might apply to a Federal tribunal for redress. * * * The granting of such an immense power as this over the State tribunals would, at the very best, subordinate them to a condition of comparative unimportance and insignificance, and might prove utterly destructive of that full security for the enjoyment of all the legal rights of property, and those effective guarantees against arbitrary oppression, which the people have found in our present judicial system, ever since the organization of the Government.[29]

On December 6, 1866, Governor Patton made a contrary recommendation, declaring acceptance of the amendment to be a "necessity" in view of current congressional developments.[30] On December 7, 1866, the Senate, following the adverse report of its Committee on Federal Relations,[31] rejected the amendment by a vote of 28 to 3.[32] On the same day the House defeated a proposal to submit the ques-

[29] Senate Journal, 1866, pp. 32–33; House Journal, 1866, pp. 33–34.

[30] Senate Journal, 1866, p. 176.

[31] Id., pp. 154–5.

[32] Id., p. 183.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

tion to popular vote,[33] and rejected the amendment by a vote of 69 to 8.[34]

A year and a half later, on July 13, 1868, the Legislature ratified.[35] Ratification was perfunctory. In the House a resolution to ratify was introduced. The proceedings on the resolution were reported as follows:

> When Mr. Reeves moved to lay the resolution on the table;
>
> Lost.
>
> The vote was taken on the passage of the resolution;
>
> Which was adopted.[36]

The vote was 67 to 4.[37] The Senate proceedings were as follows:

> On motion of Mr. Foster the constitutional rule was suspended, and the joint resolution was read three times and passed forthwith—yeas 28, nays 0.[38]

SCHOOLS

Prior to the Civil War there had been no public education for Negroes, and it was a criminal offense to attempt to teach a Negro, free or slave, to read or write.[39] In 1854 provision was made for a free public school system for "all the chil-

---

[33] House Journal, 1866, p. 210.

[34] House Journal, 1866, p. 213.

[35] Alabama Laws, 1868, p. 138.

[36] House Journal, Extra Session, 1868, p. 9.

[37] Id., p. 10.

[38] Senate Journal, Extra Session, 1868, p. 10.

[39] Section 10 of "An Act to prevent the Introduction of Slaves into Alabama, and for other Purposes," approved January 16, 1832. Alabama Acts 1831, p. 16.

dren of our State."[40] In view of the prohibition against instruction of Negroes this implied only white children.

The Alabama Constitution of 1865 made it the duty of the legislature to encourage schools:

> The General Assembly shall, from time to time, enact necessary and proper laws for the encouragement of schools and the means of education * * *. [Art. IV, § 33]

The Constitution of 1867 was more detailed, saying in part:

> It shall be the duty of the Board [of Education] to establish, throughout the State, in each township or other school-district which it may have created, one or more schools, at which all the children of the State between the ages of five and twenty-one years may attend free of charge. [Art. XI, § 6]

It also gave the Board of Education "legislative power in reference to the public educational institutions of the State," subject to repeal by the General Assembly. Art. XI, § 5.

In the Constitutional Convention of 1867 proposals to require separate schools were defeated,[41] as was a proposal to permit the legislature to provide for separate schools.[42] One member protested the latter action as forbidding separate schools.[43]

The Governor's message of July 14, 1868, recommended that provision be made for education:

---

[40] Alabama Acts 1853–54, No. 6, p. 8.
[41] Convention Journal, pp. 153, 237–8.
[42] Convention Journal, p. 238.
[43] Convention Journal, p. 242.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> A sound and thorough common school system is not only the great want but the only hope of the Commonwealth. We are far behind most of our sister States in this respect. Thirty-seven thousand and six hundred of the adult white population of Alabama in 1860 could not read and write, and the colored people are still more deficient in education. * * * With enlarged freedom and full opportunities for individual development should come the most ample facilities for obtaining that information that makes a man the peer of his fellows, and enables him to protect his own interests, at the same time that he is better fitted to discharge his duties as a citizen. We must see to it that every one in the State shall have an opportunity of acquiring an education. * * * It is true economy for the State to promote the education of all her children, for by no other investment will she so surely and so abundantly be repaid. * * *
>
> It will be for the Board of Education to arrange the details of the school system, subject to your power of revision."[44]

The Board of Education passed "An Act to provide separate schools," approved August 11, 1868:

> Be it enacted by the Board of Education of the State of Alabama, That in no case shall it be lawful to unite in one school both colored and white children, unless it be by the unanimous consent of the parents and guardians of such children; but said trustees shall in all other cases provide separate [44] Senate Journal, Extra Session, 1868, pp. 14–15.

schools for both white and colored children.[45]

In 1875, the Constitution was amended to incorporate a requirement for separate schools:

> The General Assembly shall establish, organize, and maintain a system of public schools throughout the State, for the equal benefit of the children thereof between the ages of seven and twenty-one years; but separate schools shall be provided for the children of citizens of African descent. (Art. XII, Sec. 1.)

ARKANSAS

Arkansas rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in December, 1866. The legislature objected on the ground that the Amendment gave Congress the power to define the rights of Negroes. In April, 1868 Arkansas ratified the Amendment. The proceedings were perfunctory. No mention was made of the effect of the Amendment on racial segregation in the public schools. Negroes were excluded from the public schools in 1867. The Constitution of 1868 provided public education for all children, without specifying whether schools should be mixed or separate. In the debates on this issue in the Constitutional Convention no reference was made to the Fourteenth Amendment. School legislation enacted in July 1868 provided for separate schools for the two races. School segregation continued thereafter. The Arkansas Civil Rights Act of 1873 called for equal educational accommodations and advantages for all children of school age.

---

[45] Alabama Laws 1868, p. 148.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Arkansas Legislature in December, 1866, rejected the Fourteenth Amendment, in part because it construed the Amendment as giving Congress the power of "defining" the rights of the Negro. The House Committee on Federal Relations, reporting adversely on the amendment, stated:

> The first section declares who are to be citizens of the United States and of the several States, taking from the latter a power not exercised by them, in determining who shall enjoy that political right. The negro is embraced, and the States prohibited from abridging his immunities as a citizen of the United States; which amendment Congress with authority to define what rights he shall enjoy, and, by legislative enactments, elevate him to a political equality with the white race. It also transfers to Congress jurisdiction of the local and internal affairs of the States, virtually destroying the independence of their courts, and centralizing their reserved power in the Federal Government * * *.
>
> The fifth section would give Congress power to enforce the preceding provisions by appropriate legislation.
>
> Under that clause the sovereignty of the States might be completely subverted, by divesting them of the rights now secured by the Constitution.
>
> The amendment proposes changes to the fundamental law in direct antagonism with our system of government and upon terms dishonoring and degrading to the people of the Southern States.[46]

[46] House Journal, 1866, pp. 288–289.

The House followed this recommendation, rejecting the Amendment by a vote of 62 to 2.[47]

The Senate Committee on Federal Relations also reported adversely, saying in part:

> The great and enormous power sought to be conferred on Congress, under the amendment, which gives that body authority to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the first article of such amendment, in effect, takes from the States all control over all the people in their local and their domestic concerns, and virtually abolishes the States.[48]

Its report was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 24 to 1.[49]

In April, 1868, the Amendment was ratified by a unanimous vote in each house. Governor Murphy's message was of a perfunctory nature:

> On the 16th day of last June, the Secretary of State of the United States transmitted to me an attested copy of an amendment of the Constitution, to become a 14th Article, on which the decision of the Legislature of this State was required. That attested copy was transmitted to the late Legislature, with the message, by whom the amendment was solemnly rejected. As the reconstruction laws require the ratification of this 14th Article before the State will be received and recognized as a State in the Union, it will be unnecessary for me to say more to the present Legislature, composed of loyal citizens of the State, than merely call their attention

[47] Id., p. 291.

[48] Senate Journal, 1866–67, pp. 259–60.

[49] Id., p. 262.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> to the importance of early attention to the ratification of the same. In my last message, a true copy of the resolution and amendment will be found, to which I refer you.[50]

The House ratified immediately, on April 3, by a unanimous vote. Senate approval, likewise unanimous, followed on April 6.[51]

SCHOOLS

The Arkansas Legislature in 1867 made provision for a system of common schools. These schools were for white children only and they were to be supported by a property tax on the property of white persons only.[52] In an "Act to declare the rights of persons of African descent", the Legislature repealed all prior acts relating specifically to Negroes and mulattoes, except those concerning intermarriage, voting, jury service, and militia duty, but specified

> That no negro or mulatto shall be admitted to attend any public school in this state, except such schools as may be established exclusively for colored persons.[53]

The Constitution framed and adopted in 1868 assured educational opportunity for Negroes:

> ARTICLE IX. Section 1. A general diffusion of knowledge and intelligence among all classes, being essential to the preservation

---

[50] Senate Journal, 1868, pp. 18–19; House Journal, 1868, p. 19.

[51] House Journal, 1868, p. 22; Senate Journal, 1868, p. 24.

[52] Arkansas Acts, 1866–67, No. 160, Secs. 1, 3, p. 413, March 18, 1867.

[53] Arkansas Acts, 1866–67, No. 35, Sec. 5, p. 100, February 6, 1867.

> of the rights and liberties of the people; the general assembly shall establish and maintain a system of free schools, for the gratuitous instruction of all persons in this State, between the ages of five and twenty-one years, and the funds appropriated for the support of common schools shall be distributed to the several counties, in proportion to the number of children and youths therein between the ages of five and twenty-one years, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, but no religious or other sect or sects shall ever have any exclusive right to, or control of any part of the school funds of this State.

It also guaranteed equality:

> ARTICLE I. Sec. 3. The equality of all persons before the law is recognized and shall ever remain inviolate; nor shall any citizen ever be deprived of any right, privilege, or immunity, nor exempted from any burden or duty on account of race, color, or previous condition.
>
> ARTICLE I. Sec. 18. The General Assembly shall not grant to any citizen or class of citizens, privileges or immunities, which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens.

The Constitution did not specify whether the schools were to be mixed or separate. The debates in the Constitutional Convention are inconclusive. A Negro member of the Committee on Education was interested primarily in obtaining educational opportunities for members of his race, stating:

> In real truth, their interests and ours are united. For their hopes of wealth, intelligence, and influence, for their power, both of those classes must depend on the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> organic law of the State. If that organic law places within their reach the means of education for their children, the opportunities for the development of their intellect, the opportunity to "work their way up" in the world, they may soon come to take their place among the races of men, and among the leaders of their people.[54]

To another member,

> One of the provisions of this new Constitution which is submitted by the Committee, is, that the Legislature shall provide, by setting apart a sufficient amount of revenue of the State, for the education of the children of the State. Not black children—not white children—but the children of this State are to be provided for, so far as regards the attainment of an education.[55]

Mr. Duvall objected to tax-supported free schools:

> This Constitution, sir, proposes to tax me and my children to educate that race, while but few of them are to pay any taxes. I cannot support such a provision.
>
> * * * * *
>
> Mr. JOHNSON. You forget how long we worked for you, in a state of slavery, to give you the means by which you have been educated; and now we want to come upon a level with you.[56]

Others construed the provision as requiring mixed schools and objected on that ground. A group of Democrats opposed the Constitution in part, on the ground that [54] Convention Debates and Proceedings, p. 500.

[55] Id., p. 649.
[56] Id., p. 645.

> It compels the white citizens of the State to contribute, by taxation, to the support of public schools from which their children will be effectually excluded.[57]

Mr. Matthews was against the Constitution > because the common-school system it proposes, is an abomination to every white man true to the well-being of his race.[58]

Mr. Bradley had similar sentiments:

> * * * I ask you if you propose to thrust into the same common school with your child and mine, the children of the negro. Will you endorse that monstrous enactment which proposes to take advantage of the necessities of widows, and of poverty-stricken men, who cannot afford to send their children elsewhere, to compel them to thrust those children, for three months in the year, among the offspring of a race whom God, by writing an indelible mark upon their head and foot and brain, has pronounced the social inferiors of your sons and daughters? * * * [59]

There was, however, no reference to the possible applicability or inapplicability of the Fourteenth Amendment to this problem.

The members of the Convention were aware of the applicability of the Amendment to other issues. The Convention adopted a resolution recommending that the next General Assembly enact laws to prevent intermarriage.[60] In debate

---

[57] Id., p. 666.
[58] Id., p. 672.
[59] Id., p. 660.
[60] Id., p. 828.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

on this, it was pointed out that adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment > is a part of the condition precedent to our admission into the Union. Congress will reject any constitution, containing such a provision. Congress has virtually declared that we must allow all men the free exercise of their rights.[61]

A member asserted that a prohibition on intermarriage would > come in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, with the spirit of the age, and the rights of humanity * * *.[62]

It was also argued that the prohibition on intermarriage would violate the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV, Section 2, of the Federal Constitution and also the Fourteenth Amendment.[63]

On the other hand, a proponent of the resolution argued for its adoption lest similar provisions in the State Bill of Rights be construed as prohibiting laws against intermarriage:

> There is no limitation and distinction, there is no fixed, determined meaning, to "civil rights," and "equality before the law;" and so long as these terms stand undefined and uninterpreted, so long will this remain a vexed question for future generations to fight and war over * * *.[64]

Later, on the question of suffrage, there was a reference to the fact that

---

[61] Id., p. 377.
[62] Id., p. 499.
[63] Id., pp. 502–4.
[64] Id., p. 370.

> It was well understood in the late election, that the only need of a Convention was to frame a Constitution in conformance with the requirements of the Reconstruction Acts.[66]

Governor Clayton, in his message to the legislature in 1868, described the situation of public education in Arkansas and asked for its improvement:

> The wicked and shameful manner in which the servants of the people have neglected their educational interests, and appropriated to their own selfish uses and the unhallowed purposes of treason, the magnificent endowments of a generous government, subjects them to the merited condemnation of all true patriots. In regard to the advancement of the common school interests the question heretofore seems to have been, not how to do it, but how not to do it. * * * In 1860, as shown by the message above referred to, but 25 common schools were organized and kept up in this State from the common school fund. I am unable to give you correct information of the number of common schools now in operation, but for practical purposes it would be safe to proceed as though there were none.
>
> From reliable statistics obtained from the lists of registered voters, made last fall, it is shown that thirty per centum of the white, and fifty per centum of the entire voting population were unable to write their own names. Nothing but a due sense of my constitutional obligations, and an earnest desire to promote the educational

[66] Id., pp. 618–19.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

interests of the State, induces me to make this shameful disclosure.

* * * * *

The framers of our present Constitution have placed themselves in enviable comparison with past legislators, and merited the approbation and gratitude of posterity by the one act of far-seeing statesmanship which secures to future generations the inestimable boon of education, and gives life and perpetuity to the State, by providing the means whereby its future supporters and defenders may be prepared for the proper exercise of the duties of American citizenship.

* * * * *

The present condition of our school interests is unprecedented. A large portion of the community are known to be antagonistic to the principles of universal education. The prejudices which exist against a certain class of the people will tend to embarrass the situation. Obstacles will doubtless be thrown in the way where active support should be given.[66]

The legislature in 1868 construed the constitutional provision as permitting separate schools. "The Act to Establish and Maintain a System of Free Common Schools for the State of Arkansas," enacted July 23, 1868, provided with reference to the Board of Education:

> That the said Board [shall] make the necessary provisions for establishing separate schools for white and colored children and youths, [ ] and shall adopt such other measures as they judge expedient for > carrying the Free Common School system into effectual and uniform operation throughout the State, and providing as nearly as possible for the education of every youth. * * *[67]

[66] House J., 1868, pp. 297–99.

In 1871 the progress of this school system was reported by the Superintendent of Public Instruction:

> The organization of a system of Free Schools, for the universal education of the people, is an important era in the history of Arkansas. The great lack of education among the masses, even of the white population of the State, had long been felt among the intelligent classes to be a great evil and a serious hindrance to the upbuilding of the material, social and moral interests of the commonwealth.
>
> And when, by operation of the laws of Congress, the colored race were made free and endowed with the rights of citizenship, the proportion of the population having a right to participate in civil affairs, and who could not read and write, was greatly increased. Hence the establishment of a system of schools which proffers educational facilities to all classes, without respect to color, must be hailed by all right-thinking persons as marking an epoch in our history of more than ordinary importance.
>
> * * * * *
>
> The condition of the country, as all know, was not the most favorable for carrying forward an enterprise, one of the prominent features of which was directly at variance with the preconceived notions and opinions of the great body of the people—namely,

[67] Arkansas Acts, 1868, No. 52, Sec. 107, p. 163, July 23, 1868.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> the education and elevation of the colored race. Much prejudice and ignorance of the system had to be met and overcome before a hearty cooperation of the people could be secured in furtherance of its aims and its objects, and without such cooperation the system must prove a failure.
>
> The nature and provisions of the school law had to be explained, and the people convinced that the education of all the children would promote the best interests of the community, and all this required time and a vast amount of labor.[68]

The segregation provision of the law of 1868 was repeated in the comprehensive revision of the school law by the 1873 legislature.[69] The same legislature enacted a Civil Rights Act which imposed penalties for failure "to provide equal and like accommodations, and advantages for the education of each and every youth of school age." [70]

CALIFORNIA

California did not take any final action on the Fourteenth Amendment.

The California school laws of 1866 and 1870 excluded colored children from the existing public schools but authorized separate public schools for them. In 1874 the California Supreme Court held that racially segregated schools did not violate the "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36. Separate schools were abolished in 1880.

---

[68] Ark. Docs., 1871, First Report, Sup't of Public Instruction, pp. 5, 8.

[69] Arkansas Acts, 1873, No. 130, Sec. 108, p. 392.

[70] Arkansas Acts, 1873, No. 12, Sec. 6, p. 15.

At the time the Fourteenth Amendment was before the legislature, Negroes were not permitted to vote, sit on juries, or intermarry with whites, but they were qualified as witnesses in court.

RATIFICATION

California did not take any final action on the Fourteenth Amendment. The Governor's message on December 2, 1867, recommended ratification. It commented on Section 1 as follows:

> By the first section it is provided that all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside, and States are prohibited from abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens, or of depriving them of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. This section declares "equality before the law" for all citizens, in the solemn and binding form of a constitutional amendment, to which no reasonable objection can be urged.[71]

The Committee on Federal Relations of the Senate reported in its favor,[72] while the Committee in the Assembly advised against the proposal (March 4, 1868),[73] neither specifying the reasons for their recommendations. No vote was taken.

---

[71] Assembly J., 1867–68, p. 52.
[72] Sen. J., 1867–68, p. 676.
[73] Assembly J., 1867–68, p. 611.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

SCHOOLS

The Constitution of 1849 provided for a system of free common schools,[74] which was established in 1851. The school laws of 1851[75] and 1852[76] were silent as to segregation of colored and white children, and provided for apportionment of school funds among the districts according to the total number of children. In 1860, there were only 382 Negro children in the State between the ages of five and fifteen, and most of these appear up to that time to have attended the common schools, although separate schools for Negroes existed in San Francisco and Sacramento. The State Superintendent of Schools in his Report to the Legislature in 1859 strongly criticized mixing the races and urged the establishment of separate schools throughout the state. He instructed the school officials that in the meantime the common schools then established were clearly intended for white children.[77] In 1863, the establishment of separate schools with public funds was permitted.[78]

In 1866 a law was passed providing for the establishment of racially segregated schools.[79]

In his message to the Legislature, dated December 2, 1867, the Governor discussed the "common schools" as follows:

---

[74] Art. IX, § 3.

[75] Cal. Laws, 1851, c. 126, p. 491.

[76] Cal. Laws, 1852, c. 53.

[77] Sen. J., 1859, App., p. 14; Ferrier, Ninety Years of Education in California, 1846–1936, pp. 97 et seq.

[78] Cal. Laws, 1863, c. 159, § 68.

[79] Cal. Laws, 1866, c. 342.

> The school law now on our statute books, is believed to be well adapted to the wants of the State and I trust that no attempt to repeal or modify it, in any essential particular, will be made * * *.[80]

The Superintendent of Public Instruction reported that in the school year 1866–67 there were 16 schools for Negro children, with a total of 400 pupils, and that there were no instances where they had been admitted to white schools under Section 58 of the Law of 1866.[81]

The School Law of 1870[82] was similar to that of 1866 in requiring separate schools for "children of African descent." It also provided that

> The same laws, rules and regulations, which apply to schools for white children, shall apply to schools for colored (Sec. 57.).

In Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36 (1874), this statute was held not to violate the Fourteenth Amendment. With regard to the "equal protection" clause, the court stated:

> * * * The public law of the State—both the Constitution and Statute—having established public schools for educational purposes, to be maintained by public authority and at public expense, the youth of the State are thereby become pro hac vice the wards of the State, and under the operations of the constitutional amendment referred to, equally entitled to be educated at the public expense. It would, therefore, not be competent to the Legis-

[80] Assembly J., 1867–68, p. 45.
[81] Senate and Assembly J., 1867–68, Appendix 2, p. 22.
[82] Cal. Laws, 1869–70, c. 556.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> lature, while providing a system of education for the youth of the State, to exclude the petitioner and those of her race from its benefits, merely because of their African descent, and to have so excluded her would have been to deny to her the equal protection of the laws within the intent and meaning of the Constitution (p. 51).

But the 1870 statute was not of an exclusionary nature:

> * * * the policy of separation of the races for educational purposes is adopted by the legislative department, and it is in this mere policy that the counsel for the petitioner professes to discern "an odious distinction of caste, founded on a deep-rooted prejudice in the public opinion." But it is hardly necessary to remind counsel that we cannot deal here with such matters, and that our duties lie wholly within the much narrower range of determining whether this statute, in whatever motive it originated, denies to the petitioner, in a constitutional sense, the equal protection of the laws; and in the circumstances that the races are separated in the public schools, there is certainly to be found no violation of the constitutional rights of the one race more than of the other, and we see none of either, for each, though separated from the other, is to be educated upon equal terms with that other, and both at the common public expense (p. 52).

Following this decision, the school law was amended in 1874 to provide that while separate schools might be maintained, colored and Indian children were entitled, in the absence of such a system, to enter any public school.[83]

In 1880, those sections of the Code providing for the establishment of separate schools were repealed.[84] The Supreme Court in Wysinger v. Crookshank, 82 Cal. 588 (1890), held that because of the repeal of the statutory authority for segregation, separate schools could not be maintained.

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

At the time the Fourteenth Amendment was considered by the California legislature, the Negro, in addition to being excluded from white schools, was not permitted to vote,[85] sit on a jury,[86] or intermarry with whites.[87] Prior to 1863, he had been disqualified as a witness in cases involving a white person, but in that year this restriction was removed, although continued with respect to Indians, Mongolians and Chinese.[88]

CONNECTICUT

Connecticut ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in June, 1866. The state had never had racial distinctions in its school legislation. A law enacted in 1868 affirmed the right of every child to be admitted to any public school in the district of his residence.

---

[83] Cal., Amendments to the Code, 1873–74, p. 97.

[84] Cal., Amendments to the Code, 1880, c. 44, sec. 62.

[85] Cal., Const., 1849, Art. II, sec. 1; Gen. Laws, 1850–1864, ¶ 2431.

[86] Id., ¶ 3870, sec. 1.

[87] Id., ¶ 4462.

[88] Id., ¶ 5332.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

RATIFICATION

Connecticut was the first state to act on the Fourteenth Amendment. Governor Buckingham in his message of June 19, 1866, recommended ratification;[89] the Senate voted favorably on June 25, 1866;[90] and the House concurred on June 28, 1866.[91] There was a brief debate in the Senate.[92] A contemporary account states that:

> The vote was a party one in both branches of the legislature. The Democrats opposed the amendment on the grounds of expediency and policy, and contended that Congress was powerless to change the Constitution during the enforced exclusion of certain Representatives from Congress. This view was repelled by the Republicans, who held that Congress has against conquered rebels all the powers of conquest.[93]

SCHOOLS

In 1866, the Secretary of the Board of Education, in his report to the legislature, remarked on the general educational situation as follows:

> For many years the opportunities have not been so favorable as they are just now for uniting all classes in the community, irrespective of creed, party, or nationality, in vigorous efforts for the improvement of public education. Important questions in respect to the abolition of slavery, on which [89] Sen. J., May Session, 1866, p. 335.

[90] Id., p. 374.
[91] House J., May Session, 1866, pp. 410–413.
[92] See Sen. J., May Session, 1866, p. 374.
[93] Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, 1866, pp. 255–256.

> the wise and good have been for years divided, and which have tended to separate even in the district school meeting those who should always have stood united in liberal and progressive sentiments, are now for ever settled. The war, which has absorbed since 1861 all the best forces of the State, has happily ended in the establishment of the Union and the vindication of the principles of local self-government. The return of peace is characterized not only at home, but in the national councils at Washington, and still more remarkably in the discussions which are in progress throughout all the Southern States, by a lively demand for the more thorough diffusion of public education as indispensable for the support of a free republic. So likewise in our own State there are manifold indications of an educational awakening.[94] * * *

Connecticut had never restricted its public schools to any class defined by color. It did prohibit for a short period the establishment of schools for the instruction of colored people who were not inhabitants of the state, on the ground that this would tend to increase the influx of Negroes into the state.[95] A colored school was established in Hartford in 1830, at the request of the colored inhabitants, and this example was followed by two or three other towns [96] but they were "broken

---

[94] Report of the Secretary of the Board of Education, p. 18, Conn. Doc., 1866.

[95] P. L., 1833, chapter IX, p. 425, repealed in 1838, P. L., 1838, p. 30.

[96] Special Report of the U. S. Commissioner of Education (1871), p. 328, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., vol. 13, no. 315.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

up'' by legislation in 1868.[97] The 1868 law provided that

> The public schools of this state shall be open to all persons between the ages of four and sixteen years, and no person shall be denied admittance to and instruction in any public school in the school district where such person resides, any law or resolution of this state heretofore passed to the contrary notwithstanding.[98]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The Constitution of Connecticut restricted the franchise to white males,[99] and only voters were eligible to serve on juries.[1]

DELAWARE

Delaware, although it had remained with the Union, rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in February, 1867. The joint resolution against ratification declared that adoption of the Amendment would prevent a restoration of national unity and nullify the original purposes of the United States Constitution. Delaware ratified the Amendment in 1901.

In 1867 the public schools of the State were open to white children only. Schools for colored children were provided in 1875, to be supported by taxes assessed upon the colored population. The Constitution of 1897 required equal participation of Negroes in school funds, and made separate schools mandatory.

---

[97] Ibid.

[98] P. L., 1868, c. 108.

[99] Conn., Const., 1818, Art. VI, sec. 2.

[1] Conn. Gen. Stats., 1866, title I, c. IX, sec. 129.

In 1867 stringent laws were in force against free Negroes. On the day it rejected the Amendment, the legislature also rejected a bill to permit Negroes to testify in all court cases. Also in 1867, the Court of General Sessions declared the federal Civil Rights Act of 1866 void insofar as it prohibited discrimination in that respect. Negroes were excluded from jury service.

RATIFICATION

In 1865 Delaware refused to ratify the Thirteenth Amendment.[2] On January 2, 1867, Governor Saulsbury recommended rejection of the Fourteenth Amendment, in part because it was "so manifestly unjust to the people of ten States of the Union," in part because of its "ulterior purpose, the bestowal of the elective franchise on the African race."[3]

In the House the committee report recommending rejection did not discuss the details of the Amendment, but objected that its adoption "would be a breach of faith implied between the States at the time of the ratification of the Constitution."[4] A minority report stated that the amendment contained "honorable, magnanimous * * * [and] lenient terms."[5] The majority report was adopted,[6] and on February 7 the Senate voted against ratification.[7]

---

[2] Dela. Laws, 1865, c. 592.
[3] House J., 1867, pp. 18, 20.
[4] Id., p. 224.
[5] Id., p. 225.
[6] Id., p. 226.
[7] Sen. J., 1867, p. 176.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In 1901, the Delaware legislature ratified the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments.[8]

SCHOOLS

A general system of free public schools in Delaware was first established in 1829.[9] The 1829 law provided that the schools should be free "to all the white children of said district."[10] This provision continued[11] until the Constitution of 1897 was adopted, providing that "in * * * apportionment [of school funds] no distinction shall be made on account of race or color, and separate schools for white and colored children shall be maintained."[12]

It was not until 1875 that provision was made for tax support of colored schools,[13] and in 1881, the state began to appropriate money for them.[14]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Delaware had been among the more liberal of the slave states in its legislation toward Negroes: they were presumed free rather than slave; laws providing against the importation of slaves into the State, even those whose owners had taken them out temporarily, acted to decrease the slave population; and stringent penalties attached to persons attempting to re-enslave the free Negroes

[8] Dela. Laws. 1901, c. 235.
[9] Dela. Laws, Rev. Ed., 1829, p. 486.
[10] Dela. Laws, Rev. Ed., 1829, p. 493.
[11] See Dela. Rev. Code, 1852, c. 42, § 11 (3).
[12] Const. 1897, Art. X, § 2.
[13] Dela. Laws, 1875, c. 48.
[14] Dela. Laws, 1881, c. 362.

of the state.[15] Measures were, however, directed against the possible political organization of the free Negroes,[16] and these were strengthened during the Civil War.[17]

The House on the day it rejected the Fourteenth Amendment also rejected a bill giving Negroes the same right to appear as witnesses as accorded to whites,[18] and the Delaware Court of General Sessions declared the federal Civil Rights Act of 1866 void insofar as it gave Negroes that right in the states. State v. Rash, Houst. Cr. 271 (1867). Negroes were excluded by law from juries until the law was declared invalid in Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370 (1880). Miscegenation was prohibited,[19] and Negroes were barred from voting.[20]

FLORIDA

Florida rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in December, 1866. One of the reasons given was that the Amendment was destructive of the rights of the states by investing Congress with vast powers. The later ratification, in June 1868, by the Reconstruction legislature, was perfunctory. Prior to the Civil War Negroes were excluded from the public schools. Schools for freedmen were established in 1866. The Constitution of

---

[15] See, generally, 4 Judicial Cases concerning American Slavery and the Negro, pp. 211–215.

[16] Dela. Laws, 1832, c. 176.

[17] See Dela. Laws, 1863, c. 305.

[18] House J., 1867, p. 228–29.

[19] Dela. Rev. Stats., 1852 (1874 ed.), Tit. 11, c. 74, sec. 1.

[20] Const. 1831, Art. IV, § 1.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

1868 outlawed all civil and political distinctions based on race or color, and provided for educational facilities for all children. A law in 1869 established a uniform system of public schools, without any reference to segregation. A Civil Rights Act enacted in 1873 prohibited racial discrimination in the public schools. The Constitution of 1885 forbade mixed schools, and subsequent legislation required separate schools for Negroes.

RATIFICATION

Florida in December, 1866, rejected the Fourteenth Amendment. Governor Walker, in recommending rejection, said with reference to sections 1 and 5 of the Amendment:

> These two Sections taken together, give Congress the power to legislate in all cases touching the citizenship, life, liberty or property of every individual in the Union, of whatever race or color, and leave no further use for the State governments. It is in fact a measure of consolidation entirely changing the form of the government.[21]

The Senate Committee on Federal Relations made the same objection:

> Section I of this proposed article would confer upon Congress all the powers which are now supposed to appertain to the States.—From the moment of its engraftment upon the Constitution of the United States, the States would in effect cease to exist as bodies politic, for at the instant of its adoption a great central power, which is ever the enemy of freedom and advance> ment would exist at Washington. The Congress would under this section alone subvert and change the whole domestic economy of a State, regardless of the approval or disapproval of the people thereof; for in the construction of this section as those that follow, it becomes necessary to consider the fifth section to this proposed amendment and when we do that we are appalled, and well might the people of every State in this Union pause and consider as to the power which might be taken and seized under the head of "appropriate legislation." [22]

[21] House Journal, 1866, p. 76.

The report of the House Committee on Federal Relations was similar:

> The first section of this amendment, considered in connection with the fifth, is virtually an annulment of State authority in regard to rights of citizenship. It invests the Congress of the United States with extraordinary power at the expense of the States. It would so operate that under its provisions all persons, without distinction of color, would become entitled to the "privileges and immunities" of citizens of the States, and among those privileges would be embraced the elective franchise, as well as competency to discharge the duty of jurors. In addition to this, without denying to the State the power and right to legislate and to control to some extent the liberty and property of the citizen, it vests in the General Government the power to annul the laws of a State affecting life, liberty and property of its people, if

[22] Id., p. 102.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Congress should deem them subject to the objections therein specified.[23]

With reference to the second section of the Amendment, the report stated:

We cannot at this time, just as they have emerged from slavery, without education, and controlled by prejudice, invest them with the elective franchise without restriction or qualification. We have done everything already that is necessary to secure their practical advancement.

The following article is incorporated in the Constitution of this State:

"All the inhabitants of this State, without distinction of color, are free and shall enjoy the rights of person and property without distinction of color." "In all criminal proceedings founded upon injury to a colored person, and in all cases affecting the rights and remedies of colored persons, no person shall be incompetent to testify as a witness on account of color."

The General Assembly at its last session passed an act providing that "all the criminal laws of this State shall be deemed and held to apply equally to all the inhabitants of the same, without distinction of color."

This State, while it has no system of public schools for the whites, has instituted a common school system even in her bankruptcy for this portion of our population, and is distributing elementary books all over the State. Six thousand blacks are now availing themselves of State aid for the purposes of education.

[23] House Journal, 1866, p. 76.

> These measures and any others which will tend to their practical advancement and improvement, we deem it our duty and pleasure to adopt, and we do not think it just that the general government should declare that we must in addition give them at once the elective franchise without qualification, thereby ruining our interests, theirs, and the country's, or our representation shall be reduced in the proportion which the males among them, twenty-one years of age and not invested with the right to vote, bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in this State.[34]

Both Houses rejected the Amendment unanimously.[35]

The later ratification by the Reconstruction legislature was perfunctory. On June 9, 1868, the Governor sent the following message:

> Gentlemen of the Senate and the Assembly:
>
> You are assembled under the provisions and in obedience to the requisitions of the Constitution of the State, adopted in accordance with the acts of Congress.
>
> Until admitted to representation upon the floor of Congress, your acts will be merely provisional.
>
> I therefore recommend that no action be taken save that dictated by the acts of Congress as conditions precedent to admission, to wit: The passage of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, known as the Fourteenth Article, and the election of United States Senators—unless it be to ratify the Thirteenth Article, already

[34] Id., p. 77-78.

[35] Senate Journal, 1866, p. 111; House Journal, 1866, p. 150.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> adopted, your immediate assent to which I advise.
>
> After we shall have been recognized by Congress in the admission of our Representatives and Senators, I shall communicate more at length upon the general interests of the State.[26]

Action in the Senate took place immediately. The vote for ratification was 10 to 3.[27]

In the House, approval was equally rapid. The vote was 23 to 6.[28]

SCHOOLS

Prior to the war the public school system was limited to white children only.[29] Any education of Negroes was discouraged. A territorial act had made it unlawful for free Negroes or mulattoes to assemble "for the purpose of preaching or exhorting, or for any other purpose, unless it be for the purposes of labour * * *."[30] A similar prohibition was enacted after Florida became a State.[31] In 1866 this prohibition, among others on the conduct of Negroes, was repealed.[32]

In 1865, Governor Walker had recommended against the establishment of any Negro schools:

> * * * in the present condition of this population, it would be premature to attempt to organize any general system of education * * *. The first lesson to be taught them is, that their new-found liberty is not license, and that labor is ordained of

[26] Senate Journal, 1868, p. 7.

[27] Id., p. 9.

[28] House Journal, 1868, pp. 8–9.

[29] Florida Acts, 1848, c. 229, Art. I, Sec. 3.

[30] Florida Acts, 1832, No. 94, Sec. 10.

[31] Florida Acts, 1846, c. 87, Sec. 9.

[32] Florida Acts, 1865, c. 1474, p. 37.

> God, and a necessity of their condition * * *.[33]

The Assistant Superintendent of Education of the Freedmen's Bureau, however, stated that the "negro should be educated, at least in the rudiments of a common school education," but that the expense should be borne by the Negroes because of "the embarrassment of the finances of the State." He said:

> I am convinced that one of the best means to make the freedmen contented, industrious and reliable as a laboring class, is to provide schools for their children.[34]

In 1866 the legislature passed "An Act Concerning Schools for Freedmen." This provided for a Superintendent of Common Schools for Freedmen, who was directed "to establish schools for freedmen, when the number of children of persons of color, in any county or counties will warrant the same * * *" to the extent that funds permitted. The cost was to be defrayed by tuition fees collected from each pupil and by a poll tax of $1.00 on "male persons of color" between the ages of 21 and 55.[35]

The Governor's message to the 1868 legislature recommended enactment of a law to organize a public school system, but made no reference either to Negro education or to the Fourteenth Amendment.[36] At that time there were in existence private schools for both races, schools for freed-

[33] Sen. J., 1865, pp. 59–60.
[34] House J., 1865, p. 221.
[35] Florida Acts, 1865, c. 1475, p. 37.
[36] House J., 1868, p. 60.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

men operated under the auspices of the state, and schools operated under the auspices of northern benevolent associations.[37]

The Constitution of 1868 contained the following provisions relative to education in the form recommended by the Convention's Committee on Education:

ARTICLE IX

> SECTION 1. It is the paramount duty of the State to make ample provision for the education of all the children residing within its borders, without distinction or preference.
>
> Sec. 2. The legislature shall provide a uniform system of common schools, and a university, and shall provide for the liberal maintenance of the same. Instruction in them shall be free.

It was also declared in Article XVII, Section 28, that:

> There shall be no civil or political distinction in this State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and the legislature shall have no power to prohibit by law any class of persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, to vote or hold any office, beyond the conditions prescribed by this constitution.[38]

On January 30, 1869, the Governor approved "An Act to establish a Uniform System of Common Schools and a University." It directed that

> There shall be established, and liberally maintained, a uniform system of public [37] Report of the Superintendent of Public Schools, Fla., House J., 1869, pp. 76–85.

[38] See Convention Journal, pp. 69–71, 101.

> instruction, free to all the youth residing in the State between the ages of six and twenty-one years, so far as the funds will admit, as hereinafter provided.

The Board of Public Instruction of each county was required

> To locate and maintain schools in every locality in the county where they may be needed, to accommodate, as far as practicable, all the youth between the ages of six and twenty-one years during not less than three months in each year.

There was no specific reference to the question of separate or mixed schools.[39]

In 1885 the Constitution was amended to provide that

> White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school, but impartial provision shall be made for both. [Art. XII, Sec. 12]

In 1887 the Legislature enacted a statute requiring separate schools.[40]

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

In 1870 it was made illegal to deny the right of conveyance to any person. It was further provided that "all persons shall have equal privileges of accommodation and conveyance on all railroads, steamboats, stages, and other public means of travel in this State".[41]

---

[39] Florida Laws, 1869, c. 1686, pp. 7–19.

[40] See Florida Laws, 1887, c. 3692, p. 36, for separate normal schools.

[41] Florida Laws, 1870, c. 1744, p. 35.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Civil Rights Act enacted in 1873 made specific reference to schools. It provided:

> SECTION 1. That no citizen of this State shall, by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, be excepted or excluded from the full and equal enjoyment of any accommodation, advantage, facility, or privilege furnished by inn-keepers, by common carriers, whether on land or water, by licensed owners, managers, or lessees of theatres or other places of public amusement; by trustees, commissioners, superintendents, teachers, and other officers of common schools and public institutions of learning, the same being supported by moneys derived from general taxation, or authorized by law, also of cemetery association and benevolent associations, supported or authorized in the same way: Provided, That private schools, cemeteries, and institutions of learning established exclusively for white or colored persons, and maintained respectively by voluntary contributions, shall remain according to the terms of the original establishment.
>
> * * * * *
>
> SEC. 3. That every discrimination against any citizen on account of color by use of the word "white" or any other term in any law, statute, ordinance, or regulation, is hereby repealed and annulled.
>
> SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as juror in any court in this State by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors, who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the > reason above named, shall, on conviction thereof, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars.

>
> SEC. 5. All acts conflicting with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.[42]

Similarly, in the following year in an act defining the privileges and obligations of hotel keepers, one section provided that "nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to discriminate in relation to the rights of guests in consequence of race or nationality."[43]

GEORGIA

Georgia rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in November 1866 with protests directed largely at the power granted to Congress; the Amendment was ratified in July 1868 without discussion, and again in February 1870 because of a question as to the legitimacy of the membership of the 1868 legislature. In 1866 public schools for whites only had been established. The Constitution of 1868 made no reference to separate schools, but the legislature in providing a system of public education in 1870 required segregation.

RATIFICATION

Georgia rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in 1866. Governor Jenkins recommended rejection, in part because of the power it gave to Congress, saying:

> The fifth and last section empowers the Congress "to enforce, by appropriate [42] Florida Laws, 1873, No. 13, c. 1947, p. 25.

[43] Florida Laws, 1874, c. 1999, p. 65.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> legislation," the provisions of the Amendment. It will be contended that they are the proper judges of what constitutes appropriate legislation. If, therefore, the Amendment be adopted, and a fractional Congress, from which the Southern States, chiefly interested in it, are excluded, be empowered "to enforce it by appropriate legislation," what vestige of hope remains to the people of those States? Nay, more, what semblance of Republican Government can the true patriot of the North discern in such a state of affairs? Yet, that is the point to which we seem to be drifting; * * *.
>
> I will not further analyze this Amendment, equally novel and unjust.[44]

The report of the Joint Committee of the Legislature on the State of the Republic, recommended rejection but did not discuss the substance of the amendment. It based its recommendation on the argument that the Amendment had not been legally proposed, since it came from a Congress in which the Southern States were not represented.[45] The recommendation was accepted by both Houses on November 9, 1866.[46]

Georgia's subsequent ratification was without discussion. On July 21, 1868, the House of Representatives and the Senate received the following message from the Governor:

> By the provision of the act of Congress entitled "An act to admit the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana,

[44] Senate Journal, 1866, p. 8; House Journal, 1866, p. 9.

[45] Senate Journal, 1866, pp. 65–71; House Journal, 1866, pp. 61–68.

[46] Senate Journal, 1866, p. 72; House Journal, 1866, p. 68.

> Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, to representation in Congress," passed June 25th, 1868, you are required to duly ratify the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the 39th Congress, and known as Article 14, and by solemn public act declare the assent of the State to that portion of the act of Congress which makes null and void the first and third subdivisions of section 17 of the fifth article of the State Constitution, except the proviso to the first subdivision, before the State shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as a State of the Union.
>
> Copies of the said act of Congress, and of the said proposed amendment to the Constitution, are herewith transmitted.[47]

The House immediately approved ratification by a vote of 89 to 69.[48]

In the Senate, the proceedings were equally perfunctory. The Senate rejected a motion to refer the question to committee and approved ratification by a vote of 27 to 14.[49]

Shortly thereafter the Legislature of 1868 excluded its Negro members. The acts of the Legislature were held invalid by Congress on the ground that it contained members disqualified under the Reconstruction Acts. Pursuant to congressional act of December 22, 1869, the Legislature was reconvened with its original Negro members present and its disqualified white members excluded.[50] On February 2, 1870, the Four-

[47] House Journal, 1868, p. 49.

[48] Id., pp. 49–50.

[49] Senate Journal, 1868, pp. 44–46.

[50] See message of Governor Bullock, Senate Journal, 1870, pp. 47–66; House Journal, 1870, pp. 52–72.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

teenth Amendment was again ratified with no discussion.[51]

SCHOOLS

The Georgia Legislature of 1866 provided for a system of free public schools open only to free white inhabitants.[52]

The Georgia Constitution of 1868 contained the following provisions:

> ARTICLE I. SEC. 2. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and resident in this State, are hereby declared citizens of this State, and no laws shall be made or enforced which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or of this State, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws. And it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, by appropriate legislation, to protect every person in the due enjoyment of the rights, privileges and immunities guaranteed in this section.
>
> ARTICLE VI. SEC. 1. The general assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this constitution, shall provide a thorough system of general education, to be forever free to all children of the State, the expense of which shall be provided for by taxation or otherwise.

In the Constitutional Convention the Committee on Education had proposed a provision authorizing separate schools, which read as follows:

> SEC. 2. Separate departments in all the Public Institutions of the State, and separate Schools, may be established by law, for > such scholars as may be required to occupy such separate departments or Schools: Provided, That no partiality shall be shown in such regulations.[53]

[51] Senate Journal, 1870, p. 70; House Journal, 1870, p. 74.
[52] Georgia Laws, 1866, No. 108, p. 59.

A substitute was offered which referred to "separate public institutions for learning" as distinguished from the "Common Schools."[54] Neither this proposal nor that of the Committee on Education was accepted, and the Constitution as adopted contained no reference to "separate schools."[55]

The Legislature of 1870 provided for a system of public education for all but specified separate schools for white and colored.[56] It was provided

> That it shall be the duty of the trustees, in their respective districts, to make all necessary arrangements for the instruction of white and colored youth of the district in separate schools. They shall provide the same facilities for each, both as regards school-houses and fixtures, and the attainments and abilities of teachers, length of term-time, etc.; but the children of the white and colored races shall not be taught together in any sub-district of the State.[57]

Attempts in the House to eliminate racial references had been defeated.[58]

Substantially similar provisions were repeated in the 1871 and 1872 revisions of the school law.[59] Finally, the Constitution of 1877 specified that [53] Convention Journal, p. 151.

[54] Id., p. 477.

[55] Id., pp. 479–483.

[56] Georgia Laws, 1870, No. 53, pp. 49–61.

[57] Id., § 32.

[58] See House Journal, 1870, pp. 434, 449.

[59] Georgia Laws, 1871, No. 7, pp. 279–281; Georgia Laws, 1872, No. 71, pp. 69, 72.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> The schools shall be free to all children of the State, but separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored races.[60]

Governor Bullock, in August 1870 in recommending the establishment of a university for colored students, based his recommendation on "justice" and "good policy," "so that separate facilities shall be afforded to colored students, equal in kind and character to those now furnished to white students in the State University of Athens." [61]

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

The same legislature which enacted the public school law of 1870 required equal facilities on common carriers. The "Act to regulate Common Carriers in this State" provided in part that > * * * all common carriers of passengers for hire in the State of Georgia shall furnish like and equal accommodations for all persons, without distinction of race, color or previous condition.[62]

Another Act enacted in 1870 required

> That the different railroads in this State acting as public carriers be required to furnish equal accommodations to all, without regard to race, color or previous condition, when a greater sum of fare is exacted than was demanded prior to January 1, 1861, which was at that date half fare for persons of color.[63]

---

[60] Art. VIII, Sec. I.

[61] House Journal, 1870, p. 416.

[62] Georgia Laws, 1870, No. 258, p. 398.

[63] Georgia Laws, 1870, No. 289, p. 427.

ILLINOIS

Illinois ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867. At that time Negroes were excluded from the public schools and were virtually without educational facilities. In 1872 a school law was enacted which provided for public education for all children, without reference to their race or color. Nevertheless, segregated schools were established in some areas; in other areas the schools were racially integrated. In 1874, Negro children were held entitled to admission to white schools where separate equal facilities were not available. Chase v. Stephenson, 71 Ill. 383. In 1882 segregated schools were held to violate the state law, without reference to the Fourteenth Amendment. People v. Board of Education, 101 Ill. 308. In 1865 Negroes were qualified as witnesses in court proceedings, but until 1870 they could not vote, serve as jurors, or serve in the militia.

RATIFICATION

Governor Oglesby, in his Message of January 7, 1867,[64] recommended ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, which "after full and deliberate discussion, has received a most emphatic approval and indorsement by the people of the State."[65] The Governor declared:

> * * * While in some sense it may be supposed the necessity for this amendment grew out of the late rebellion, and that it was framed with direct reference to the [64] House J., Reg. Sess., 1867, p. 12.

[65] Sen. J., Reg. Sess., 1867, p. 40.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

state of facts resulting from the war, it is candidly submitted that there is not a principle asserted, a right declared, or a duty defined by it, that might not, with great propriety, have been engrafted upon the Constitution, without any reference to the war, and independently of and antecedently to it. Are not all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction, rightfully citizens of the United States and of each State, and justly entitled to all the political and civil rights citizenship confers? and should any State possess the power to divest them of these great rights, except for treason or other infamous crime?

* * * * *

This is a government of the people, based upon certain and well defined principles of universal justice, carefully guarding and regulating the rights of all men—defining the distinctions between right and wrong in the light of equal liberty to all—and, as we all hope who love it, created to stand as long as human liberty shall be worth preserving. * * *

If the pending constitutional amendment shall fail, or if adopted shall still fail to secure these ends, other more adequate and comprehensive measures will be inaugurated, which shall not fail to restore and re-establish the government upon the basis of the indivisibility of the Union, the supreme authority of its laws, and the equal liberty of all its citizens in every State in the Union. * * * [66]

---

[66] Id., pp. 40–41.

The Senate, after debate (unreported), voted for ratification on January 10, 1867;[67] the House voted likewise on January 15, 1867, apparently without any debate,[68] and after an unsuccessful motion to refer the matter to the Committee on Federal Relations.[69]

SCHOOLS

The early school system of Illinois, which had its beginnings in 1825,[70] was on a voluntary local basis and was expressly for white children. In 1857 a system of free, state-supported schools was introduced, but colored children were excluded by implication. The school law of 1857 [71] provided that the public school funds were to be apportioned according to the number of white children in a district (section 16), and that in townships where there were persons of color, the school trustees were to refund to them the amount of school taxes collected from them (section 80), presumably so that they could use them for separate schools for colored children.[72]

The Superintendent of Public Instruction, in 1865, initiated a census of colored children of school age,[73] and found that they numbered approximately 6,000. In his Report to the 25th Session of the Legislature (which was to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment) he said:

---

[67] Id., p. 76.

[68] House J., Reg. Sess., 1867, p. 155.

[69] Id., p. 154.

[70] Ill. P. L., 1825, p. 121.

[71] Ill. P. L., 1857, p. 259.

[72] Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction for 1865–1866, p. 28, Ill. Doc., 1867, vol. 1.

[73] Id., p. 27.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> For the education of these six thousand colored children, the general school law of the State makes, virtually, no provision. By the discriminating terms employed throughout the statute, it is plainly the intention to exclude them from a joint participation in the benefits of the free school system. Except as referred to by the terms which imply exclusion, and in one brief section of the act, they are wholly ignored in all the common school legislation of the State. * * * I commend the subject to the attention of the General Assembly, as demanding a share of public regard.[74]

In 1868, the Superintendent, in reply to a questionnaire from the Indiana Superintendent of Public Instruction, made the following statement:

> Colored citizens are not allowed to vote. They are not entitled to the privileges of the Public School Fund, but all school taxes paid by them are required to be refunded. Their children are not by law admitted into the public schools, but in a few districts, where no objection is made, they are admitted.[75]

At the same time, Chicago, which operated its own school system, reported the following experience with separate and mixed schools:

> For one year, 1864–1865, the experiment of a separate colored school was tried. The school was disorderly and much trouble existed in the vicinity of the school. The Legislature in 1864–5, abolished this school, and since that time colored children have > been admitted to the public schools on an equality with other children. Not a word of complaint has come, with perhaps one or two individual exceptions, arising from seating pupils, a matter which is easily remedied. Colored children are admitted to our High School. One graduated last year. Others will graduate this year. All difficulty with the children of color has disappeared, except such as may be common to all children who have had no better advantages than themselves. We certainly have less frequent complaints than in the separate system."[76]

[74] Id., pp. 28–29.

[75] Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana for 1867–68, p. 26, Ind. Doc. 1867–68, vol. 1.

In his report to the 1869 legislature the Superintendent again urged that the school law be amended to provide for Negro education, saying:

> * * * I regard the longer presence in the school law of this great and free commonwealth, of provisions which now exclude 7,000 children, of lawful school age, from all the blessings of public education * * * as alike impolitic and unjust; the opprobrium and shame of our otherwise noble system of free schools. No State can afford to defend or perpetuate such provisions, and least of all the State that holds the dust of the fingers that wrote the proclamation of January first, 1863. Let us expunge this last remaining remnant of the unchristian "black laws" of Illinois, and proclaim in the name of God, and the Declaration of Independence, that all the school-going children of the State, without distinction, shall be equally entitled to share in the rich provisions of the free school system."[77]

---

[76] Id., pp. 26–27.

[77] Report for 1867–68, pp. 20–21, Ill. Doc. 1869, vol. 2.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On the question of segregated or mixed schools, he said:

> Nor need any one be scared by the phantom of blended colors in the same school-room. The question of co-attendance, or of separate schools, is an entirely separate and distinct one, and may safely be left to be determined by the respective districts and communities, to suit themselves. In many places there will be but one school for all; in many others there will be separate schools. This is a matter of but little importance, and one which need not and cannot be regulated by legislation. Only drive the spirit of caste from its intrenchments in the statute, giving all equal educational rights under the law, and the consequences will take care of themselves.[78]

The Constitutional Convention which met in 1869 and 1870 amended the education article to provide for "a thorough and efficient system of free schools, whereby all the children of this State may receive a good common school education" (Article 8, sec. 1). In the Convention Mr. Washburn offered a resolution to the effect that the Constitution should provide for mandatory school segregation and for a separation of the funds obtained from taxation of white and colored persons.[79] He said:

> * * * In view of the prospective settlement of the negro suffrage question, it is eminently desirable that all other questions of public interest affecting that race should also be settled speedily and permanently, so as to close out, if possible, all future agita> tion of the public mind upon this vexed question; and this can be done only by constitutional enactment.

[78] Id., p. 21.

[79] Illinois Constitutional Convention, 1869, Debates and Proceedings, p. 679.

>
> It cannot be denied or ignored that the question of mixed schools has greatly agitated the public mind in some portions of the State, that the question is every day growing more important, and that the agitation of the subject will continue and increase until it shall have been settled one way or the other by the organic law.
>
> * * * * *
>
> * * * The people demand of this Convention an opportunity to decide for themselves whether they will have mixed schools or separate schools for the two races; whether they will have social equality of the races, by compelling associations in the public schools of the State.[80]

The resolution was tabled.[80a] There was no discussion of education for colored children, and no provision for segregated schools was written into the Constitution.

Following the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, a school law was enacted in 1872, which provided that the public schools were to be available to all children.[81] It contained no reference to racial distinctions. The State Superintendent of Public Instruction construed the law as not prohibiting separate schools, but requiring equal facilities for Negroes.[82] The matter being left to the discretion of the local school authorities, seg-

---

[80] Id., pp. 679–680.

[80a] Id., p. 703.

[81] Ill. P. L., 1872, p. 700, 712, § 34.

[82] Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction for 1871–72, pp. 115 et seq., Ill. Doc., 1873, vol. 2.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

regated schools were established in some areas; in other areas the schools were racially integrated.[83] Chase v. Stephensen, 71 Ill. 383, decided in 1874, held that Negro children were entitled to admission to white schools if equal facilities were not available to them elsewhere; it left open the question whether separate schools, if equal, were permissible. The Fourteenth Amendment was not discussed.

The matter was taken up in the Legislature in 1874. Two proposals in favor of a statutory requirement for segregation in the public schools were defeated.[84] The Legislature in March, 1874, passed "An Act to protect colored children in their rights to attend public schools."[85] It provided:

> § 1. * * * That all directors of schools, boards of education, or other school officers whose duty it now is, or may be hereafter, to provide, in their respective jurisdictions, schools for the education of all children between the ages of six and twenty-one years, are prohibited from excluding, directly or indirectly, any such child from such school on account of the color of such child.[86]

This law, however, did not end segregated schools in the State. See People ex rel. Longress v. The Board of Education, 101 Ill. 308. In

---

[83] Report for 1873–74, pp. 48 et seq., 259 et seq. The Superintendent commented with approval on the opinion of the Ohio Court in State v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198. Id., pp. 45–46.

[84] Sen. J., 1874, p. 177.

[85] Ill. Rev. Stat., 1874, c. 122, §§ 100–102.

[86] Ibid.

that case, decided in 1882, the Supreme Court of Illinois held that where a city was divided into several school districts, the assignment of colored pupils to one school exclusively rather than to the schools in their district was not authorized by state law. The court stated that it did not find it necessary to determine the applicability of the Fourteenth Amendment to the question.

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

In 1865, the Legislature repealed a statute declaring Negroes and Indians incompetent as witnesses.[87] At the time the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified by the Legislature, the selection of jurors was expressely limited to whites,[88] and miscegenation was prohibited.[89]

In the Constitution of 1870 the word "white" was stricken out wherever it occurred. Attempts by a minority in the Constitutional Convention to restrict the militia to whites were defeated, the majority report stating that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited such a restriction.[90]

A Civil Rights Act guaranteeing equal treatment in public accommodations and facilities was enacted in 1885.[91]

INDIANA

Indiana ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867. Although the debates in the Legis-

[87] Ill., Laws, 1865, p. 105.

[88] Gross, Ill. Stats., 1818–1869, c. 58, sec. 1.

[89] Id., c. 69, sec. 2.

[90] Constitutional Convention, 1870, Debates, vol. 1, pp. 860, 861–866.

[91] Ill. Laws, 1885, p. 64.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

lature were largely concerned with the question whether Negro suffrage was intended by the Amendment, one opponent of the Amendment stated that its effect would be to place colored children in the white schools. Negroes were exempted from school taxes and excluded from the public schools until 1869. The school law enacted in that year provided that separate schools were to be established for colored children and that other means of educating them might be used when in any particular area there were not enough colored children to justify a separate school. In Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327 (1874), the Supreme Court of Indiana upheld these segregation provisions and held that the Fourteenth Amendment did not apply to segregation in public schools. In 1877 the maintenance of separate schools for colored children was made discretionary. In 1949 Indiana abandoned racially-segregated public schools. Until 1866, Indiana had imposed severe legal restrictions on the Negro. He could not immigrate into the state and he could not testify as a witness in court proceedings. In that year the Supreme Court of the state, in Smith v. Moody, 26 Ind. 299, held that these restrictions violated Article IV of the Federal Constitution and the Civil Rights Act of 1866. Negroes did not have the right to vote prior to the Fifteenth Amendment.

RATIFICATION

The Fourteenth Amendment was submitted to the Legislature in January, 1867. Governor Morton in his message of January 11, 1867, summarized the provisions of the Amendment, and said:

> No public measure was ever more fully discussed before the people, better understood by them, or received a more distinct and intelligent approval. I will enter into no arguments in its behalf before this General Assembly. Every member understands it, and is prepared, I doubt not, to give his vote for or against on the question of ratification.[92]

He did not discuss the scope of Section 1 of the Amendment. As regards Negro suffrage, he did not favor the immediate granting of suffrage to men who but yesterday were slaves, and "the great mass of whom are profoundly ignorant and all impressed with that character which slavery impresses upon its victims."[93]

The Senate Committee on Federal Relations recommended the passage of the Joint Resolution to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment, without elaborating on it.[94] A minority of three dissented on the ground that the time was not propitious for a change in "the organic law of the government."[95]

The opponents of ratification objected to a change of the "whole organic structure of our Government" at a time when ten States were not represented in Congress, and denounced the Amendment as an attempt of the "Radical" party

---

[92] House J., 1867, p. 48.
[93] Id., p. 51.
[94] Sen. J., 1867, p. 77.
[95] Ibid.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

to enfranchise the Negroes in its own interest.[96] The Senate voted for ratification on the same day.[97]

The majority report of the Select Committee of the House recommended ratification with a brief statement along the lines of the Governor's statement.[98]

The minority report listed numerous objections to ratification.[99] With regard to the first section, that report said:

> The first section places all persons without regard to race or color, who are born in this country, and subject to its jurisdiction, upon the same political level, by constituting them "citizens of the United States, and of the States wherein they reside," thus conferring upon the negro race born in this country the same rights, civil and political, that are now enjoyed by the white race, and subject to no other conditions than such as may be imposed upon white citizens, including, as we believe, the right of suffrage.[1]

In the House debate Mr. Kizer, in criticizing the Amendment, stated that he had no use for "negro equality."[2] Mr. Ross, also of the opposition, was of the view that the "privileges and immunities" which the Negro would acquire under the Amendment would be [96] January 16, 1867, 9 Brevier Legislative Reports, 1867, pp. 44–45.

---

[97] Sen. J., 1867, p. 79.

[98] House J., 1867, p. 101.

[99] Id., pp. 102–105.

[1] Id., p. 102.

[2] 9 Brevier Legislative Reports, 1867, p. 79.

> * * * the same as those enuring to the white man. The negro may be President—for the amendment makes him a co-equal citizen with the white man * * *. [It] will repeal all our State laws making distinctions because of race and color * * * he said this amendment would simply operate as though it had struck out the word "white" from the State Constitution; so the blackest negro would become eligible to a seat—to the Speakership—in this hall. The blacks would sit with us in the jury box, and with our children in the common schools.[3]

A considerable portion of the House debate was concerned with the question whether the Amendment conferred suffrage on the Negro. The objection was also raised that the Amendment merely repeated the principles of the Civil Rights Bill. On this point, Mr. Dunn, a supporter of the Amendment, said:

> Well, we propose to make these principles permanent by writing them in the fundamental law * * * If you have not this amendment, and the civil rights bill be declared unconstitutional, the negro will be in a worse condition than he was before his emancipation.[4]

The House voted for ratification on January 23, 1867.[5]

---

[3] Id., p. 80. This statement is the only one dealing expressly with the question of segregated schools. It was neither enlarged upon nor contradicted by any of the other speakers.

[4] Id., p. 89.

[5] House J., 1867, p. 184.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Indiana Constitution of 1851 provided as follows:

> Knowledge and learning, generally diffused throughout a community, being essential to the preservation of a free government, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to encourage, by all suitable means, moral, intellectual, scientific and agricultural improvement, and to provide, by law, for a general and uniform system of Common Schools, wherein tuition shall be without charge, and equally open to all. (Art. VIII, sec. 1.)[6]

School laws were enacted in 1852[7] and 1855.[8] These were rendered largely ineffective by decisions of the state Supreme Court declaring that the provisions authorizing townships and incorporated cities to assess and levy taxes for the support of schools violated the state Constitution.[9] The law of 1852 provided for the enumeration of "children" of school age (sec. 12); the law of 1855 exempted "negroes and mulattoes" from the school tax and excluded their children from the school census and the benefits thereof (Sec. 1).

The "Act to provide for a general system of Common Schools" of March 6, 1865,[10] exempted

---

[6] The school system then existing was on a voluntary basis, i. e., its adoption depended on a popular vote in the counties.

[7] Ind. Rev. Stat., 1852, vol. I, C. 98, p. 439.

[8] Ind. Laws, 1855, C. LXXXVI, p. 161.

[9] Greencastle Township, Putnam County v. Black, 5 Ind. 557 (1854), and City of Lafayette v. Jenners, 10 Ind. 70 (1857).

[10] Ind. Laws, 1865, p. 3.

Negroes from the school tax (sec. 1) and directed an annual census only of the white children of school age (sec. 14). Colored children were thus excluded from the school system. Governor Morton, in his message to the Extra Session of the Legislature on November 14, 1865, urged that the law should be amended to provide for inclusion of colored children in the enumeration, and that a proportionate share of the school fund be set aside for their education. He voiced the opinion that such provisions were required by the state constitution but beyond that, he declared, it was a matter of "natural justice", as well as of "sound political economy", to give the Negroes educational opportunities; finally, this would set an example to the Southern States.[11] He commented:

> I would not recommend that white and colored children be placed together in the same schools, believing, as I do, in the present state of public opinion, that to do so would create dissatisfaction and conflict, and impair the usefulness of the schools. I am informed that a system can be devised by which separate schools for the education of colored children can be successfully maintained in various parts of the State, and believe that justice, humanity and sound policy require that it should be done.[12]

The same arguments in favor of Negro schools were presented by the Superintendent of Public

---

[11] 8 Brevier Legislative Reports, Extra Sess., 1865, p. 31.

[12] Id., pp. 31–32.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Instruction in his Report to the Legislature, dated December 31, 1866. Stating his awareness of the "extreme sensitiveness of public opinion," he suggested that separate schools be established whenever a sufficient number of Negro children reached school age in a given district, and that some other provision for their schooling be made where there were not enough children to warrant a school. He said:

> * * * Therefore, whereas it is clear; 1, that the colored man is to remain with us, i. e., in our State; 2, that he is being, and is to be, clothed with new and larger powers of citizenship, it follows that he is becoming a greater force in both society and the State. Any force generated in, or injected into, the social or political organism at once suggests the necessity of guidance or control. Uncontrolled, evil if not ruin will ensue. But in a popular government like ours, human force in the aspect now under consideration, is most easily controlled for the good of society and the State, when the party possessing the exerting of such force, is educated. The Constitution of our State broadly and explicitly recognizes the above truth as applied to governments. * * *
> Therefore, the above granted true, it follows that the welfare of the government, i. e., the State, requires the education of all the community, hence of the colored man. * * *[13]

A convention of freedmen met in November, 1866, "to devise measures to obtain full rights of citizenship." The participants demanded the [13] Ind. Doc., 44th Reg. Sess., Part I, pp. 337–338.

vote for Negroes; declared they were not asking for "social equality", and "requested that colored children might be permitted to participate in the benefits of the public schools." [14]

In his message to the Legislature, in which he submitted the Fourteenth Amendment, Governor Morton also incorporated the recommendations for Negro education which he had made in 1865, merely adding that Negroes should be subject to like taxation with white persons for school purposes.[15]

The School Report for 1868 contains statements on the status of Negro education in fourteen Northern states, which the Superintendent had obtained in reply to an inquiry.[16] In commenting on this information, the Superintendent did not differentiate between those states that had non-segregated schools and those providing separate schools for colored children. He urged again the "natural and constitutional right" of the colored population to a share in the school funds which were mainly derived from grants of Congress and "evidently designed for the citizens of the State without regard to color." In this context he referred to the Fourteenth Amendment: whatever distinctions might have been previously made by the laws of the state, "they have been set aside by the emendations of our National Constitution and the 'Civil Rights Bill.' All citizens are now equal before the law." [17]

---

[14] Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, 1866, p. 405.

[15] House J., 1867, pp. 41–42.

[16] Report, pp. 24 et seq. Ind. Doc., 1867–68.

[17] Id., p. 23.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In 1869, Governor Baker in his message to the Legislature declared:

> It is time that the illiberal policy heretofore pursued toward the colored people of the State in reference to the education of their children should be abandoned. * * *
>
> If there were no higher motives to urge us to do justice in this regard, the letter and spirit of our own Constitution would seem to make the path of duty so plain that none could err therein. * * *
>
> The precise manner in which the colored people shall be secured in their educational rights, is a question of minor importance, and one on which we can derive assistance from the experience of other States, in which the question has arisen and been settled.[18]

In 1869 the Legislature passed a law which admitted Negro children into the public school system.[19] It provided that all property subject to taxation for State and County purposes should be taxed for the support of common schools without regard to the race or color of the owner (Sec. 1); that all children, regardless of race or color, should be enumerated for school purposes, but there were to be separate lists for the races (Sec. 2); that colored children should be organized in separate schools, "having all the rights and privileges of other schools of the township"; that where there was not a sufficient number of colored

---

[18] House J., 1869, pp. 66–67.

[19] "An Act to render taxation for Common School purposes uniform and to provide for the education of the colored children of the State," Ind. Laws, 1869 (Special Session), p. 41.

children in a district, districts might be consolidated; and that if there were not enough colored children within a reasonable distance, such "other means of education" should be provided for them "as shall use their proportion, according to numbers, of school revenue to the best advantage" (Sec. 3).

The legislative debates on the 1869 law indicate that it was a compromise between liberal proposals for admitting Negro children to the existing schools by local option [20] and proposals for limiting funds for Negro schools to the taxes collected from Negroes.[21] Both in the House and the Senate doubts were expressed as to whether the provisions which were finally adopted were compatible with the state Constitution,[22] but no reference was made to the Fourteenth Amendment.[23]

In 1874 the Supreme Court of Indiana in Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327, upheld the validity of the segregation provisions of the law of 1869. It declared that they violated neither the State Constitution (relying on Lewis v. Henley, 2 Ind. 332, decided in 1850) nor the Fourteenth Amendment (approving the reasoning of the Ohio Supreme Court in State v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198.)

The Act of 1869 was amended in 1877, for the reason that "there are a large number of colored

---

[20] 10 Brevier Legislative Reports, 1869, p. 193.

[21] 11 Brevier, 1869, Special Session, p. 115.

[22] E. g. 10 Brevier, 1869, p. 533; 11 Brevier, 1869, Special Session, pp. 115, 387.

[23] The same is true of the debate in the Senate of another education bill, which did not become law. 10 Brevier, 1869, pp. 490, 492 et seq.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

children in this State that have not now equal educational advantages with white children."[24] The establishment of separate schools for Negro children was entrusted to the discretion of the school trustees; where separate schools were not provided, colored children were to be admitted to the white schools; and when a child attending a colored school was qualified for a higher grade than that afforded by such school, he had a right to enter that grade in a white school, "and no distinction shall therein be made on account of race or color of such colored child" (Sec. 1).

Prior to the enactment of the school law of 1869, separate primary schools for colored children had been established in Indianapolis in 1868.

Ten years later the primary and grammar schools were segregated, but the high school was not.[25] In 1878 Fort Wayne and Logansport reported that they had abandoned segregated schools.[26] Other cities continued to maintain separate colored schools.[27]

Indiana abandoned segregated schools in 1949.[28]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Until 1866, the Constitution and the laws of Indiana imposed severe restrictions upon Ne-

[24] Ind. Laws, 1877, p. 124.

[25] "Historical Sketches of City Schools" appended to the 26th Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction for the years 1877 and 1878, pp. 313 et seq., at 316. Ind. Doc., 1877–1878, Part 2.

[26] Id., pp. 327, 339.

[27] Id., pp. 346, 367, 371.

[28] Ind. Acts, 1949, c. 186.

groes.[29] It was unlawful for them to enter the State after 1851, and any Negro who entered the state illegally could not make a valid contract.[30] They could not testify in cases involving a white party.[31] In Smith v. Moody, 26 Ind. 299 (1866), the Supreme Court of Indiana declared that these provisions violated the United States Constitution (Article IV, § 2) and the Civil Rights Act of 1866. Miscegenation, however, remained a crime.[32] Negroes were not entitled to vote prior to ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment.[33]

IOWA

The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified by Iowa in March, 1868. In contrast with earlier legislation, the school laws enacted in the period from 1860 to 1866 did not mention race or color. Segregated schools, however, were maintained until 1868, when the state Supreme Court in Clark v. The Board of Directors, 24 Iowa 266, held that they violated both the school laws and the state constitution. Negroes were permitted to appear as witnesses after 1856. In 1868 the word "white" was eliminated from the Constitution, so that Negroes obtained, inter alia, the right to vote, hold office and be members of the militia.

[29] See Governor Morton's speech on Reconstruction and Negro Suffrage (September 1865, Pamphlet), p. 15.

[30] Constitution of 1851, Article XIII; "Enforcement Act" of June 18, 1952, Ind. Rev. Stat., 1852, c. 74.

[31] Ind. Laws, 1853, p. 60.

[32] Ind. Statutes, 1870, vol. II, part III, c. VI, sec. 47.

[33] Ind., Constitution, 1851, Article II, section 5.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In Coger v. The North West Union Packet Co., 37 Iowa 145 (1873), the Supreme Court held that the refusal of a steamship company to serve the colored plaintiff in the main cabin violated both the state constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment.

RATIFICATION

Governor Stone submitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the 12th General Assembly on January 14, 1868, with a brief recommendation for ratification.[34] The House voted in favor of ratification on January 27.[35] There was no debate. The Senate followed on March 9, 1868.[36] A motion by Senator Hollman to strike out the first, second and third sections of the Amendment was ruled out of order, as was a motion by Senator Fellows to have each section voted upon separately.[37]

SCHOOLS

Iowa's first constitution of 1846 provided that the general assembly was to establish "a system of common schools, by which a school shall be kept up and supported in each school district, at least three months in every year" (Art. 9, sec. 3). The first school law of the state[38] required that the common schools were to be "open and free alike to all white persons" of school age in each district

[34] Sen. J., 1868, pp. 32–33.
[35] House J., 1868, pp. 132–133.
[36] Sen. J., 1868, p. 265.
[37] Id., p. 264.
[38] Iowa Laws, 1846–47, c. 99.

(sec. 6).[39] The school law of 1849 limited the school census to white persons (sec. 51) and exempted the property of "black and mulattoes" from taxation for school purposes (sec. 88).[40]

The Constitutional Convention of 1857 debated an amendment to make the public schools "equally open to all."[41] It was opposed on the ground that it would entitle colored children to "mingle" with white children in the common schools.[42] Its proponents argued that separate schools for Negroes would satisfy the requirement of equality.[43] The amendment was tabled, as was another which would have restricted the common schools to white children.[44] The Constitution, as adopted in 1857, required "the education of all the youths of the State, through a system of Common Schools" (Art. IX, sec. 12).

In 1858, the legislature enacted a school law,[45] which directed the district school boards to "provide for the education of the colored youth, in separate schools, except in cases where by the unanimous consent of the persons sending to the school in the sub-district, they may be permitted to attend with the white youth" (sec. 30, subd. 4).

---

[39] The school law of the Territory (Iowa Laws, 1839–40, c. 73) had no reference to race or color.

[40] Iowa Laws, 1848–49, c. 80.

[41] Debates of the Constitutional Convention, 1857, pp. 825 et seq.

[42] Id., pp. 825–826.

[43] Id., pp. 826, 829.

[44] Id., pp. 832 et seq.

[45] An Act for the Public Instruction of the State of Iowa, Laws, 1858, c. 52.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

This act was, however, declared unconstitutional in the same year that it was enacted, on grounds not related to the provisions concerning separate schools for colored children.[46] Subsequent legislation in 1860, 1862, and 1866 made provision for public education with no mention of race or color.[47] As appears from Clark v. Board of Directors, 24 Iowa 266 (1868), segregated schools were, nevertheless, maintained. The court held that this violated both the state constitution and the state school laws. The court stated that the general discretion of the school boards in administering the schools was "limited by the line which fixes the equality of right in all the youths between the ages of five and twenty-one years" (p. 275) [italics as in original]. The court did not discuss the relevance of the Fourteenth Amendment to the question. The decision was followed, without further discussion, in Smith v. The Directors, 40 Iowa 518, and Dove v. The Independent School District, 41 Iowa 689, both decided in 1875.

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The Iowa Constitution of 1857 limited the right of suffrage to white male citizens (Art. 2, sec. 1). Since they were barred from voting, Negroes were also excluded from juries.[48] The Constitution, however, secured their right to testify in court (Art. 1, section 4).

---

[46] District Township of the City of Dubuque v. City of Dubuque, 7 Iowa 262 (1858).

[47] Rev. Laws 1860, c. 88, secs. 2023 et seq.; Laws 1862, c. 172, sec. 12; Laws 1866, c. 143, sec. 3.

[48] Iowa, Revision of 1860, sec. 2720.

In November 1868, the people voted on amendments to the State Constitution to strike the word "white" from the Constitution wherever it appeared, i. e., with regard to the right of suffrage (Art. II, Section 1), eligibility for the House of Representatives and the Senate (Article III, Sections 4, 5), census of inhabitants (Article III, Section 33), apportionment of Senators (id., Section 34) and Representatives (id., sec. 35), and service in the militia (Article VI, Section 1).[49] All these amendments were adopted.[50] Governor Merrill declared:

> Thus was finally accomplished an act of justice already too long delayed, the denial of which, on a former occasion had cast a stigma on a State which may truthfully boast that the foot of a slave has never pressed her soil.[51]

In 1873, the Supreme Court of Iowa held that the Fourteenth Amendment and the state constitution were violated by the refusal of a steamship company to serve meals to a colored person in the main cabin. Coger v. The North West. Union Packet Co., 37 Iowa 145.

KANSAS

The Kansas legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January 1867, without debate in [49] Sen. J., 1868, pp. 384–385; House J., 1868, p. 539.

[50] Governor Merrill's Message to the Thirteenth General Assembly (1870), pp. 46–47, Iowa Doc., 1868–69.

[51] Id., p. 47. In the same message Governor Merrill recommended ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which he believed marked "the final eradication of the last vestige of human bondage from the polity of the republic" (Ibid.).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the House and without dissent in the Senate. The right of colored children to public education—which had been left open in the 1859 state constitution—was reinforced in 1867, although separate schools were permitted generally until 1876. In 1867 Negroes were barred from the polls, juries and the militia, and the electorate in that year rejected a Negro suffrage amendment to the state constitution.

RATIFICATION

Governor Crawford submitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the Legislature of 1867 with this comment:

> Whilst the foregoing proposed amendment is not fully what I might desire, nor yet, what I believe the times and exigencies demand, yet, in the last canvass, from Maine to California, it was virtually the platform which was submitted to the people; the verdict was unmistakable. The people have spoken on the subject, at the ballot-box, in language which cannot be misunderstood. And as we are but their servants, to do their will, it is now our unquestionable duty to accept it, and give it our cheerful and hearty support. * * *
>
> The abolition of slavery, the investment by the laws of Congress, of all persons born within the United States, or in case of foreigners, when naturalized, with citizenship, has precipitated upon us, as a practical question, sooner than many desired, the question of impartial suffrage. If we desired, we could no longer avoid the issue. Speaking for myself, I have no desire to avoid it, but propose to meet it, like many others that have demanded adjustment as a > consequence of a successful suppression of the rebellion. I know of no reason, in law or ethics, why a loyal citizen that has shouldered his musket in defense of the National flag; that pays his taxes; that is amenable to the law in every respect, should be excluded from a participation in every right and franchise that others enjoy who are no more worthy because of their race or color.[52] * * *

The Amendment was adopted, without debate, by the House on January 10, 1867.[53] It was unanimously adopted by the Senate on January 11, 1867.[54]

SCHOOLS

The 1855 territorial laws provided for the establishment of common schools, which were to be "open and free for every class of white citizens" (Chap. 144, Sec. 1). The School Act of 1858[55] did not restrict school benefits to white children. It declared expressly:

> All district schools established under the authority of this act shall be free and without charge for tuition, to all children between the ages of five and twenty-one years, and no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein.

The Constitution adopted in 1859[56] provided in Article VI, Section 2:

> The legislature shall encourage the promotion of intellectual, moral, scientific and [52] Sen. J., 1867, p. 45.

[53] House J., 1867, p. 79.
[54] Sen. J., 1867, p. 76.
[55] Kan. Laws, 1858, c. 8, sec. 71.
[56] Kan. Laws, 1861, p. 46.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> agricultural improvement, by establishing a uniform system of Common Schools, and Schools of a higher grade, embracing normal, preparatory, collegiate, and university departments.

As originally proposed in the Convention this section contained the additional language: "which schools shall be open for the admission of pupils of both sexes." [57] Attempts to add an express provision for exclusion of Negroes failed; it was said that the question was being left to the legislature.[58] Because some of the opposition feared, however, that the provision might be interpreted as giving Negroes a constitutional right to admittance to any school, the language was deleted.[59]

In 1861 a school law was enacted,[60] framed in general terms and without reference to color distinctions, except that it empowered local school authorities

> To make such order as they deem proper for the separate education of white and colored children, securing to them equal educational advantages.[61]

In 1862, the "Act to incorporate cities of the State of Kansas," [62] provided:

> The city council of any city under this act, shall make provisions for the appropriation of all taxes for school purposes

---

[57] Kansas Constitutional Convention (1920), p. 170.

[58] Id., pp. 175–183, 192.

[59] Id., pp. 192–93.

[60] Kan. Laws, 1861, c. 76, Art. III, sec. 1 (10).

[61] This provision was identical with c. 181, Art. III, sec. 19 (10) of the Compiled Laws of Kansas, 1862, p. 802, at 807.

[62] Compiled Laws, 1862, Chapter 46, pp. 384 et seq.

> collected from black or mulatto persons, so that the children of such persons shall receive the benefit of all moneys collected by taxation for school purposes from such persons, in schools separate and apart from the schools hereby authorized for the children of white persons (Art. 4, section 18).

This was amended in 1868. In "cities of the first class," the Board of Education was given power "to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children."[63] With regard to "cities of the second class", it was provided that

> In each city governed by this act, there shall be established and maintained a system of free common schools, which shall be kept open not less than three nor more than ten months in any one year, and shall be free to all children residing in such city, between the ages of five and twenty-one years.[64]

The city boards of education were granted power, inter alia, > to provide separate schools for the education of colored and white children.[65]

The 1861 general school law was amended in 1867 in respect of non-urban schools.[66] It defined the powers of the local school meetings as follows:

---

[63] Revised Statutes, 1868, Chapter 18, Art. V, Section 75.

[64] Id., Chapter 19, Art. V, section 54.

[65] Id., section 57.

[66] Kan. Laws 1867, Chapter 123. The law was approved on February 20, 1867.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> To make such order as they may deem proper for the education of white and colored children separately or otherwise, securing to them equal educational advantages (section 1 (10)).

The Legislature also in 1867 enacted a law to enforce the provisions for public education of Negro children.[67] This law provided:

> That any district board refusing the admission of any children into the common schools, shall forfeit to the county the sum of 100 dollars each for every month so offending, during which such schools are taught, and all moneys forfeited to the common school fund of the county under this Act shall be expended by the County Superintendent for the education of such children in the school district thus denied equal educational advantages: Provided, That any member of said district board who shall protest against the action of his said board in excluding any children from equal educational advantages shall not be subject to the penalty herein named (sec. 1).

In 1868, the State Superintendent of Public Instruction reported as follows on the enrollment of colored children:

> In some localities, a very great prejudice against the co-education of the races still exists. * * * In a few districts, schools for the white children, even, were entirely suspended, in order to deprive a few colored children of the "equal educational advantages" which the law guarantees to all the [67] An Act to regulate Common Schools, Kan. Laws, 1867, Chapter 125. Approved February 26, 1867.

> children of the State, irrespective of caste or color. The true policy is to let the statute remain impartial. General intelligence will dissipate prejudices. Separate schools, in small districts, are a waste of means. Why should the highest institutions of the State be open to colored children, and the public schools be closed?[68]

In 1869, the Superintendent said in his Annual Report:

> The statistics of this year do not distinguish between colored and white children. In some districts the old prejudice still exists; but the law provides that the educational advantages extended to colored children shall be in all respects equal to those furnished to white children. By the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the right of suffrage will be conferred upon colored men, and that will do much toward removing the prejudices which now exist. The sooner, perhaps, the educational statistics of a State drop the discrimination respecting the color of persons of school age, the better. Separate schools in nearly every case are bad economy, as well as a disgrace to republican institutions.[69]

The Special Report of the federal Commissioner of Education,[70] stated in regard to Kansas:

> The people of this State have from its earliest settlement been imbued with the spirit of freedom; and their legislation in [68] Eighth Annual Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, pp. 3–4, Kans. Mess. & Doc., 1868.

[69] Annual Report, pp. 2–3, Kans. Mess. & Doc., 1869.

[70] 41st Congress, 2d Session, Ex. Doc. No. 315.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> reference to educational matters has consequently been free from invidious discriminations as to the several races. Their schools are generally open to black and to white children alike; and it is only at a few points, where large numbers of negro emigrants are to be found, that schools for colored children exist separately. [71]

In 1876, the school laws were revised and consolidated. All provisions relating to segregation were eliminated,[72] while there were retained the provisions that the common schools were to be free for all children and those penalizing the exclusion of any child.[73]

In 1881, the power of a school board to direct segregation of colored children was denied in Board of Education of the City of Ottawa v. Tinnon, 26 Kans. 1. In this case the state Supreme Court referred with approval to several decisions of the Supreme Court of Iowa [74] and concluded:

> If the board has the power, because of race, to establish separate schools for children of African descent, then the board has the power to establish separate schools for persons of Irish descent or German

---

[71] Id., p. 346.

[72] Kan. Laws, 1876, c. 122, p. 238, in particular Article III, section 11 (powers of district meeting), Article X, section 4 (powers of boards of education in cities of first class), Article XI, section 9 (powers of boards in cities of second class). But in 1879 cities of the first class were again granted the power to establish segregated schools. Kans. Laws, 1879, c. 81, sec. 1.

[73] Id., Article V, sections 3 and 4, Article XI, section 2.

[74] Clark v. The Board of Directors, 24 Iowa 266; Smith v. The Directors, 40 Iowa 518; Dove v. The Independent School District, 41 Iowa 689.

> descent; and if it has the power, because of color, to establish separate schools for black children, then it has the power to establish separate schools for red-headed children and blondes. We do not think that the board has any such power. We have conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the legislature has the authority to confer such power upon school boards; but in our opinion the legislature has not exercised or attempted to exercise any such authority (pp. 22–23).

The court also touched upon the effect of the Fourteenth Amendment on racial segregation in public schools, as to which it concluded:

> The question whether the legislatures of states have the power to pass laws making distinctions between white and colored citizens, and the extent of such power, if it exists, is a question which can finally be determined only by the supreme court of the United States; and hence we pass this question, and proceed to the next, over which we have more complete jurisdiction (p. 18).

Judge Brewer (later a justice of the United States Supreme Court), dissented "entirely from the suggestion that under the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution, the state has no power to provide for separate schools for white and colored children. I think, notwithstanding such amendment, each state has the power to classify the school children by color, sex or otherwise, as to its legislature shall seem wisest and best" (pp. 23–24). He also held that the board, under the general authorization of the school law of the state, had the power to make such classifications.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Article V, section 1, of the Constitution of 1859 restricted suffrage to white males. The selection of juries was limited by statute to qualified electors.[75] In 1867, the year in which the Legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, the electorate rejected amendments to give the vote to Negroes and to women.[76]

The earlier territorial law of 1855 declaring Indians and Negroes incompetent as witnesses[77] appears nowhere to have been expressly repealed, but it does not appear in the General Statutes compiled in 1868.

KENTUCKY

Kentucky never ratified the Fourteenth Amendment. It rejected the Amendment in January, 1867 by large margins in both houses. The school system since 1838 had provided for education of white children only, and colored persons were exempt from some of the taxes which supported it. In 1867 colored schools were authorized, but they were not generally established until mandatory provisions were enacted in 1874. The 1874 legislation expressly provided for segregated schools. Negroes were barred from voting and serving as jurors.

---

[75] Kans. Gen. Stat., 1868, c. 54, sec. 2.

[76] Kansas Constitutional Convention (1920), App., p. 594.

[77] Kans. Terr., Laws, 1855, c. 165, Sec. 22.

RATIFICATION

Governor Bramlette, in his message to the Kentucky Legislature on January 4, 1867, urged that the Fourteenth Amendment had not been constitutionally proposed since the Southern States were not represented in Congress and the necessary two-thirds of the Congress was not present.[78] The House of Representatives on January 8, 1867, rejected the Amendment by a vote of 67 to 27,[79] and the Senate, on the same day, by a vote of 24 to 9.[80] There appears to have been no debate by either house.

SCHOOLS

In 1830, the Kentucky legislature passed an act "to encourage the general diffusion of education," [81] which permitted, but did not require, the counties of the Commonwealth to establish public schools. While the statute did not expressly exclude Negroes from the schools, the authorization of a tax upon every "white male inhabitant" [82] implied that Negro education was not contemplated. Kentucky, unlike many slave States, had no prohibition against the instruction of Negroes.[83]

The permissive school system was made mandatory in 1838. There was an express provision for

---

[78] House Journal, 1867, p. 22.

[79] Id., pp. 60–65.

[80] Senate Journal, 1867, pp. 62, 63, 64.

[81] Ky. Laws, 1829–30, c. 387.

[82] Id., sec. 22.

[83] Special Report of the U. S. Commissioner of Education (1871), p. 346, House Exec. Docs., 41st Cong., 2d Sess., vol. 13, no. 315.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the allotment of state funds on the basis of the number of white children in the county,[84] although the county was still empowered to tax all inhabitants. When the school law was revised in 1864, these provisions were retained.[85]

In 1867, an act "for the benefit of negroes" was passed. This provided for the application of all capitation taxes paid by colored persons, as well as an authorized additional tax of two dollars on each Negro male, to the support of colored paupers and the education of colored children.[86] With these funds the counties were permitted to establish colored schools towards the support of which the state would also contribute.[87]

The 1870 act "to revise, amend and reduce into one the laws relating to the common schools of Kentucky"[88] defined a common school as one which every white child between the ages of six and twenty years had the privilege of attending, whether contributing towards defraying its expenses or not (Art. X, sec. 1). No mention was made of colored schools in this law but its language implied that colored pupils were not admitted to the common schools.

A year later there was enacted "an act to cause good school houses to be erected in the 8th and 9th congressional districts."[89] This stated that it "shall not be construed so as in any way

[84] Ky. Laws, 1837–38, c. 898, sec. 18.
[85] Ky. Laws, 1863–64, c. 196.
[86] Ky. Laws, 1867, c. 1913, secs. 1, 2, 4.
[87] Id., sec. 6.
[88] Ky. Laws, 1870, c. 854.
[89] Ky. Acts, 1871, Vol. 1, c. 1483, p. 51.

to apply to negroes and mulattoes." (Sec. 10.) Similarly, an act regulating the school district of Carrollton in Carroll County provided that only white children were to be admitted to the schools of the district.[90] Schools for Negroes were provided for in a few towns, e. g., Henderson (1871)[91] and Catlettsburg (1873).[92]

A uniform system of common schools for colored children was initiated by legislation enacted in 1874.[93] This legislation set up a school system similar to that existing for white children. Provision was made for Negroes to elect Negro trustees. A property and personal tax to be levied upon Negroes was imposed. Section 16 of the 1874 act provided

> That it shall not be lawful for any colored child to attend a common school provided for white children, nor for a white child to attend a common school provided for colored children.

The Report of the Superintendent of Education for the year ending June 30, 1875, noted the improvement in the status of Negro education:[94]

> We have had one year of experiment with our Colored Common School System, and the results have fully justified the wisdom of its inauguration. * * * (p. 105.)
>
> The white system had quite as feeble a beginning as the colored. It is a growth. From a rudimental cell it has developed [90] Ky, Acts, 1872, Vol. II, c. 594.

[91] Ky. Acts, 1871, Vol. I, c. 1478, p. 388.

[92] Ky. Acts, 1873, Vol. II, c. 653, p. 193.

[93] Ky. Acts, 1873–74, c. 521.

[94] Report of the Superintendent of Education, pp. 105, 106, Ky. Doc. 1874–75.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> into its present proportions. The lapse of the same number of years will, in the natural growth of sentiment and resources, put the colored system abreast with that of the whites, and every one should be willing, in patience and faith, to wait for the growth of that which cannot be forced by any hot-bed processes (p. 107).

In 1891 Kentucky adopted a constitution, Section 187 of which provided:

> In distributing the school fund no distinction shall be made on account of race or color, and separate schools for white and colored children shall be maintained.

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Negroes were barred from voting in Kentucky,[95] and excluded from juries.[96] In February 1866, the legislature passed two laws designed to give the Negro the right to marry one of his own race, and to institute civil and criminal proceedings. However, both laws specifically retained certain discriminations; the one made miscegenation a crime;[97] the other restricted the Negro's appearance as a witness to civil cases where only Negroes were involved, and to criminal actions in which a Negro was a defendant.[98] Negroes had previously been allowed to appear as witnesses in all cases brought by the Commonwealth for or against Negroes.[99]

---

[95] Ky. Const., 1850, Art. II, sec. 8.
[96] Ky. Rev. Stats., 1867, c. 55, Art. III, sec. 2.
[97] Ky. Laws, 1866, c. 556, sec. 3.
[98] Id., c. 563, sec. 3.
[99] Ky. Rev. Stats., 1867, c. 107, sec. 1.

LOUISIANA

The Louisiana legislature unanimously rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in February, 1867. In July, 1868, the Reconstruction legislature ratified the Amendment. Public schools were restricted to whites until the adoption of the Constitution of 1868 which expressly prohibited distinction on grounds of race, color or previous condition of servitude. This provision was incorporated in the school law of 1869. The Constitution of 1879 was silent on the subject. The 1898 Constitution expressly required separate schools. Racial distinctions, as well as discriminations, by any public conveyance or place of business were prohibited by the 1868 constitution, and all citizens were declared entitled to the "same civil, political, and public rights and privileges." The Legislature in 1872 memorialized Congress in favor of Senator Sumner's supplementary Civil Rights bill.

RATIFICATION

Louisiana rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in February, 1867, by a unanimous vote of both Houses,[1] despite the recommendation of Governor Wells that it be ratified.[2] In July, 1868, the amendment was ratified by a vote of 22 to 11 in the Senate and 57 to 3 in the House.[3] In the House

> Mr. McMillen moved that the resolution be put through its several readings.
> Carried,

---

[1] Senate Journal, 1867, p. 20; House Journal, 1867, p. 23.
[2] Senate Journal, 1867, p. 5.
[3] Senate Journal, 1868, p. 21; House Journal, 1868, p. 8.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> On the third reading, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the resolution was adopted by the following vote, as follows—yeas 57, nays 3.[4]

In the Senate there was more delay, but little debate except that Senator Bacon objected to ratification under duress.[5]

SCHOOLS

Prior to 1868, public education was for white children only. For example, the Legislature of 1867 authorized the cities of Baton Rouge and New Orleans to establish schools "for the gratuitous education of the white children residing therein."[6]

Education (of white children) had been recognized as a public responsibility. The Constitution of 1845 provided that

> The legislature shall establish free public schools throughout the State, and shall provide means for their support by taxation on property, or otherwise. (Title VII, Art. 134.)

That of 1852 specified "white children:"

> The general assembly shall establish free public schools throughout the State; and shall provide for their support by general taxation on property or otherwise; and all moneys so raised or provided shall be distributed to each parish in proportion to the number of free white children between

[4] House Journal, 1868, p. 8.

[5] Senate Journal, 1868, p. 21.

[6] Louisiana Acts, 1867, No. 34, p. 61; No. 107, p. 203.

> such ages as shall be fixed by the general assembly. (Title VIII, Art. 136.)

The 1864 Constitution did not specify:

> The legislature shall provide for the education of all children of the State, between the ages of six and eighteen years, by maintenance of free public schools by taxation or otherwise. (Title XI, Art. 141.)

Governor Wells in his message on January 28, 1867, in which he transmitted the Fourteenth Amendment with a recommendation for ratification,[7] urged education for the freedman. He made no reference to the possible applicability of the Amendment to this question:

> * * * I remind you of the claims of the freedman and his family to an equal participation in the benefits to be derived from this beneficent system * * * I regard it as the most important recommendation I can make to you, that an appropriation be made from the school fund for the establishment of colored schools in all the parishes under the general law.[8]

The Reconstruction Constitution of 1868 was specific that all children were to be educated, and went farther to prohibit segregated schools:[9]

> ART. 135. The general assembly shall establish at least one free public school in every parish throughout the State, and shall provide for its support by taxation or otherwise. All children of this State be-

[7] Senate Journal, 1867, p. 5.

[8] Id., p. 7.

[9] The Constitution of 1879 (Art. 224) omitted the prohibition on separate schools. That of 1898 required separate schools (Art. 248).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

tween the ages of six and twenty-one shall be admitted to the public schools or other institutions of learning sustained or established by the State in common, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition. There shall be no separate schools or institutions of learning established exclusively for any race by the State of Louisiana.

ART. 136. No municipal corporation shall make any rules or regulations contrary to the spirit and intention of article 135.

The prohibition on separate schools in the 1868 Constitution was recommended by the majority of the Committee on Education, but a minority preferred to make no reference to the question.[10] The section on education was referred to the Committee on the Draft of the Constitution, which reported an article which did not refer to separate or mixed schools, but merely provided for education "without prejudice or partiality to any."[11] A minority of that committee agreed with the majority of the Committee on Education[12] and their recommendation was adopted by a vote of 61 to 12.[13] Objections to the proposal for mixed schools as reported contained no reference to the Fourteenth Amendment.[14]

The Legislature of 1868 did not enact a public school law, although it contemplated the establishment of free public schools.[15] In 1869 a compre-

[10] Convention Journal, pp. 60–1.
[11] Id., p. 94.
[12] Id., pp. 96, 107.
[13] Id., pp. 200–202, 268–70, 275.
[14] Id., pp. 201, 277, 290, 292.
[15] Louisiana Acts, 1868, No. 162, p. 212.

hensive "Act to Regulate Public Education in the State of Louisiana and to Raise Revenue for the support of the same" was enacted.[16] It contained no reference to color. A revision of the following year[17] specifically mentioned the constitutional requirement:

> * * * It shall be the duty of said Board of Education to make a general regulation whereby all schools established under this law, shall be according to the provisions of the Constitution, open to all children of this State between the ages of six and twenty-one years, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition, and in case of failing to pass such regulation, the members of said board shall forfeit the salary allowed them * * * (Sec. 5).

The question of education for Negroes and the further question of mixed schools was discussed without reference to the Fourteenth Amendment.

Governor Warmoth in his annual message for 1869[18] recommended school laws:

> It is to be regretted that the last Legislature did not pass some laws on the subject of education. At this time the school system is woefully defective. Outside of the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson public schools have always been a failure, and here at the capital, where it is in its greatest perfection, it is nothing to boast of. * * * There are not school houses enough in the city or State to accommodate half the children, while large numbers are almost totally denied the means of educa-

[16] Louisiana Acts, 1869, No. 121, pp. 175–189.
[17] Louisiana Acts, 1870, Extra Sess., No. 6, pp. 12–30.
[18] Louisiana Legislative Documents, 1869.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> tion on account of color. The Legislature should give immediate attention to this subject, and provide means by which every child may receive an education without any distinction * * *[19]

The following year he stated the basis of education for the Negro as arising out of his enfranchisement:

> You need no lengthy and labored discussion to impress you with the importance of education. Without it the duties of a citizen are difficult, and we who have enfranchised a race, and have taught that American citizenship is the crowning glory of our Republican institutions, must appreciate that education is the first and most indispensable want of the citizen. Self-protection and self-government alike demand the enlightenment of the masses. The report of the Superintendent of Public Education will show you the impracticable character of the present law. The machinery is cumbrous and expensive * * *[20]

In the legislative debates references were made to the fact that in New Orleans colored children were placed in separate and inferior schools. This was condemned as a violation of the state constitution, no mention being made of the Fourteenth Amendment.[21]

The State Superintendent of Public Education discussed the question of mixed schools, again only with reference to the state constitution:

---

[19] Message, p. 9.

[20] Message of Governor Warmoth, Jan. 4, 1870, p. 7, Louisiana Legislative Documents, 1870.

[21] Louisiana House Debates, 1869, pp. 209–10, 217–20, 246–7.

Than this, there is no subject connected with our system of education on which stronger feeling has been awakened, and none, the influence of which, has been more powerfully felt, as the opinions of the advocates and opponents of the present law have come into collision. Yet upon this point the constitution of the State and the laws passed under it, leave no discretionary power. Our schools, if they exist at all under the constitution, must be open, impartially, to all citizens of the State for the education of their children.

* * * * *

I believe that the subject of mixed schools is one which needs no new discussion. A republican State can make no distinction between those who are equally citizens, nor can any humiliating conditions be made in the bestowment of benefits to which all have an equal claim. Yet while standing thus firmly on the principle which underlies the present system, I believe it to be not in the nature of true statesmanship to ignore existing difficulties, nor to underestimate the obstacles which oppose themselves to measures in themselves desirable. In all great changes, whether political or social, where the old order is superseded by new and unfamiliar usages, time is needed for the public mind to adjust itself to the change * * *.

* * * * *

* * * For the present, this question will, in most localities, adjust itself if left to the unconstrained choice of those immediately interested; and it is doubtful if that liberty of choice should be interfered with by a forcible attempt to mix the schools in lo-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> calities where such action is undesired by any.
>
> Still, the right of any child to admission into any school of the district in which he resides, and to which he is by law entitled, is one that must be enforced. The position I have taken, and on which I shall continue to act in administering the law, is, that "no public schools must be established from which any children are excluded by reason of color." [22]

At the end of the year 1870, he reported:

> There is, probably, no other State in the Union where the work of popular education, by a system of free schools, is conducted under the disadvantages which are encountered in Louisiana. Not only have we, in common with some sister States, to build the whole system anew, and to do this in the face of that general apathy, rising at times to positive antagonism, which prevails in the Gulf States, but that provision of our Constitution which forbids the establishing of public schools from which any child shall be rejected, on account of race, color or previous condition, excites a determined opposition on the part of many, who would otherwise cooperate in the opening of schools and in the raising of funds for their support.[23]

Article 224 of the Constitution of 1879 is silent on the question of race, and apparently permitted

---

[22]Annual Report of the State Superintendent of Public Education for 1869, pp. 11–13, Louisiana Legislative Documents 1870.

[23]Annual Report of the State Superintendent of Public Education for the year 1870, p. 28, Louisiana Legislative Documents 1871.

segregation while not requiring it. Article 248 of the Constitution of 1898 made separate schools mandatory.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

In fields other than education the Constitution of 1868 prohibited not merely "discrimination," but also "distinction" based on race or color:

> ART. 2. All persons, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, and residents of this State for one year, are citizens of this State. The citizens of this State owe allegiance to the United States; and this allegiance is paramount to that which they owe to the State. They shall enjoy the same civil, political, and public rights and privileges, and be subject to the same pains and penalties.
>
> ART. 13. All persons shall enjoy equal rights and privileges upon any conveyance of a public character; and all places of business, or of public resort, or for which a license is required by either State, parish, or municipal authority, shall be deemed places of a public character, and shall be opened to the accommodation and patronage of all persons, without distinction or discrimination on account of race or color.

The legislatures of this period attempted to enforce the non-discrimination provisions of Article 13 of the Constitution. Enforcement acts to prevent discrimination on account of race or color were passed in 1869, 1871, and 1873.[24] In addition Congress was requested to adopt Senator [24] Louisiana Acts, 1869, No. 38, p. 37; 1871, No. 23, p. 57; 1873, No. 84, p. 156.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Sumner's supplementary civil rights bill, pending in 1872.[25]

MAINE

Maine ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867. Segregation by law never existed in the public schools of Maine, and the only racial law was an anti-miscegenation statute.

RATIFICATION

Governor Chamberlain, in addressing the Legislature on January 3, 1867, referred to the Fourteenth Amendment as follows:

> Imperfect as this was, as hazarding one of the very fruits of our victory by placing it in the power of the South to introduce into the Constitution a disability founded on race and color, still as it was the best wisdom of our Representatives in Congress, and at least a step in the right direction, at the same time that it smoothed the way for the returning South, and especially as it was the declared issue in the recent elections good faith doubtless requires us to support it.[26]

This same sentiment was voiced in the Senate by at least five Senators, all in favor of adopting the Amendment, and all maintaining that something more was needed.[27]

---

[25] Louisiana Acts, 1872, No. 1, p. 29.

[26] House J., 1867, p. 20.

[27] Bangor Daily Whig and Courier, Jan. 17, 1867, p. 2, col. 3; McPherson's Scrap Book, Fourteenth Amendment, p. 68 (paper not named).

The House on January 11, 1867, adopted a resolution ratifying the Amendment,[28] and the Senate followed on January 16.[29]

SCHOOLS

Maine's public school laws, enacted under its original Constitution of 1820, do not appear to have made any distinction between colored and white children.

It has been stated that a separate school for Negroes was established in Portland at one time.[30]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The only legislation found concerning Negroes is a miscegenation statute.[31] This statute continued after the Civil War,[32] and was repealed in 1883.[33]

MARYLAND

The Maryland legislature rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867, following a message from the Governor that its effect would be "the ultimate enforcement of negro suffrage and negro equality." Although before the war there was no prohibition against education of Negroes, as late as 1872 there was no provision for Negro participation in public education, ex-

[28] House J., 1867, p. 78.

[29] Sen. J., 1867, p. 101.

[30] Woodson, Education of the Negro Prior to 1861 (1915), p. 326, citing Adams, The Neglected Period of Anti-Slavery in America, Radcliffe College Monograph No. 14 (1908), p. 142.

[31] See Bailey v. Fiske, 34 Me. 77 (1852).

[32] Maine Rev. Stats. 1871, tit. 5, c. 59, § 2.

[33] Maine Laws, 1883, c. 203.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

cept in Baltimore. The public school system was established in 1865. That law provided public schools for white children and contemplated the establishment of separate schools for colored children. Maryland's "Black Code" was repealed in 1865 and 1867, but Negroes remained subject to disabilities in respect of voting and jury service.

RATIFICATION

The Maryland legislature in 1867 refused to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment. Governor Swann, in his message of January 4, 1867, urged rejection of the Amendment, in part because it was an attempt "to force equality between the races." He made no reference to education. His message stated in part:

> It cannot have escaped notice, that the proposed amendment, comprising five distinct propositions, embodies more than its language would seem to convey, and that the clause, to enforce these provisions, "by appropriate legislation," may leave the Southern and Border States at the mercy of the majority in Congress, in all future time—subversive, as I believe, of every principle of justice and equality among the States, and in times of high party excitement and sectional alienation, dangerous to the liberties of the people.
>
> I assume, without the fear of contradiction, that the effect of this Amendment of the Constitution as a condition precedent to the re-admission of the revolted States, will be the ultimate enforcement of negro suffrage and negro equality, by indirect legislation. * * *
>
> * * * * * *

The great obstacle in determining this vexed question of re-construction, is the future status of the negro race.

The Constitutional Amendments mean this and nothing else. The fear of disloyalty is not to be thought of for a moment; and the proposed change in the basis of representation, points to negro suffrage, and the equalization of the races.—There are four millions of negroes to be dealt with. If this element were insignificant or out of the way, there would be no talk of Constitutional Amendments. But the power of the South is to be held in check at least, if not appropriated by the extreme men of the dominant party.

My opposition to any further tampering with the Constitution, proceeds upon the honest belief, that Congress controls all the power needed to protect the country against disloyalty, whatever form it may assume, if any such exists, and that Constitutional Amendments, to force equality between the races, can only result in the ultimate annihilation of the weaker race. Some time ago, the absorbing topic among political agitators, was amalgamation: now it is "manhood suffrage," which means amalgamation, and the power to hold office, without regard to race or color, and every other attribute of perfect equality between the races. This will all do very well for the States of the North, where the colored race have never lived, and cannot be induced to emigrate. With the Southern border States, it is a question of social and political existence. In Maryland the negro would anon hold the balance of power, if in a few years, from the swelling current of immigration alone, he did not command the numerical ascendency.[34]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Joint Committee on Federal Relations reported against ratification.[35] With respect to the first section, the report stated:

> * * * the Constitution of the United States declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." In the judgment of your Committee it is not safe to confer any additional powers upon Congress touching this subject.
>
> * * * * * *
>
> The proposition to vest in Congress the power of supervision, interference and control over State legislation affecting the lives, liberty and property of its citizens and persons subject to its jurisdiction, is virtually to enable Congress to abolish the State governments.[36]

Ratification was rejected by a vote of 13 to 4 in the Senate [37] and 47 to 10 in the House.[38]

SCHOOLS

In Maryland in 1860, 87,189 Negroes were slaves, and 83,942 were free.[39] Although the freedmen were subject to various legal restrictions,

---

[34] House Journal and Documents, 1867, Doc. A, pp. 21–22, 24–25; Senate Journal and Documents, 1867, Doc. A.

[35] Maryland Laws, 1867, pp. 879–911.

[36] Id., pp. 893–894.

[37] Senate Journal, 1867, p. 808.

[38] House Journal, 1867, p. 1141.

[39] Special Report of the Commissioner of Education (1871), p. 352.

there had been no prohibition on their education, and at least one school for the children of freedmen had been in existence since 1835.[40]

The first public school law was enacted in 1865.[41] It provided for a system of free public schools for white children only:

> In every school district in each city and county established as hereinbefore provided, there shall be kept for at least six months, in each year, one or more schools according to population, which shall be free to all white youth over six and under nineteen years of age.[42]
>
> * * * * *
>
> All white youth between the ages of six and nineteen years, are entitled to free instruction in any of the public schools of the State * * *.[43]

It also envisaged the establishment of schools for colored children:

> The total amount of taxes paid for school purposes by the colored people of any county and the city of Baltimore, together with any donations that may be made, shall be set aside for the purpose of founding schools for colored children, which schools shall be established under the direction of the School Commissioners, and shall be subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Education shall prescribe.[44]

A revision in 1868 contained similar provisions.[45]

---

[40] Id., p. 353.

[41] Maryland Laws, 1865, C. 160, pp. 269–301.

[42] Id., p. 282.

[43] Id., p. 285.

[44] Id., pp. 295–296.

[45] Maryland Laws, 1868, C. 407, pp. 745–68.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

At the 1867 session of the legislature the Superintendent of Public Instruction submitted his First Annual Report for the year ending June 30, 1866.[46] He recommended education for Negroes as "the duty and interest of the State":

> * * * I believe it to be the duty and interest of the State to provide opportunities of education for all who live within her borders; and therefore repeat the recommendation, that separate schools for colored children to be under the control of the School Commissioners, be established in every district where 30 or more pupils will regularly attend.
>
> While nothing has yet been done for this class by the State, it is gratifying to know that the colored people, appreciating the advantages of education, are doing what they can for themselves, aided by liberal contributions from benevolent individuals, and the Baltimore Association. (Report, p. 64.)

In Governor Swann's message of January 15, 1868,[47] he regarded the success of the Democrats in the 1867 State elections as a repudiation of the Congressional plan of reconstruction. In the section of his message dealing with the topic, "Negro Suffrage and Negro Equality—Territorial Government for Maryland," he said in part that

> * * * The white man can never be educated to believe that the Negro is his equal, nor can he be persuaded, unless warped in his heretofore fixed impressions, that the [46] House Journal and Documents, 1867, Doc. K.

[47] House Document A, Maryland Documents, 1868.

two races can be brought together in political or social fraternization, upon terms of equality, without degradation to his own * * *

Our obligation to clothe the Negro with the full privileges of citizenship cannot be claimed upon any reasonable ground, either of justice or humanity. "Equality before the Law" and "Manhood Suffrage," are phrases, in no wise applicable to us whose misfortune it has been to deal with a distinct and peculiar people, whose intrusion into our midst was the result of agencies which imposed no obligation beyond that which affected the rights of person and property, which the Negro is now enjoying to the fullest extent under our laws. This Government was never intended by its founders to be shared by the African race; it was no part of our compact of Union. It was a white man's government exclusively. The liberty to exercise the right of suffrage and to hold office was a function of the Government intended to be parted with or not, as the people in the aggregate might determine, in the mode pointed out in their organic law. * * * (pp. 18–19).

* * * * *

The change which has been wrought by the verdict of the people in the late elections, certain to be followed by more overwhelming expressions of the public sentiment, will enable us to deal more advisedly hereafter with this Negro issue; and will point to enlarged educational facilities, and the security of person and property, in lieu of amalgamation and forced equality with the white race, as the only privileges which in justice to themselves, as well as the peaceful working of our system, can be ad-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> vantageously conferred upon the Negro race * * * (p. 22).

The Second Annual Report of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction (1868),[48] stated that

> No public organized plans have been adopted for the education of this class of children, except in the city of Baltimore. As reported last year, schools have been continued in the counties under the direction of the Baltimore Association for the moral and mental improvement of colored persons, supported by contributions from benevolent associations, and the payment of tuition fees by the parents or friends of the children educated.
>
> * * * * *
>
> The Schools for colored people in the city of Baltimore were adopted by the City Council in September 1867, and are now conducted under the supervision of the City School Commissioners.
>
> * * * * *
>
> Whatever prejudice may have existed in the minds of some of our citizens on this subject, is rapidly disappearing, and I think it may be asserted that while there is not at present a willingness to educate colored children at the public expense, there is a readiness to grant them such facilities and encouragements as will not prove a burden upon the resources of the State (pp. 42–43).

He then quoted the following from the report of Dr. S. A. Harrison of Talbot County:

---

[48] Maryland Documents, 1868, No. W.

> "The question suggests itself, can and should anything be done by the County or State for the support of these schools? * * * Emancipation accomplished, education must follow or society suffers. In slavery the master stood in the relation of parent to his slaves. The State must now assume that relation. They are now children of the State, but children who will rend and tear their own mother if not properly educated * * *" (p. 44).

The Maryland Legislature next met in 1870, after the Fourteenth Amendment had become a part of the Constitution. Governor Bowie in his annual message recommended modifications in the school law. As to colored schools, he said the following:

> If at a period, immediate or remote, [the freed men] are to become citizens, possessed of the elective franchise, would not sound policy, then, dictate such education of the colored population as would prepare them intelligently to exercise the elective franchise, and as citizens to judge for themselves of the proper workings of our political system, and not be misled by the crafts and clamors of designing and unscrupulous politicians? Education among the colored people of the State would have a beneficial effect in rendering them more valuable in any position they may be destined to fill. It would doubtless render them, as a class, more virtuous and provident, and better members of the community in which they live. * * *[49]

In the 1870 Annual Report on the condition

[49] House Document A, January 20, 1870, pp. 14–15.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

of the public schools,[50] the reason for educating colored children was given as follows:

> It is evident that if the colored people are to be educated by the State, some more effective measure must be adopted. And in view of all the circumstances of the case, I do not believe that the counties can do a better or a wiser thing than to follow the example of Baltimore City, in educating the colored children in separate schools, but under the same general laws and superintendence as the white children. True, this will cost some money, but will it not cost more to educate them for the penitentiary and in it? (pp. 17–18).

The annual message of Governor Bowie in 1872 referred to the subject of Negro education as follows:

> The total amount of school taxes paid by the colored people, is set aside for the support of colored schools; but this amount is so small as to be practically worthless. Even when supplemented by additional donations from the school funds, it did not reach, in 1870, the sum of five thousand dollars. The kind and generous feeling entertained in this State for the colored race, who have been reared among us, and who, in their changed condition of circumstances, have conducted themselves, as a rule, with marked propriety, will dictate that the opportunity of at least a rudimental education should be offered them.[51]

In another part of the message he stated that the Ku Klux Act[52] was not authorized under the

---

[50] House Document G, January 1870.

[51] Md. Docs., 1872, House Doc. B, p. 12.

[52] 17 Stat. 13.

Fourteenth Amendment,[53] but he made no reference to the Amendment in connection with education.

The Board of State School Commissioners in discussing education for Negroes in 1872 did so without reference to the Fourteenth Amendment:[54]

> There are no arguments in favor of the education of the people that do not apply with equal or greater force to the education of colored people, now that they are free, and are by Law entitled to the elective franchise. Every consideration of public policy, of philanthropy, and of justice demands that a beginning should be made in this direction as soon as the finances of the State will permit.

In April, 1872, the county school commissioners were required by statute to establish colored schools "provided the average attendance be not less than fifteen scholars;" such schools were to be supported by special appropriations as well as by all school taxes paid by Negroes.[55]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Before the Civil War Maryland had had a "Black Code." Manumission was prohibited;[56] slaves might be brought into the state, but not free Negroes, other than personal servants;[57] strict regulations controlled meetings of Negroes,

---

[53] Md. Docs., 1872, House Doc. B, pp. 65–80.

[54] Report of the Board of State School Commissioners, House Doc. V, p. 12 (March 1872).

[55] Md. Laws, 1872, c. 377, c. 18.

[56] Md. Code, 1860, art. 66, sec. 42.

[57] Id., sec. 2, 44 et seq.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

and the circulation of abolition papers was prohibited.[58] There were special provisions relating to criminal offenses, contracts, and employment.[59] Negroes could not appear as witnesses in cases involving white persons.[60]

During the war and shortly thereafter most of these restrictions were removed. The provision against manumission went in 1864.[61] In 1865 and 1867, the entire part of the Civil Code dealing with Negroes, except for one section, was repealed.[62] The special provisions of the criminal law applicable to Negroes were also eliminated in 1867.[63]

Remaining in force, however, were the denial of suffrage,[64] and exclusion from juries.[65] The law against miscegenation, carrying stringent penalties, was repealed in 1867,[66] but in 1884, it was again made a crime punishable by imprisonment.[67]

MASSACHUSETTS

Massachusetts ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in March, 1867, over the opposition of a minority which objected mainly to the provisions of section 2. Prior to 1855, there was no provi-

[58] Id., sec. 58 et seq.

[59] See, generally, art. 66 of the Code, and art. 30 (crimes).

[60] Md. Code, 1860, art. 37, sec. 1.

[61] Md. Laws, 1864, c. 105.

[62] Md. Laws, 1865, c. 166; 1867, c. 54.

[63] Md. Laws, 1867, c. 10, 64.

[64] Md. Const., 1867, art. I, sec. 1.

[65] Md. Laws, 1867, c. 329. There does not seem to have been any explicit statutory prohibition before this.

[66] Md. Laws, 1867, c. 64.

[67] Md. Laws, 1884, c. 264.

sion in the Massachusetts school laws referring to race or color, but schools for colored children were established in some cities. In 1845 a law was enacted giving a right of action to children unlawfully excluded from any public school. In Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. 198 (1850), the Supreme Court of the state declared that school segregation did not violate the equality before the law which was guaranteed by the Massachusetts Constitution. The Legislature in 1855 prohibited any racial distinctions in the admission of pupils to the public schools. Negroes always had the right to vote.

RATIFICATION

Massachusetts ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in March, 1867. Governor Bullock recommended ratification in his Inaugural Address of January 4, 1867, and at the same time advocated universal suffrage. He said:

> * * * Prominent among the provisions of this Article of amendment, I notice great principles of government, long recognized by the people of this Commonwealth, and endeared to them by the sanctions of their own history and usage.
>
> The first section guarantees to all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction, the right of citizenship and of civil equality before the law; and it protects them from any State legislation which might abridge their privileges, or deprive them of life, liberty or property, without due legal process. To this cardinal principle of a republican government I am unable to see how any citizen can reasonably object, who is himself in

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> sincerity of belief a supporter of the Democratic idea. As an abstract proposition, it is so manifestly an axiom of free government as to preclude the necessity of argument. In its special application to the condition of the insurgent States, its adoption by Congress was designed to give certain and enduring effect to the provisions of the Act, commonly called the Civil Rights Bill, passed at its last session, by the constitutional majority, notwithstanding the objections of the President. Whatever reasons existed at the time for the enactment of that bill, apply with redoubled force to the incorporation of its provisions into the organic law. The denial of its benefits and immunities to a large class of citizens in those States, rendering emancipation to a great extent a nullity, now demands its affirmation in the most solemn form, to the end that neither the Executive nor the judicial power, nor the local authorities, may render inoperative the deliberate verdict of the people.[68]

After discussing the other sections of the Amendment, the Governor stressed the need for Congressional action for the reconstruction of the Southern states. Such reconstruction could not be successful, he stated, unless complete justice was done to the Negroes through the grant of suffrage. No educational requirement such as was incorporated in the Constitution of Massachusetts should be attached to the franchise in the South:

> To the colored race, held in ignorance by local laws in regions where district schools > are unknown and public education scarcely exists in any form, with the law and the purse in the hands of determined opponents, suffrage thus limited would be practically unattainable.

[68] Mass. Acts and Resolves, 1867, pp. 820–821.

Unrestricted franchise would be the surest method of securing education for the Negroes in the Southern states.[69]

The Amendment was referred to the House Committee on Federal Relations,[70] which reported on February 28.[71] The majority submitted an extensive discussion, with the conclusion > that no exigency exists requiring immediate action upon an amendment open to the grave objections we have presented.[72]

They recommended that the matter be referred to the next legislature. The principal criticisms were directed against the second section. It was said that this perpetuated the "outrage" of Negro disfranchisement.[71a]

As to the first section of the Amendment, the majority found that

> It is difficult to see how these provisions differ from those now existing in the Constitution * * *.
>
> * * * The last clause, no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws," though not found in these precise words in the Constitution, is inevitably inferable from its whole scope and true interpretation.

---

[69] Id., p. 826.

[70] Jan. 5, 1867. House J., 1867, p. 12.

[71] Mass. House Doc., 1867, No. 149.

[71a] Id., pp. 5–9, 17.

[72] Id., p. 24.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> The denial by any State to any person within its jurisdiction, of the equal protection of the laws, would be a flagrant perversion of the guarantees of personal rights which we have quoted. If it should be said that such denial has existed heretofore in spite of these guarantees, we answer that such denial would be equally possible and probable hereafter, in spite of an indefinite reiteration of these guarantees by new amendments.
>
> We are brought to the conclusion, therefore, that this first section is, at best, mere surplusage; and that it is mischievous, inasmuch as it is an admission, either that the same guarantees do not exist in the present Constitution, or that if they are there, they have been disregarded, and by long usage or acquiescence, this disregard has hardened into constitutional right; and no security can be given that similar guarantees will not be disregarded hereafter.[73]

Section 5 of the Amendment, the majority stated, "will not enlarge, nor its rejection curtail, the powers now conferred upon Congress by the Constitution." [74]

The minority recommended ratification, describing the Amendment as an extremely important "measure of support to loyal men, and of protection to the property of the country":

> * * * As a declaration of the true intent and meaning of American citizenship, it appeals to freemen everywhere. And while it cannot be considered as a finality in the work of reconstructing our federal > government, it is an advance in the direction of establishing unrestricted popular rights, which, when completed, will make our Constitution and laws accordant with the highest principles of free civil organization.[75]

[73] Id., pp. 2–4.
[74] Id., p. 16.

The Report was debated in the House on March 12, 13, and 15.[76] Mr. Mason proposed to substitute the minority report for the majority report. He "did not believe that the rights of the colored man would be injured by its adoption." The people of the state were in favor of ratification; their representatives in Congress had voted for it, and the voters had sent them back to Washington satisfied with their action. Mr. Walker, in opposition, asked the legislature to consider where the country would be led by a provision "that carries undisguised on its face something that makes possible the introduction of serfdom in a country claiming to be republican." Referring to the Declaration of Independence and the Preamble to the Constitution, he said that all men who loved justice could readily assent to the Amendment were it not for the second section. Mr. Howe favored ratification because the Amendment "was a part of a grand scheme for the reconstruction of the South."[77]

On March 13, Mr. Dana spoke in favor of ratification. Section 1, he said, was > a most important article; by it the question of equal rights was taken from the Supreme Courts of the States and given to

---

[75] Id., p. 25.

[76] Summaries of the debates are found in the Boston Daily Advertiser of March 13 to 16, and March 21, 1867.

[77] Boston Daily Advertiser, March 13, p. 4.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> the Supreme Court of the United States for decision; the adoption of this article was the greatest movement that the country had made towards centralization and was a serious and most important step. This was taken solely for the reason of obtaining protection for the colored people of the South; the white men who do not need this article and do not like it, sacrifice some of their rights for the purpose of aiding the blacks.[78]

Mr. Avery opposed ratification because he felt that the Constitution was well enough as it stood; this was no time to make a grave change in the organic law. By the first section, Massachusetts, as well as other States, "was ousted from her protective jurisdiction"; by its adoption, all rights, civil and criminal, would be transferred from State courts to federal courts; in fact, all states' rights were taken away.[79]

The minority report for ratification was adopted by a vote of 120 to 22.[80] On March 15, after some further debate, the House voted for ratification, 120 to 20.[81]

In the Senate there was a brief debate on March 20, in which Senator Ball condemned any compromises "with sin or rebellion."[82] The vote, taken on the same day, was 27 to 6 in favor of ratification.[83]

---

[78] Id., March 14, p. 4.

[79] Ibid.

[80] House J., 1867, p. 207.

[81] Mass. Acts and Resolves, 1867, p. 787; McPherson, Reconstruction, p. 194.

[82] Boston Daily Advertiser, March 21, p. 1.

[83] Mass. Acts and Resolves, 1867, p. 787; McPherson, Reconstruction, p. 194.

The school laws of Massachusetts in the early part of the 19th century provided that the schools were to be "for the benefit of all the inhabitants of the town."[84] About 1820 the school committees in several towns, acting under their general authority to supervise the schools and determine the qualifications of pupils, established separate schools for colored children.[85] Shortly thereafter strong pressure was brought through petitions to the school committees to end segregation, and by 1845 this was accomplished in every town except Boston.[86] Little or no trouble was reported.[87]

In 1844, a petition was presented to the Boston School Committee to end segregation in the public schools. The Committee, with the support of the City Solicitor, refused to change its position.[88] The minority of the Committee filed a dissent:[89]

> It is the peculiar advantage of our republican system, that it confers civil equality and legal rights upon every citizen—that it knows no privileged class, and no degraded class—that it confers no distinction, and creates no difference * * * (p. 4).

---

[84] See Mass. Rev. Stats., 1836, Pt. I, Tit. 10, c. 23, sec. 5.

[85] Woodson, The Education of the Negro prior to 1861 (1915), p. 320.

[86] Ibid.

[87] Ibid. See also the letters printed in Report of the Minority of the Committee of the Primary School Board on The Caste Schools of the City of Boston (pamphlet, 1846).

[88] Woodson, op. cit., p. 321.

[89] Report of the Minority, etc., p. 10, cited in note 87, supra.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> The whole argument may be stated thus. The colored man, as any other citizen, has the right to send his child to the nearest school, subject only to restrictions for good and lawful reasons. But his race or his color is an unlawful and inhuman reason for restraining his right of choice; for our constitution and laws have everywhere repudiated all distinctions of citizens into classes, on this, or any other ground, and have pronounced all possible reasoning in support or justification of such distinctions insufficient and dangerous (p. 7).

However, the minority made the following reservation:

> When we deny that it is as advantageous for the colored children to attend the separate schools, as it would be, to be educated with the white children, we do not mean to be understood, that under other circumstances than exist here, they might not receive equal educational advantages from separate schools—but under the circumstances which do exist, we do deny, that they can receive equal benefit from separate which they would from the common schools. They are a small minority, less than two per cent of our city population. * * * (p. 10).

In 1845 the legislature passed a law providing that > * * * Any child unlawfully excluded from public school instruction in this Commonwealth, shall recover damages therefor, in an action on the case * * * in any court of competent jurisdiction to try the same, against the city or town in which such public school instruction is supported.[90]

The Senate committee which reported the measure stated that it resulted from petitions "for some remedy in the school law, that will extend to all children the same educational rights."[91]

In Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. 198 (1850), suit was brought against the City of Boston, under the 1845 law, for damages resulting from exclusion of a Negro pupil from a white school. The attorneys for the plaintiff, one of whom was Charles Sumner, argued that racial separation in the schools violated the principle of equality before the law, which was a part of "the spirit of American institutions, and especially of the constitution of Massachusetts" (p. 201).

The decision of the court, however, upheld the action of the city and suggested that the remedy was through legislation.

Legislative action followed in 1855. In that year the House committee, to which petitions seeking an

---

[90] Mass. Acts and Resolves 1845, c. 214.

[91] Mass. Legis. Docs. 1845, Sen. No. 42. The law, according to Henry Wilson, who was one of its supporters, was one of the results of the abolitionist campaign for the admission of colored children to all schools without distinction. (Wilson, History of the Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America (1872), pp. 496–98). In Sherman v. Inhabitants of Charlestown, 8 Cush. 160 (1851), Chief Justice Shaw said that it was probably passed in consequence of the court's decision in Spear v. Cummings, 23 Pick. 224 (1839), which had held that no action could lie where a child claimed to have been unlawfully excluded from a school. The report of the Spear case does not indicate the reason for exclusion.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

end to segregation had been referred, reported out a bill to that effect, stating:

> Your committee have been unable to find from an examination of the Constitution, states, or regulations pertaining to schools, any specific authority on the part of superintendents or committee men to exclude, by reason of color, race, or religious opinions, any portion of the children of the State from the benefits of common school education.[92]

While the Committee "fully recognize[d] the weight and influence" of the opinion in the Roberts Case, it adopted the following view contained in an earlier opinion of the City Solicitor of Salem:

> "It may be said that the free school, provided exclusively for colored children, is equally advantageous to them. I think it would be easy to show that this is not the case. But suppose it were so, it would in no way affect the decision of the question. The colored children are lawfully entitled to the benefit of the free schools, and are not bound to accept an equivalent. * * *"[93]

The Legislature amended the 1845 Act by adding as Section One the following:

> In determining the qualifications of scholars to be admitted into any public school or any district school in this Commonwealth, no distinction shall be made on account of the race, color or religious opinions, of the applicant or scholar.[94]

---

[92] Mass., Legislative Documents, 1855, House No. 167, p. 2.

[93] Id., p. 5.

[94] Mass. Acts and Resolves, 1855, ch. 256.

Massachusetts never excluded Negroes from voting.[95] In 1843 the miscegenation statute was repealed.[96]

MICHIGAN

The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified by Michigan in January 1867. In that year, the legislature provided for all children "an equal right to attend any school * * *." At this time Negroes could not vote in general elections nor serve as jurors. These restrictions were removed by 1870. In 1890, the Supreme Court of Michigan declared the "separate but equal" doctrine invalid under the common law, with respect to public accommodations and services. Ferguson v. Gies, 82 Mich. 358.

RATIFICATION

Governor Crapo submitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the Legislature on January 7, 1867, expressing a desire for unanimous ratification.[97] The Senate voted to ratify, 25 to 1;[98] the House, by a vote of 77 to 15, adopted the Senate proposal, with a slight modification in the procedural provisions to be followed,[99] and the change was accepted by the Senate.[1]

---

[95] See Mass. Laws and Resolves, 1781, c. 25; Mass. General Statutes, 1860, c. 6, sec. 1.

[96] Mass. Acts and Resolves, 1843, c. 5.

[97] Sen. J., 1867, p. 34.

[98] Id., p. 125 (Jan. 15).

[99] House J., 1867, pp. 181–82 (Jan. 16).

[1] Sen. J., 1867, p. 162 (Jan. 17).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

SCHOOLS

Free tax-supported schools were first established in Michigan while it was a territory.[2] In the years following this was replaced by a tuition system.[3] The Constitution of 1850 stated that beginning in 1855 schooling was to be free,[4] but this was not effected until 1869.[5] In the meantime, tax-supported schools in Detroit alone, established in 1842, continued in operation.[6]

In 1841 the Legislature authorized a separate school district in Detroit, not geographically described, but consisting of the city's colored children, who were thus excluded from the census of the other school districts in the city.[7] In 1842 a single district for the city was created but the Board of Education was given > full power and authority * * * relative to anything whatever that may advance the interest of education, the good government and prosperity of common schools in said city and the public welfare concerning the same.[8]

In 1867, the Legislature declared that

> All residents of any district shall have an equal right to attend any school therein: Provided, that this shall not prevent the grading of schools according to the intel-

---

[2] Mich. Terr. Laws, Vol. II, 1827, p. 472.

[3] See Pierce, Historical Sketches of Education in Michigan (1881), pp. 23–24.

[4] Art. XIII, Sec. 4.

[5] Mich. Laws, 1869, Act No. 110.

[6] Mich. Laws, 1869, Act. No. 233.

[7] Mich. Laws, 1841, Act No. 29.

[8] Mich. Laws, 1842, Act No. 70.

lectual progress of the pupils, to be taught in separate places when deemed expedient.[9]

In People v. Board of Education, 18 Mich. 400 (1869), the court held that this Act superseded the provision of the Detroit charter concerning segregation. In other districts the state school Superintendent reported in 1868 that "we have wiped caste from our school laws."[10]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The original constitution under which Michigan was admitted to the Union in 1836 provided suffrage for white males only.[11] This requirement remained until 1870, when it was eliminated by the Legislature, a month after it ratified the Fifteenth Amendment.[12] While the 1836 provision was in force it also barred Negroes from juries.[13] Negroes never appear to have been disqualified as witnesses.

Marriage between whites and Negroes was prohibited at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment.[14] In 1883, this prohibition was eliminated.[15]

In Ferguson v. Gies, 82 Mich. 358 (1890), the state Supreme Court rejected the "separate but equal" doctrine in so far as public accommodations and services were involved. The case arose from the refusal of a restaurant owner to serve

---

[9] Mich. Laws, 1867, Act No. 34.

[10] See Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana for 1867–68, p. 26. Indiana Documents, 1867–68.

[11] Mich. Const., 1836, Art. II, Sec. 1.

[12] Mich. Laws, 1869, Jt. Res. No. 42, p. 425 (Apr. 5).

[13] Mich. Comp. Laws, 1857, Tit. 29, C. 128, Sec. 9; Tit. 39, C. 196, Sec. 1.

[14] Mich. Rev. Stats., 1846, C. 83, Sec. 6.

[15] Mich. Pub. Acts, 1883, Act No. 23.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the Negro plaintiff at a table reserved for whites, although service in another part of the room was afforded. The trial judge had charged:

> While the defendant had no right to make a rule providing for an unjust discrimination, still he would have the right, under the law, to make proper and reasonable rules for the conduct of his business, and governing the conduct of his patrons; and whether this was a reasonable rule I will submit to you for determination. * * * By this term "full and equal" is not meant identical accommodations, but by it is meant substantially the same accommodation (p. 362).

The court held:

> The fault of this instruction is that it permits a discrimination on account of color alone, which cannot be made under the law with any justice (pp. 362–363).

The court held that the Michigan statute, enacted in 1885,[16] prohibiting the denial of "full and equal" privileges of inns, restaurants, eating houses, barber shops, public conveyances and theaters to any citizen, was only declaratory of the common law of the state; that prior to the time when Negroes were made citizens of the state, a discrimination such as that in the case at bar against a white citizen would have given him a claim for damages, and that the Negro had gained a similar right on becoming a citizen.

MINNESOTA

The Minnesota legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867. The public schools had always been open to Negroes. In 1867 Negroes were barred from voting or serving as jurors. These restrictions were removed by the adoption of a constitutional amendment in November, 1868.

[16] Mich. Pub. Acts, 1885, Act No. 130.

RATIFICATION

The Governor addressed the Minnesota legislature on January 10, 1867. After asking for universal suffrage in the state, and expressing the hope that it would soon be adopted throughout the Nation, he submitted the Fourteenth Amendment:

> I recommend to you [its] prompt adoption.
>
> It secures to all citizens of the United States equal civil rights—it apportions representation in Congress and the electoral college equally among the States, according to the number of persons enjoying political rights. * * *
>
> In the event of their [the Southern states'] refusal to accept the amendment it may become the duty of Congress to reorganize their civil governments on the basis of equal political and civil rights to all men, without distinction of color, and thus to devolve upon the now disfranchised loyal people of the south the work of national reintegration.[17]

The next day, the House adopted a resolution for ratification by a vote of 40 to 5.[18] The Senate the following day adopted the resolution for ratification by a vote of 16 to 5.[19]

---

[17] Address of Governor, pp. 25–26, Minn., Exec. Docs., 1866.

[18] House J., 1867, pp. 24–25.

[19] Sen. J., 1867, pp. 22–23.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

SCHOOLS

The Minnesota public school law of 1864 provided that > * * * if any child of suitable age is denied admission, or any scholar expelled without sufficient cause, or on account of color, social position, or nationality, the teacher so offending or board of trustees [of the district shall be fined].[20]

The territorial statutes of 1851 contained no provision distinguishing between races with respect to schools.[21]

In reply to a questionnaire from the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana, the Minnesota Superintendent of Schools wrote in 1868:

> Colored people vote. They send their children to school, who have all the rights, privileges and immunities of white children. They are excluded from no educational rights. They are just as the white children in their opportunities.[22]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Under Article VII, section 1, of the Constitution of 1857 the franchise was limited to white males and Indian males who had accepted the "language, customs and habits of civilization." Proposed amendments to remove the racial bar [20] Minn. Gen. Laws, 1864, c. 4, sec. 1.

[21] See Minn. Terr., Rev. Stat., 1851, c. 29.

[22] See Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana for 1867–68, p. 27. Ind. Doc., 1867–68.

were rejected in 1865,[23] and again in 1867.[24]. The amendment was finally adopted in the elections of November 1868, and it was promulgated January 9, 1869.

During the period that the Negro was barred from voting, he was similarly barred from acting as a juror.[25] There does not seem to have been at any time a law against miscegenation. In 1885, Minnesota enacted a Civil Rights Act prohibiting any discrimination against Negroes in public places, or by common carriers.[26]

MISSISSIPPI

In January 1870 Mississippi ratified without debate the Fourteenth Amendment, which it had rejected unanimously in each House in January 1867. Its Constitution of 1868 was silent on the question of separate schools. All legislation until 1876 seems to have contemplated mixed schools. In that year, segregation was permitted, and in 1878 was required. An 1870 statute repealed all color discriminations in the laws of the state.

RATIFICATION

Mississippi rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in January 1867, by a unanimous vote of

---

[23] Oberholtzer, A History of the United States Since the Civil War (1917), p. 140, n. 2.

[24] Id. at p. 479.

[25] Minn., Gen. Stats., 1866, c. 8, tit. 3, sec. 98.

[26] Minn., Gen. Laws, 1885, c. 224.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

both houses.[27] Governor Humphreys, in his Message of October 16, 1866, had urged rejection, saying:

> The Radical Congress has enacted laws and proposed amendments to the Constitution, which if adopted will destroy the rights of the States and of the people, and centralize all the powers of government in the Federal Head.
>
> * * * * *
>
> This amendment, adopted by a Congress of less than three-fourths of the States of the Union, in palpable violation of the rights of more than one-fourth of the States, is such an insulting outrage and denial of the equal rights of so many of our worthiest citizens who have shed lustre and glory upon our section and our race, both in the forum and in the field, such a gross usurpation of the rights of the State, and such a centralization of power in the Federal Government, that I presume, a mere reading of it, will cause its rejection by you.[28]

The Report of the Joint Standing Committee on State and Federal Relations[29] objected to the Amendment for various reasons, including that

> * * * It transfers to the United States a criminal and police regulation over the inhabitants of the States touching matters purely domestic. It intervenes between the State Government and its inhabitants on the assumption that there is an alienation

---

[27] Mississippi Laws, 1866–67, p. 734; Senate Journal, 1866–67, p. 196; House Journal, 1866–67, p. 201.

[28] House Journal, 1866–67, pp. 7, 8.

[29] Id., App., pp. 77–87.

> of interest and sentiment between certain portions of the population. And that such intervention is for the benefit of one class against the other.[30]

Further,

> * * * the object is, to compel the Southern States to accept negro suffrage * * * It cannot be pretended that the lately enfranchised blacks are, as a body, either morally or intellectually competent to vote.[31]

Former Governor Sharkey also outlined his objections in a letter to Governor Humphreys, dated September 17, 1866, saying in part

> But let us look, for a moment, at the provisions of the proposed amendment. The first section * * * does not say what are privileges and immunities; that is left for the next Congress to provide in virtue of the last section, which declares "that Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article." We may find Congress conferring "privileges and immunities" on one class to the exclusion of another class; or we may find Congress assuming absolute control over all the people of a State and their domestic concerns, and this virtually abolishes the State.
>
> * * * * *
>
> I need say nothing of the fourth section, but the fifth is the Trojan horse abounding in mischief. It provides that "Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provision of this

[30] Id., p. 79.
[31] Id., pp. 79, 80.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> article," which may be construed to authorize Congress to do whatever it may desire to do. Un[der] this same provision, attached to the emancipation amendment, you have the Civil Rights bill and the Freedmen's Bureau bill. It was construed in the Senate, just as I admonished many members of the Legislature it would be, to authorize these odious measures. We should profit by the experience it has furnished us.
>
> * * * I will only add, that should this amendment become part of the Constitution, we shall have a very different government from that which we inherited from our ancestors.[32]

Three years later, in January, 1870, Mississippi ratified the Amendment without debate or comment.[33]

SCHOOLS

The Mississippi Constitution of 1868 did not specify whether the public schools were to be separate or mixed:

> As the stability of a republican form of government depends mainly upon the intelligence and virtue of the people, it shall be the duty of the legislature to encourage, by all suitable means, the promotion of intellectual, scientific, moral, and agricultural improvement, by establishing a uniform system of free public schools, by taxation or otherwise, for all children between the ages of five and twenty-one years, and

---

[32] McPherson's Scrap Book, Fourteenth Amendment, pp. 22–23.

[33] Mississippi Laws, 1870, p. 631; Senate Journal, 1870, p. 19; House Journal, 1870, p. 20.

> shall, as soon as practicable, establish schools of higher grade. (VIII, 1.)
>
> A public school or schools shall be maintained in each school-district at least four months in each year * * *. (VIII, 5.)

The Bill of Rights (Article I) contained the following provision:

> SEC. 21. No public money or moneys shall be appropriated for any charitable or other public institutions in this State making any distinction among the citizens thereof, Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the legislature from appropriating the school-fund in accordance with the article in this constitution relating to public schools.

Attempts to put into the article on education a requirement of separate schools were defeated,[34] as was a proposal to have the Convention adopt an ordinance providing for separate schools.[35]

The Legislature of 1870 passed "An Act to Regulate the Supervision, Organization, and Maintenance of a Uniform System of Public Education for the State of Mississippi,"[36] which contained no reference to color. Governor Alcorn, in his Inaugural Address in March, 1870, had emphasized the importance of educating both white and colored children:

> The new system has its work still further increased by the benevolence of its spirit. The poor white children of the State, who were permitted in the past to grow up like [34] Constitutional Convention Journal, pp. 316, 318.

---

[35] Id., p. 479–80.

[36] Mississippi Laws, 1870, ch. 1, pp. 1–18.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> wild flowers, without training, the administration which we are about to inaugurate to-day is determined to expend a large proportion of its energies in educating. And so, also, will the government which reigns over us from this hour devote a large proportion of its energies to the training of the rising generation of the colored people for the higher duties of life, under an enlightened system of public schools.[37]

But in his message on education[38] he recommended separate schools:

> But the question of local government of public schools is complicated, amongst us, by prejudices of race. To conciliate these, at the same time make the system of common schools operative, will require dispassionate deliberation. My judgment is unable to say positively how this difficulty is to be met most effectually; but whether the best means be a mixed Board of Directors for each district, or by a distinct system of districting for each color, I have no doubt the Legislature will bring to the subject that earnest spirit of justice to both races which demands that the schools themselves shall be kept absolutely separate.[39]

He did not, however, indicate any requirement for equal facilities. The University of Oxford was for whites only; he proposed a high school and agricultural college for colored students.[40] Conversely, he urged the establishment of a

[37] Senate Journal, 1870, p. 50.
[38] Id., App., p. 12.
[39] Id., p. 17.
[40] Id., pp. 14, 20.

normal school for colored teachers, although there was none for whites:

> One Normal School we cannot dispense with, even at the very outset of our educational system. As the white teachers obtainable at present for the common schools are more advanced than those teachers who may be obtained at present amongst the colored people, it appears to me that our first Normal School for the training of teachers should be devoted to the education of teachers of color.[41]

A reenactment of the education law in 1873 contained no reference to color.[42] In 1876 the school laws were amended to recognize distinctions of color,[43] and in 1878 segregation was made mandatory:

> Be it further enacted, That the schools in each county shall be so arranged as to afford ample free school facilities to all the educable youths in that county, but white and colored pupils shall not be taught in the same school-house, but in separate school-houses.[44]

The Constitution of 1890 provided that

> Separate schools shall be maintained for children of the white and colored races. (Article 8, sec. 207.)

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

The legislators of 1870 insisted on full equality, without distinction, for Negroes. Section 3 of

---

[41] Id., p. 13.

[42] Mississippi Laws, 1873, ch. 1, pp. 1–17.

[43] Mississippi Laws, 1876, ch. 113, sec. 8, p. 209.

[44] Mississippi Laws, 1878, ch. 14, sec. 35, p. 103.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"An Act to repeal certain laws relating to slaves, free negroes and mulattoes and freedmen, and for other purposes"[45] provided

> * * * That it is hereby declared to be the true intent, meaning and purpose of this Act, to remove from the records of the laws of this State all laws of whatever character, which in any manner recognize any natural difference or distinction between citizens or inhabitants of this State, or which in any manner or in any degree, discriminate between citizens or inhabitants of this State, founded on race, color or previous condition of servitude.

Another act prohibited segregation on railroads, steamboats, and stagecoaches.[46]

MISSOURI

Missouri ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867. Prior to 1865 the education of Negroes was prohibited. In that year slavery was abolished within the state; the legislature provided separate public schools for Negro children; it also repealed the existing restrictions on Negroes, including those on the competency of Negroes as witnesses in judicial proceedings. However, the prohibition against miscegenation continued, as did the disqualification of Negroes as voters and jurors.

RATIFICATION

The Fourteenth Amendment was presented to the Missouri Legislature on January 4, 1867, in [45] Mississippi Laws, 1870, ch. 10, p. 73.

[46] Mississippi Laws, 1870, ch. 32, p. 104.

281209—53——19

the form of a resolution introduced by Senator Bonham. On the same day the Legislature received a message from the Governor, Thomas C. Fletcher. Regarding the first section of the Amendment, the message stated:[47]

> The first section of the proposed amendment secures to every person born or naturalized in the United States, the rights of a citizen thereof in any of the States. It prevents a State from depriving any citizen of the United States of any of the rights conferred on him by the laws of Congress and secures to all persons equality of protection in life, liberty, and property, under the laws of the State.

The Senate voted to ratify the Amendment on January 5, 1867, by a vote of 26 to 6.[48] The House vote, on January 8, was 85 to 34.[49] The Joint Resolution ratifying the Amendment recited that "the people of Missouri, in the election of the present General Assembly, have indicated their approval of said amendment," and "the measure is in itself eminently just and proper, and greatly tends to a settlement of the issues growing out of the late rebellion."[50]

SCHOOLS

The Missouri Constitution of 1820 provided that "one school or more shall be established in

---

[47] Senate Journal 1867, p. 14.

[48] Id., pp. 30, 32.

[49] McPherson, Reconstruction, p. 194.

[50] Mo. Laws 1867, p. 196.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

each township as soon as practicable and necessary, where the poor shall be taught gratis." (Art. VI, section 1.) The first school law was enacted in 1825.[51] An "Act respecting slaves, free Negroes and mulattoes" of 1847 [52] prohibited schools for Negroes and declared all meetings of colored persons for purposes of instruction "unlawful assemblages". This law was repealed on February 20, 1865,[53] after slavery had been abolished within the state. On the same date an amendment to the school law was approved,[54] which provided that the school census was to include all colored children (sec. 1) and that

> The word "white" wherever it occurs in the act to which this is amendatory, is hereby stricken out; and it is further enacted that the trustees of all school districts in this State shall make provision for the instruction of all children of the proper age in their respective school districts without respect to color, provided that they shall be sent to separate schools. (Sec. 2.)

The Constitution of 1865 authorized the establishment of separate schools for colored children. It provided:

> Separate schools may be established for children of African descent. All funds provided for the support of public schools shall be appropriated in proportion to the [51] Mo. Rev. Laws 1825, p. 711.

[52] Mo. Laws 1846–47, p. 103.
[53] Mo. Laws 1864–65, p. 63.
[54] Id., p. 125.

> number of children, without regard to color. (Art. IX, § II.)

These provisions were implemented by the school law of 1866,[55] which made the establishment of schools for colored children mandatory wherever there were more than twenty in a district; where the number of colored children was less than twenty, their proportionate share in the school fund was to be used for their education as the school authorities deemed proper. In all other respects the schools for colored children were to be equal to "others of the same grade." (Sec. 20.)

The requirements for segregated schools were reenacted in 1867 and 1868.[56]

In 1868, the Superintendent of Public Schools made the following statement:

> The school law provides for the establishment of separate schools for colored children in every locality wherein the number exceeds fifteen. This is done in deference to the deep prejudice existing in the minds of the loyal and disloyal against the education of the colored and white youth in the same schools. Except this, their schools are to be paid, conducted and superintended the same as other schools. In a few years I am satisfied the prejudice will be so far obliterated that no opposition will be made to the mixed schools where the number of [55] "An Act to provide for the Reorganization, Supervision and Maintenance of Common Schools," Mo. Laws, 1865–1866, p. 170 (approved March 29, 1866).

[56] Mo. Laws 1867, p. 160 (approved March 13, 1867); Mo. Laws 1868, p. 165.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

colored children is too small for a good separate school." [57]

The 1875 Constitution declared that separate schools for Negro children "shall" be provided (Article XI, sec. 3). This was in contrast to the 1865 Constitution, which used the word "may" (supra). In the debate in the 1875 Constitutional Convention this change was not explained. Mr. Switzler, commenting on this language, stated that the section was "substantially" the same as in the Constitution of 1865 and that the committee reporting the section had substituted the word "shall" for "may".[58] The section was adopted without debate.[59]

In 1889 the school law was amended by a provision making mixed schools illegal.[60]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Missouri abolished slavery by ordinance of the State Convention dated January 11, 1865.[61] Soon thereafter numerous laws imposing legal restrictions upon Negroes were repealed,[62] including the statute which prohibited them from testifying [57] Letter to the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana, Report of Superintendent of Indiana for 1867–68, p. 27. Ind. Doc., 1867–68.

[58] Debates, Missouri Constitutional Convention 1875, vol. IX, p. 30.

[59] Id., p. 145.

[60] Mo. Laws 1889, c. CL, sec. 7051a.

[61] Mo. Gen. Stats., 1865, p. 46.

[62] Mo. Laws, 1864–65, p. 63, an act repealing "all laws recognizing the right of property in man, or intended to protect or perpetuate the institution of slavery in this State".

in court.[63] The repeal, however, did not extend to the miscegenation statute.[64]

The Constitution of 1865[65] declared slavery abolished (Art. I, Sec. II) and provided

> That no person can, on account of color, be disqualified as a witness; or be disabled to contract, otherwise than as others are disabled; or be prevented from acquiring, holding and transmitting property; or be liable to any other punishment for any offense than that imposed upon others for a like offense; or be restricted in the exercise of religious worship; or be hindered in acquiring education; or be subjected, in law, to any other restraints or disqualifications, in regard to any personal rights, than such as are laid upon others under like circumstances. (Art. I, Sec. III.)

It restricted the vote to white males (Art. II, Sec. XVIII).

As late as 1872 Negroes were barred from juries.[66]

NEBRASKA

Nebraska ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in June, 1867, four months after its admission to the Union. In the same month the legislature deleted from the territorial school law certain racial provisions. The right of all children to pub-

---

[63] Mo. Rev. Stats., 1855, c. CLXVIII, sec. 6, subs. 9.

[64] Sec. 3 of the Act regulating marriages (1835), Mo. Rev. Stats. 1840, p. 401.

[65] Adopted by the Constitutional Convention on April 8, 1865, voted upon by the people on June 6, and declared in force on July 4, 1865. Mo. Gen. Stats., 1865, pp. 19 et seq., 46.

[66] Mo. Stats., 1872, c. 80, sec. 2.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

lic education was declared in 1869. There were no provisions dealing specifically with racial segregation in the public schools. Congress had conditioned Nebraska's entry on its agreement not to deny "the elective franchise or * * * any other right, by reason of race or color". Negroes, however, continued to be excluded from juries until 1873.

RATIFICATION

Governor Butler of the Nebraska Territory, addressing the Territorial Legislature in July, 1866, said of the Fourteenth Amendment that > * * * if fully carried out in letter and spirit, [it] will, as I think, restore harmony and concord to the national counsels, and reaffirm in our Constitution the fundamental principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are created free and equal.[67]

On May 17, 1867, speaking as Governor of the new state, he said:

> This proposed amendment * * * embodies in a few short, but comprehensive sentences the essence of the lesson taught the American people during the terrible agony of civil war. In extending the right of citizenship to "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," and prohibiting the denial of the equal protection of the laws to any such person, it accepts fully, and forever vindicates by the solemn pledge of a nation the idea that was the cornerstone of American Independence, but has been [67] House J., 1st Sess., 1866, p. 15.

> for a time rejected by the builders of the national superstructure.[68]

The House on June 8, 1867 voted in favor of ratification, 26 to 11,[69] and the Senate followed on June 15, by a vote of 8 to 5,[70] having rejected two proposed changes, one a virtual paraphrase of Section 2 of the Amendment, the other a proposal for a referendum on the Amendment.[71]

SCHOOLS

The laws of the Territory of Nebraska provided for free schools for whites only, and exempted Negroes from taxation for educational purposes.[72] The territorial laws were carried over by the new State Constitution.[73] The school law, when revised in 1867, did not mention either of the foregoing provisions of the territorial law.[74] In 1869, the school laws were again revised. While the territorial law had reserved the territorial school fund > for the purpose of affording the advantages of a free education to all the white youth of this territory * * *

---

[68] House J., 3d Sess., 1867, pp. 74–75.

[69] Id., p. 149.

[70] Sen. J., 3d Sess., 1867, p. 174.

[71] Id., p. 163.

[72] Nebr. Rev. Stats., 1866, c. 48, § 48.

[73] Const. 1866, Art. XI, § 1.

[74] See Nebr. Laws, 1867, Act of June 24, 1867, p. 101ff. Gov. Butler, in his address to the first session of the State Legislature devoted to regular business, said: "Your most earnest attention is * * * invoked, that no pains may be spared to render Nebraska second to no other State in the facilities offered to all her children, irrespective of sex or condition. * * *" House J., 3d Sess., 1867, p. 69.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the 1869 law, in referring to the same fund, read as follows:

> for the purpose of affording the advantages of free education to all the youth of this State * * *.[75]

The Constitution of 1875 directed the legislature to > provide for the free instruction in the common schools of this state of all persons between the ages of five and twenty-one years.[76]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Under the territorial laws of Nebraska Negroes were barred from voting[77] and jury service;[78] miscegenation was also prohibited.[79]

The Constitution of 1866 again restricted the vote to white males.[80] When Congress voted to admit Nebraska in February, 1867, it did so with the condition that > within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person, by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the [75] Nebr. Laws, 1869, Act of Feb. 15, 1869, § 71, p. 128.

[76] Art. 8, sec. 6.
[77] Nebr., Rev. Stats., 1866, c. 17, § 33.
[78] Id., Code of Civil Procedure, Tit. 19, § 657.
[79] Id., c. 34, § 3.
[80] Const., 1866, Art. II, § 2.

> assent of said State to the said * * * condition.[82]

The Nebraska legislature accepted this provision.[83]

The law excluding Negroes from juries was declared void in Brittle v. People, 2 Neb. 198 (1873) by reason of the Congressional proviso. The court did not consider or mention the possible effect of the Fourteenth Amendment.

NEVADA

Nevada ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867, by overwhelming votes in both houses of the legislature, apparently after little, if any, debate. Negroes had been excluded from the public schools from the time of their institution in 1865, and because there was a small number of colored children who were scattered throughout the state, almost no effort was made toward the establishment of separate school facilities for them. The state Supreme Court in 1872 held that exclusion where no alternate schools were furnished violated the state constitution. State ex rel. Stoutmeyer v. Duffy, 7 Nev. 342. In 1867, the Negro was unable to vote or act as a juror; restrictions upon him as a witness had been lifted in 1865, but continued with respect to Indians and Chinese.

RATIFICATION

The Governor addressed the Legislature on January 10, 1867, saying in part:

---

[82] 14 Stat. 391.

[83] Sen. J., 2d Sess., 1867, p. 35; House J. 2d Sess., 1867, p. 52.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> It is your high privilege and sacred obligation to ratify the [Fourteenth] amendment. * * * The just equalization of political power by a change in the basis of representation, the protection of life, liberty and property extended to the weak, heretofore enslaved and brutalized; [exclusion from office of Confederate leaders, the established validity of the federal debt, and invalidity of the Confederate] are the only conditions imposed. * * * [84]

Three resolutions were submitted, two in the Senate, one in the House. The Standing Committee of the Senate on Federal Relations reported on January 21 all three as substantially the same, and stated that "Inasmuch as the discussion of the merits and demerits of these Amendments are the current history of the day, the Committee deem it time thrown away to enter into such discussion, and ask their immediate passage." [85] This followed the next day by a vote of 11–3.[86]

The House had already acted. Receiving a favorable report on January 11,[87] it voted the same day to ratify, 34–4.[88]

SCHOOLS

Nevada's first constitution, adopted in 1864 when the state was admitted, provided for a system of public schools.[89] This was implemented by

---

[84] Sen. J., 1867, App., p. 9.
[85] Sen. J., 1867, p. 42.
[86] Id., at p. 47.
[87] House J., 1867, p. 21.
[88] Id., at p. 25.
[89] Nev. Const., 1864, Art. XI, sec. 2.

"An Act to provide for the maintenance and supervision of Public Schools," passed in 1865, which contained the following provision:

> Negroes, Mongolians, and Indians shall not be admitted into the public schools; [public funds may be withheld where they are so admitted] provided, that the Board of Trustees of any district * * * may establish a separate school for the education of negroes, Mongolians, and Indians, and use the public school funds for the support of the same.[90]

This provision was substantially reaffirmed in 1867, after the Legislature had ratified the Fourteenth Amendment.[91]

The Superintendent of Public Instruction reporting for the school year ending August 31, 1866, announced that "A public school for colored children, the first and only one in the State, was organized and maintained for nearly six months. It had an average attendance of twenty-nine pupils."[92] This school was located in Storey County; apparently some Indian or Mongolian children were admitted since there were only 21 Negro children in the state.[93] Some of the state's Negro children must have been unable to attend this school, since only 14 lived in Storey County.[94]

The Superintendent's next report stated:

---

[90] Nev. Stats., 1865, c. 145, sec. 50.

[91] Nev. Stats., 1867, c. 52, sec. 21 (March 8). By this statute the sanction of withdrawing funds seems to have been removed.

[92] Superintendent's Report, p. 14, Sen. J., 1867, App.

[93] Id., Table III.

[94] Ibid.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Inasmuch as neither Mongolian nor Indian children, except a few living in white families, manifest any desire to attend the public schools, this interdict affects mainly the Negro race.[95]

* * * * *

Few of the colored race are able to afford private tuition, and as a consequence we have growing up among us juvenile Pariahs, condemned by our State to ignorance and its attendant vices. * * * We believe this inhibition unwise, unjust, and unconstitutional.

Unwise, because dark, tawny or copper-colored children are no more calculated to make intelligent and virtuous citizens without education, than are white children: unjust, because the colored citizen is denied advantages secured in part by taxation levied upon his own industry: unconstitutional, because in violation of the express provisions of Section 1, and in contravention of the plain intendment of section 3 of Article XI of our State constitution.

* * * * *

If the prevalent prejudices against admixture of the races will not allow the abolition of the penalty for the crime of color, it is respectfully submitted whether it is not the duty of the Legislature to devise some "suitable means" of securing to these unfortunates the advantages of "intellectual * * * and moral improvement."[96]

---

[95] Education was not compulsory even for whites. A large part of each Report is given over to a discussion of the merits of compulsory attendance.

[96] Superintendent's Report, pp. 16–17, Nov. 1868, Nev., Sen. J., 1869, App.

In his next report for 1869 and 1870, the Superintendent stated:

> From the returns of Census Marshals it appears that there are thirty negro children of school age in the State.
>
> For these no educational provision is made. They are denied admission to the Public Schools; separate schools are permitted under the law, but as they are not commanded, colored children are without educational privileges. Believing that it is not the intention of our State Government to be guilty of the injustice of taxing colored citizens for the support of Public Schools, and at the same time denying them the benefit of these schools, I beg to call attention to the fact, that our statutes are at present chargeable with this unworthy discrimination.[97]

In 1872, the case of State ex rel. Stoutmeyer v. Duffy, 7 Nev. 342, was decided by the state Supreme Court. Relator, a Negro, otherwise qualified, applied for mandamus against the school trustees who had refused him admission to a public school, contending that Section 50 of the 1865 school law[98] violated the state constitution, the Fourteenth Amendment, and the federal Civil Rights Bill. The federal contentions were rejected, the court stating:

> While it may be, and probably is, opposed to the spirit of the [constitution and laws of the United States], still it is not obnoxious to their letter; and as no judicial action is more dangerous than that most [97] Superintendent's Report, p. 14, Dec. 1, 1870, Nev. Sen. J., 1871, App.

---

[98] See p. 298, fn. 90, supra.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> tempting and seductive practice of reading between the written lines, and interpolating a spirit and intent other than that to be reached by ordinary and received rules of construction or interpretation, such course will be declined. * * * (p. 346).

The court declared, however, that Section 50 of the school law contravened the provision of the state constitution that "the legislature may pass such laws as will tend to secure a general attendance of the children in each school district upon said public school." If, said the court, the legislature acted to secure the attendance of some, it was required to secure the attendance of all (p. 347). Accordingly, mandamus was granted.

The Chief Justice, in concurring, relied on the state constitutional provision that "in all cases * * * where a general law can be made applicable, all laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the state." He agreed, however, that separate schools were constitutional (p. 355).

The dissenting judge was also of the opinion that the Fourteenth Amendment was not relevant to the question. He stated:

> The statute [section 50] does not abridge any privilege or immunity of the applicant, as a citizen of the United States. The privilege of admission to the common schools of this state is no more inherent in or connected with the status of citizenship than is the elective franchise; and to secure that against unfriendly state legislation, an additional amendment was required and was proposed. This privilege is not embraced within any meaning which has ever been attributed to the words "life, liberty > or property," and the equal protection of the laws cannot well be denied to a right which never existed. (Pp. 355–356.)

No action was ever taken by the Nevada legislature to require the establishment of separate schools. In his next report in 1873 the Superintendent stated:

> In explanation of the omission [of statistics for colored children], I am happy to say that, practically, the children of all citizens are now free to attend our public schools.
>
> The statute yet discriminates against the children of colored citizens, but by decision * * * the section excluding negroes was declared unconstitutional.
>
> * * * * *
>
> I believe that this ruling has been cheerfully complied with throughout the State, and that the privilege which it secures is eagerly enjoyed by the hitherto proscribed race.[99]

In 1873, Section 50 of the school law was dropped.[1]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The franchise was limited to white males by the Constitution of 1864, Article II, sec. 1. By statute, jurors were required to be qualified electors.[2] Article XVIII of the Constitution, adopted in 1880, removed the word "white" from Article II.

While Nevada was a territory, its law provided that

---

[99] Superintendent's Report, pp. 15–16, Dec. 1, 1872, Nev. Sen. J., 1873, App.

[1] Nev. Stats., 1873, c. 81, sec. 14.

[2] Nev. Stats., 1865, c. 33, sec. 18.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> No black, or mulatto person, or Indian, or Chinese, shall be permitted to give evidence in favor of, or against, any white person.[3]

But the first session of the state legislature changed this to read:

> No Indian or Chinese shall be permitted to give evidence in favor or against any white person, * * * In no case shall the Act of which this is amendatory, be construed to exclude as witnesses any negro, black or mulatto person, but the credibility of such negro, black or mulatto person shall be left entirely with the jury.[4]

Marriage of whites with Negroes, Indians or Chinese was a criminal offense.[5]

NEW HAMPSHIRE

The Fourteenth Amendment was adopted by New Hampshire in July, 1866, against contentions that the Amendment infringed upon states' rights by controlling legislation on "purely local" matters. Neither the school laws of the state, nor any other legislation, appear to have discriminated in any way against the Negro.

RATIFICATION

The Governor submitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the Legislature on June 21, 1866,[6] with a brief recommendation for ratification. It was referred to a committee of ten, which reported on June 26, 1866.[7] A majority recom-

[3] Nev. Terr. Laws, 1861, c. 28, sec. 13.
[4] Nev. Stats., 1865, c. 136, sec. 1.
[5] Nev. Terr. Laws, 1861, c. 32.
[6] House J., 1866, p. 137.
[7] Sen. J., 1866, pp. 70 et seq.; House J., 1866, pp. 174 et seq.

mended ratification, without detailed discussion of the various sections of the Amendment. A minority of three filed objections,[8] which may be summarized as follows: (1) The Southern states were excluded from all participation in the Congressional debates; (2) the Amendment was a dangerous infringement of states' rights, "assuming, as it does, to control their legislation in matters purely local in their character, and impose disabilities on them for regulating, in their own way, the right of suffrage—clearly a state right * * *"; (3) the effect of the second section would be to remove time-honored restrictions upon the right to vote and to open the ballot box to a large class of persons incapable of exercising their suffrage intelligently; (4) the real design of the Amendment was to force, by indirect means, Negro suffrage upon "an unwilling people".

The House voted for ratification on June 28, 1866.[9] The Senate, following some debate on July 5,[10] voted for ratification on July 6.[11]

SCHOOLS

New Hampshire's system of free public schools dates from the time when New Hampshire was a part of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. The Constitution of 1783 made it the duty of towns to educate their youth. In 1805 there was organized a system of public schools.[12] Neither this [8] House J., 1866, pp. 176 et seq.

[9] House J., 1866, p. 231.
[10] Unreported. See Sen. J., 1866, pp. 85, 88.
[11] Id., p. 94.
[12] N. H. Laws, Dec. 1805, p. 45.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

law nor any of the later school laws contained any reference to racial distinctions.[13] No legislation has been found which discriminated against Negroes.

NEW JERSEY

New Jersey ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in September, 1866, apparently without any debate. In March, 1868, the Legislature purported to rescind the ratification. One of the reasons given was that the Amendment interfered with the legislative power of the states and enlarged the powers of the federal courts. The school laws in force in 1866 and 1868 did not contain racial distinctions. They were interpreted, however, to permit separate schools, although requiring education for all children. A law in 1881 prohibited exclusion of colored children from any public school in their district. This statute was construed in Pierce v. Trustees, 46 N. J. L. 76, aff'd., 47 N. J. L. 348 (1884), to entitle Negro children to attend the public school closest to their residence in a district containing separate schools for Negroes and whites, but no constitutional issue was involved. Suffrage prior to the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment was limited to white males.

RATIFICATION

New Jersey acted on ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in September, 1866. The Governor in a brief message recommended ratification.[14]

---

[13] See N. H. Gen. Stats., 1867, Tit. 11; Gen. Laws, 1878, Tit. 11.

[14] Minutes of the Assembly, Extra Session, 1866, p. 8.

The Assembly voted favorably on September 11,[15] and the Senate concurred on the same day.[16] No debates are reported.

After the Democratic Party had gained control of the Legislature as a result of the elections in 1867, it rescinded the ratification. The Committee on Federal Relations, on January 28, 1868, submitted a joint resolution[17] which repudiated the Amendment. Some of the reasons given were as follows: (1) the exclusion of the representatives of ten States from the Congress which adopted the Amendment; (2) the ouster of Senator Stockton of New Jersey from the United States Senate for the purpose of securing the necessary two-thirds vote; (3) the subsequent reconstruction measures in ten Southern States, which were arbitrary and unconstitutional; (4) the ex post facto character of its punitive provisions; (5) the vague provisions of the Amendment which would help the federal judiciary and Congress to encroach upon states' rights; (6) the new apportionment provisions intended solely to secure Negro suffrage.

The resolution was adopted by each House on February 19, 1868,[18] and February 20,[19] respectively, and passed over Governor Ward's veto in March.[20] It was submitted to Congress by a mem-

[15] Id., p. 17.

[16] Sen. J., Extra Session, 1866, p. 14.

[17] Sen. J., 1868, pp. 39–40; N. J. Laws 1868, p. 1225.

[18] Sen. J., 1868, pp. 197–198.

[19] Minutes of the Assembly, 1868, p. 309.

[20] Sen. J., 1868, p. 356; Minutes of the Assembly 1868, p. 743. In the Assembly a protest by Mr. Atwater and other members was read but not entered on the minutes (ibid.).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

ber from New Jersey on March 30, but returned to him, before the reading had been completed, for the reasons that it was "disrespectful to the House, and scandalous in character." [21]

SCHOOLS

New Jersey made some provision for Negro education at an early date. The 1821 Act in respect of slaves required slave owners to cause every one of their slaves under 21 years to be taught to read, and imposed a fine for non-compliance.[22]

The Constitution of 1844 [23] provided for a fund for the support of "free schools," the income therefrom to be annually appropriated to the support of "public schools, for the equal benefit of all the people of the state" (Article IV, section VII, subs. 6).

In 1846, the year in which slavery was abolished in the state,[24] a system of public schools was established.[25] Nineteen years later the Superintendent of Public Schools characterized it as "yet crude and imperfect".[26] The 1846 legislation did not mention Negroes. The Superintendent of Public Schools in 1864, in a pamphlet entitled "Interpretation of the School Law," [27] which was [21] Congressional Globe, 40th Congress, 2d Sess., p. 2226.

---

[22] N. J. Rev. Law, 1821, p. 272.

[23] See N. J. Laws, 1845, pp. 5 et seq.

[24] Laws of New Jersey, 1847, tit. XI, c. 6.

[25] Id., tit. XII, c. 3. See also the statute concerning the school fund, id., c. 1.

[26] Report of Superintendent of Public Schools for 1864, p. 1, N. J. Documents, 1865.

[27] Id., Appendix, p. 15.

distributed to school officers, dealt with the question of schools for colored children, as follows:

> 1. There is no section of the law nor any decision of the courts that deprives colored children of the advantages of public school instruction.
>
> 2. Schools may be established for the special benefit of colored children.
>
> * * * * *
>
> Trustees have full authority to establish schools and employ teachers for their respective districts; and if in their judgment the interests of a district require the establishment of a school for colored children, or the establishment of two or more schools differing as to grade, or character, they may act accordingly, provided always that every child enjoys the advantages to which he is entitled.[28]

In 1867, the State Superintendent declared in his report:

> * * * there is one cause which is the foundation of all reform, the corner stone of our government, the charter of our liberties, the secret of our prosperity in the past and the hope of our stability and success in the future, and that is a common school education for the whole people in the whole land without regard to race, color, condition or sex.[29]

From the 1869 report of the Superintendent for Hudson County it appears that 32 buildings in the county were occupied by schools for white children, two by schools for colored children.[30]

---

[28] Id., Appendix, pp. 69–70.

[29] N. J. Doc., 1867, p. 671.

[30] N. J. Doc., 1869, p. 774.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The State Constitution, adopted in 1875, left the school provisions of the Constitution of 1844 [31] virtually intact, adding the sentence:

> The legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of free public schools for the instruction of all the children in this state between the ages of five and eighteen years.

None of the school legislation prior to 1881 contains any reference to race.[32] In 1881 an act was passed expressly providing:

> That no child, between the age of five and eighteen years of age, shall be excluded from any public school in this state on account of his or her religion, nationality or color.[33]

This law was held to entitle Negro children to attend the public school closest to their residence, in a district where there were three schools for white children and one for Negroes. Pierce v. Union District School Trustees, 46 N. J. L. 76, aff'd, 47 N. J. L. 348 (1884). The decision was based solely upon the language of the statute. It did not discuss any constitutional aspects.

---

[31] N. J. Rev. Stat., 1877, pp. XXXIII et seq., Art. IV, Section VII, (6).

[32] See the "Act to establish a system of Public Instruction," Laws, 1867, p. 360; "An Act to make free the Public Schools of the State," Laws, 1871, p. 94: "Act relative to the attendance of Children at School" (making school attendance compulsory), Laws, 1874, p. 135.

[33] Laws, 1881, p. 186. Re-enacted in 1903, with a slight change as to age. (L., 1903, 2d Sp. Sess., c. 1 § 125, p. 48.)

Suffrage in New Jersey was limited to whites by the Constitution of 1844.[34] Jury service was not restricted to qualified voters, as in most states, but to "citizens" "resident within the county".[35] The Civil Rights Act, passed in 1884, expressly prohibited the exclusion of Negroes from juries. It also provided for "full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities and privileges of inns, public conveyances * * *, theatres and other places of public amusement."[36]

NEW YORK

New York ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in 1867. Separate schools, permitted since 1841 and required to be equal after 1864, continued until 1900. They were upheld by the New York courts against attacks based on the Civil Rights Act of 1866, the Fourteenth Amendment, and a state statute of 1873 prohibiting denial of "full and equal enjoyment" of the common schools. Dallas v. Fosdick, 40 Howard's Pr. R. 249 (1869); People v. Easton, 13 Abbott's Pr. R. (N. S.) 159 (1872); People v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 438 (1883). In 1900 the Legislature outlawed segregated schools. New York had permitted Negroes to serve on juries, and to vote—under certain restrictions—before the Civil War.

---

[34] N. J., Const., 1844, Art. II, sec. 1.

[35] Laws of N. J., 1847, p. 966.

[36] Laws, 1884, p. 339.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

RATIFICATION

Governor Fenton's recommendation of January 2, 1867, for ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment did not go into detail:[37]

> It will be your high privilege, in the name of the people of this State, to ratify the proposed constitutional amendment, which I have the honor to transmit upon this opening day of your session. I cannot too earnestly recommend your prompt action, in order that the judgment of New York on a proposition so moderate and so just, may be submitted at the earliest day to the unreconstructed States, and that, on our part, there may be no delay in anchoring these fraternal guarantees in the Federal Constitution. I need not discuss the features of this amendment; they have undergone the ordeal of public consideration since the adjournment of Congress in July last, and they are understood, appreciated and approved. * * *
>
> There is no other plan before the people, and the verdict of the ballot-box implies that no other plan is desired. * * *

The Senate ratified on January 3, by a vote of 23 to 3,[38] and the Assembly on January 10, by a vote of 71 to 36.[39]

SCHOOLS

Under the laws of New York of 1841[40] and 1847[41] the establishment of separate schools for

---

[37] Annual Message, Jan. 2, 1867. Assembly Journal, 1867, Vol. 1, pp. 13–14.

[38] Senate Journal, 1867, p. 34.

[39] Assembly Journal, 1867, p. 77.

[40] N. Y. Laws, 1841, c. 260, sec. 15, p. 238.

[41] N. Y. Laws, 1847, c. 480, sec. 147, p. 714. (Repealed, Laws, 1864, c. 533, Tit. 10, sec. 4, p. 1281.)

colored children was authorized. This was continued by the Common School Act of 1864,[42] which, however, required that the facilities for instruction be equal to those of the white schools.[43]

There was no discussion of school segregation in the Constitutional Convention of 1867–68.

Special acts authorized specific cities and towns to establish separate schools for colored children.[44] In some cases the authorization was in terms of a requirement for separate schools.[45]

In Dallas v. Fosdick, 40 How. Pr. Rep., 249 (Sup. Ct., February, 1869), the validity of a provision in the city charter of Buffalo requiring separate schools was sustained. The court did not refer to the Fourteenth Amendment, holding, in effect, that public education was a privilege furnished at the pleasure of the state:

> The right to be educated in the common schools of the state, is one derived entirely from the legislation of the state; and as such, it has at all times been subject to such restrictions and qualifications as the legislature have from time to time deemed it proper to impose upon its enjoyment (p. 251).

---

[42] N. Y. Laws, 1864, ch. 555, pp. 1211–1290.

[43] Id., p. 1281.

[44] N. Y. Laws, 1832, c. 136, § 1, p. 211; Laws, 1845, c. 306, p. 327; Laws, 1847, c. 51, § 30, p. 61; Laws, 1850, c. 60, § 10, p. 70; c. 143, § 4, p. 238; c. 349, § 22, p. 757; Laws, 1863, c. 446, § 12, p. 762.

[45] N. Y. Laws, 1851, c. 171, § 15, p. 327; Laws, 1852, c. 291, p. 430 (Repealed, Laws, 1859, c. 187, p. 447); Laws, 1853, c. 230, Tit. VI, § 5, 7, p. 487.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The court held that the Civil Rights Act of 1866 did not secure to Negroes the "right or privilege" of attending a white school.

In People ex rel. Dietz v. Easton, 13 Abbott's Pr. Rep. (N. S.) 159 (Sup. Ct., November, 1872), a regulation of the Albany board of public instruction, which required colored children to attend separate schools, was sustained against the contention that it violated the "privileges and immunities" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. On this point the court cited State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio 198.

In April, 1873, the legislature passed an Act "to provide for the protection of citizens in their civil and political rights". This repealed all laws discriminating "against any citizen on account of color, by the use of the word 'white,' or any other term in any law, statute, ordinance or regulation".[46] The law further provided:

> No citizen of this State shall, by reason of race, color or previous condition of servitude, be excepted or excluded from the full and equal enjoyment of any accommodation, advantage, facility or privilege furnished by [innkeepers, common carriers, theaters or places of amusement, or] by trustees, commissioners, superintendents, teachers and other officers of common schools and public institutions of learning * * * (Sec. 1).

This provision, however, did not end segregation.

Ten years later the Court of Appeals considered the question of segregated schools in People ex

[46] N. Y. Laws, 1873, c. 186, sec. 3.

rel. King v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 438 (1883). The majority held compulsory segregation valid under the Fourteenth Amendment. Referring to the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, the opinion stated:

> It would seem to be a plain deduction from the rule in that case that the privilege of receiving an education at the expense of the State, being created and conferred solely by the laws of the State, and always subject to its discretionary regulation might be granted or refused to any individual or class at the pleasure of the State (p. 447).

With reference to the "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the court held that what was required was "equality and not identity" of privileges and rights, and such equality existed in the separate schools (p. 455). For the same reason the court found the 1873 statute inapplicable (p. 456).

The dissenting opinion stated that > * * * the object of the amendment was not only to give citizenship to colored persons, but by preventing legislation against them distinctly as colored, or on the ground of color, secure exemption against any discrimination which either implies legal inferiority in civil society or lessens the security of their rights, and which, if permitted, would, in the end, subject them while citizens to the degrading condition of an enslaved race * * * (p. 458).

A later case, People ex rel. Cisco v. School Board, 161 N. Y. 598 (1900) followed the Gallagher case.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Authority to maintain separate schools was continued[47] until 1900. In that year the Legislature enacted an "Act to secure equal rights to colored children in the state of New York" which provided that

> No person shall be refused admission into or be excluded from any public school in the state of New York on account of race or color.[48]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

New York was one of the few states which had permitted Negroes to vote before the Civil War. Article II, Section 1 of the 1846 Constitution had extended the franchise to Negroes although with residence and property qualifications not required of white persons.[49]

The Legislature which had voted on April 14, 1869, to ratify the Fifteenth Amendment, rescinded its ratification on January 5, 1870.[50] In 1874 the restrictions imposed on colored voters were removed by constitutional amendment.

Negroes were not excluded from juries by law.[51]

---

[47] N. Y. Laws, 1894, c. 556, tit. XV, art. 11, §§ 28, 29, p. 1288. (Sec. 28 repealed by N. Y. Laws, 1900, c. 492, § 2, p. 1173; sec. 29 repealed by N. Y. Laws, 1938, c. 134, p. 657.)

[48] N. Y. Laws, 1900, c. 492.

[49] In November 1869, the people rejected a new constitution, but approved its retention of the property qualification for colored voters. See 5 Thorpe, American Charters, Constitutions and Organic Laws, p. 2693.

[50] N. Y. Laws, 1870, p. 2147.

[51] N. Y. Rev. Stat. at L., 1869, Part III, c. 7, tit. 4, art. 2, § 13.

NORTH CAROLINA

North Carolina, after rejecting the Fourteenth Amendment in December, 1866, ratified it in July, 1868. The Constitution of 1868 took no position on segregation, although the Convention itself had resolved in favor of separate schools. In April, 1869, a school law was adopted establishing separate schools.

RATIFICATION

In ratifying the Thirteenth Amendment, the legislature in its resolution of ratification specified "That it does not enlarge the powers of the Congress to legislate on the subject of freedmen within the States."[52] Fears had been expressed that under the second section of that Amendment Congress would claim and use the power > * * * to say who shall testify in our courts, or sit in the jury box, or on our judicial benches—who shall be invested with the elective franchise—or whether the negro may be permitted to intermarry with the white race * * *. The advocates of negro equality will, under this amendment, contend that he is not free, so long as there is a distinction or discrimination between him and the white man; they will insist that there shall be but one law common to both races. * * * A revolution is demanded of us, in all our social relations. * * *[53]

Six months later the Fourteenth Amendment was submitted for ratification. In his message

[52] House Journal, 1865–66, p. 135.

[53] Senate Journal, 1865–66, pp. 149–155.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

to the Legislature, Governor Worth recommended its rejection, saying in part

> If there be any feature in the American system of freedom which gives to it practical value, it is the fact that a municipal code is provided under the jurisdiction of each State, by which all controversies as to life, liberty or property, except in the now limited field of Federal jurisdiction, are determined by a jury of the county or neighborhood where the parties reside and the contest arises; but if Congress is hereafter to become the protector of life, liberty and property in the States, and the guarantor of equal protection of the laws, and, by appropriate legislation, to declare a system of rights and remedies, which can be administered only in the Federal Courts, then the most common and familiar offices of justice must be transferred to the few points in the State where these courts are held, and judges and other officers, deriving and holding their commissions, not from the authority and people of the State as heretofore, but from the President and Senate of the United States. The States, as by so much, are to cease to be self-governing communities as heretofore * * *.[54]

The Legislature referred the matter to a Joint Select Committee on the Constitutional Amendment, which recommended against ratification. Its report[55] referred to the following objections:

> In the first section it is provided that "no State shall make or enforce any law

[54] House Journal, 1866–67, p. 29.

[55] Senate Journal, 1866–67, pp. 91–105.

which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." What those privileges and immunities are, is not defined. Whether reference is had only to such privileges and immunities as may be supposed now to exist, or to all others which the Federal Government may hereafter declare to belong to it, or may choose to grant to citizens, is left in doubt, though the latter construction seems the more natural, and is one which that Government could at any time insist upon as correct and entirely consistent with the language used. With this construction placed upon it, what limit would remain to the power of that Government to interfere in the internal affairs of the States? And what becomes of the right of a State to regulate its domestic concerns in its own way? Whatever restrictions any State might think proper, for the general good, to impose upon any or all its citizens, upon a declaration by the Federal Government that such restrictions were an abridgement of the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the Union, such State laws would at once be annulled. For instance: the laws of North Carolina forbid the intermarriage of white persons and negroes. But if this Amendment be ratified, the Government of the United States could declare that this law abridged the privileges of citizens, and must not be enforced; and miscegenation would thereupon be legalized in this Commonwealth. Grant that such action on the part of the Government would not be probable, still it would be possible; and its bare possibility sufficiently exemplifies the boundlessness of

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> the powers which the Amendment would confer on the Federal Government.
>
> * * * * *
>
> In the final section, power is given to Congress "to enforce by appropriate legislation, all the provisions of this Article." How wide a door is hereby opened for the interference of Congress, with subjects hitherto regarded beyond its range, it is impossible adequately to conceive, until experience shall have tested the matter. * * *

The proposal to reject the amendment was approved by both Houses.[56]

On July 2, 1868, the Reconstruction Legislature ratified the Amendment without discussion, the Governor merely recommending "immediate ratification" as the "first business to be performed by the Legislature".[57] The two Houses approved on the same day.[58]

SCHOOLS

Although the North Carolina Constitution of 1776 incorporated provisions for education, the first public school law was not enacted until 1839. From that time until the Civil War the public school system developed rapidly.[59] School districts were to be established "having regard to the number of white children in each."[60] No pro-

---

[56] House Journal, 1866–67, p. 183; Senate Journal, 1866–67, p. 138.

[57] Senate Journal, 1868, p. 12.

[58] Id., p. 15; House Journal, 1868, p. 15.

[59] Knight, Public Education in the South (1922), pp. 145–55, 233–8.

[60] Laws of North Carolina, 1838–39; ch. VIII, sec. 3, p. 13.

vision was made for education of even free persons of color, and it was forbidden to teach slaves to read or write or to give or sell them books or pamphlets.[81]

Immediately after the war, schools for the freedmen were established by charitable organizations, but the common schools were not opened to Negroes. The Act of 1866 prescribing the rights of "persons of color" did not put them on an equality with whites.[82]

The Constitution of 1868 provided that

> ARTICLE I. Section 27. The people have a right to the privilege of education, and it is the duty of the State to guard and maintain that right.
>
> ARTICLE IX. Section 2. The general assembly, at its first session under this constitution, shall provide, by taxation and otherwise, for a general and uniform system of public schools, wherein tuition shall be free of charge to all children of the State between the ages of six and twenty-one years.

It contained no provision either requiring or prohibiting separate schools. The Constitutional Convention did, however, adopt the following resolution:

> Resolved, That it is the sense of this Convention that intermarriages and illegal intercourse between the races should be discountenanced, and the interests and happiness of the two races would be best pro-

[81] Laws of North Carolina, 1830–31, ch. VI, p. 11; see also North Carolina Revised Statutes 1837, ch. 111.

[82] Laws of North Carolina, Spec. Sess., 1866, ch. 40, p. 99.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> moted by the establishment of separate schools.[63]

On the other hand, it refused to insert a proposed proviso in the article on Corporations other than Municipal:

> Mr. Durham moved to amend by adding, "Provided, That institutions of learning in which black and white people are educated promiscuously, shall not be incorporated under general laws, or by special act."
>
> Mr. Hood moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Durham, which, after some discussion, was withdrawn.
>
> The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. Durham.
>
> Mr. Durham demanded the yeas and nays.
>
> The demand was not sustained.
>
> The amendment was lost.[64]

In the Address (of the convention) to the People of North Carolina, explanatory of the Constitution, is the following:

> Some persons have been so bold or ignorant, as to allege, that white and colored people are required to be enrolled in the same militia company, and white and colored children to attend the same schools, and that intermarriages between the races are encouraged. All these assertions are false, as any reader of the Constitution will see. All these matters are left now, as they were by the Constitution of 1776, by the Constitution of 1835 and by the proposed Constitution of 1865, to be regulated by the representatives of the people in the General Assembly. Any one who denies the pro-

[63] Convention Journal, p. 473.

[64] Id., p. 287.

> priety of thus leaving them, both impeaches the wisdom of our ancestors and distrusts the people of the future.[65]

In his inaugural address to the Legislature on July 4, 1868, two days after its ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, Governor Holden pointed out that the new Constitution "provides for education as 'a right,' which it is 'the duty of the State to guard and maintain.'"[66] He went on to recommend separate schools:

> The injunction of the Constitution regarding education should be faithfully observed * * *. The first duty of a free State is to educate its children. It cannot be too often repeated that the structure and perpetuity of free institutions depend on the intelligence and virtue of the people. We must either prepare to educate thoroughly the rising generation of both races, or abandon the hope that we shall continue a free, self-governing State. It does not follow, nor does the [State] Constitution require, that the white and colored races shall be educated together in the same schools. It is believed to be better for both, and more satisfactory to both, that the schools should be distinct and separate. But they should be equally calculated to impart instruction, and the schools for the two, thus separate and apart, should enjoy equally the fostering care of the State.[67]

He also recommended separate companies and regiments for white and colored in the militia.[68]

---

[65] Id., p. 485.

[66] North Carolina Public Documents, 1867–68, Doc. No. 2, Ses. 1868, p. 2.

[67] Id., pp. 5–6.

[68] Id., pp. 7–8.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Later that year, in his message to the regular session of the Legislature, the Governor again recommended that the schools be separate, "but in other respects there should be no difference in the character of the schools, or in the provision made to support them." [69]

The "Act to Provide for a System of Public Instruction" of April 12, 1869, provided that the local school authorities establish "a separate school or separate schools for the instruction of children and youth of each race * * *." [70] The Constitution was amended in 1875 to require separate schools.[71]

OHIO

Ohio ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867, and rescinded its ratification in 1868, declaring that the Amendment combined several distinct propositions which had already been fully provided for in the Federal Constitution. Under the school law in effect in 1867 and 1868, separate schools for colored children were required wherever there was a specified minimum number of such children in a district; where their number was less than the minimum, the local school authorities could admit them to the white schools or use their proportionate share of the school fund for having them taught in some other way. In 1871 the Supreme Court of Ohio held that the Fourteenth Amendment did not outlaw school segregation, [69] North Carolina Public Documents, 1868–69, Doc. No. 1, Sess. 1868–69, pp. 8–9.

[70] Public Laws of North Carolina, 1868–69, ch. 184, sec. 50, p. 471.

[71] Art. IX, sec. 2.

State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198. The Constitutional Convention of 1873–74 did not vote on a proposal to provide separate schools, with local option for mixed schools. Segregation in the public schools was abolished in 1887. Some laws discriminating against Negroes were repealed in 1849, but until the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment Negroes were barred from voting and excluded from jury service. The miscegenation law was repealed in 1887.

RATIFICATION

Governor Cox in his message of January 2, 1867, to the 57th General Assembly[72] recommended ratification, and said of the Amendment:

> * * * It consists of several sections containing provisions which in the wisdom of the National Legislature are necessary to secure permanent peace throughout the country, and to correct the most palpable evils remaining in those States which were lately in rebellion; evils, which, without such correction would endanger the National safety, and be a lasting source of irritation and strife.
>
> In examining the proposed amendment, its extreme moderation is, under all the circumstances of the country and the time, most remarkable. It contains four provisions, of which three would become irrepealable and unchang[e]able except by [72] Ohio Doc., 1866, Part 1, pp. 263 et seq.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

new amendment of the Constitution; but the other could be suspended or annulled by act of Congress.

The three former consist, First, of the grant of power to the National Government to protect the citizens of the whole country in their legal privileges and immunities, should any State attempt to oppress classes or individuals, or deprive them of the equal protection of the laws; Second: of the equitable equalization of representation * * *; and Third, of (the debt provisions.)

* * * * *

A simple statement of these propositions is their complete justification. The first was proven necessary long before the war, when it was notorious that any attempt to exercise freedom of discussion in regard to the system which was then hurrying on the rebellion, was not tolerated in the Southern States; and the State laws gave no real protection to immunities of this kind, which are of the very essence of free government. The necessity, also, of having somewhere a reserved right to protect the freedom of the slaves whom the war emancipated is too palpable for argument. If these rights are in good faith protected by State laws and State authorities, there will be no need of federal legislation on the subject, and the power will remain in abeyance; but if they are systematically violated, those who violate them will be themselves responsible for all the necessary interference of the central government.[73]

[73] Id., pp. 281-2.

On January 3, the Senate voted for ratification, without any debate.[74] The House concurred on January 4, by a vote of 54 to 25.[75]

The Legislature of 1868 had a small Democratic majority in both branches,[76] while a Republican, Rutherford B. Hayes, was Governor. In his Inaugural Address, in January 1868, he alluded to a proposal to rescind ratification, saying in part

> * * * I submit with confidence that nothing has occurred which warrants the opinion that the ratification by the last General Assembly of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, was not in accordance with the deliberate and settled convictions of the people. That amendment was, after the amplest discussion, upon an issue distinctly presented, sanctioned by a large majority of the people. If any fact exists which justifies the belief that they now wish that the resolution should be repealed, by which the assent of Ohio was given to that important amendment, it has not been brought to the attention of the public.[77]

On January 11, the House of Representatives adopted a resolution to rescind ratification on the following grounds:[78]

> The provisions of the said proposed amendment are ex post facto in their nature

---

[74] Sen. J., 1867, p. 9. The vote was 21 to 12.

[75] House J., 1867, pp. 12–13.

[76] Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, 1866, p. 600.

[77] Ohio Doc., 1867, Part 1, pp. 207–208.

[78] House Joint Resolution No. 1, House J., Jan., 1868, pp. 10–12.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> and operation, and confer upon congress power to legislate on subjects foreign to original objects of the Federal compact;
>
> The adoption of said resolution was a misrepresentation of the public sentiment of the people of Ohio, and contrary to the best interests of the white race, endangering the perpetuity of our free institutions.

The Senate substituted a resolution recommended by its Committee on Federal Relations, which was adopted on January 13, 1868, by a vote of 19 to 17.[79] The House concurred on the same day.[80] The Resolution declared:

* * * * *

> And, whereas, Several distinct propositions are combined in the said proposed amendment, several of which are already fully provided for in the constitution of the United States, and to which no person or party objects; therefore, be it
>
> Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the above recited resolution be, and the same is hereby rescinded, and the ratification, on behalf of the state of Ohio, of the above recited proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States, is hereby withdrawn and refused.[81]

SCHOOLS

The Ohio Constitution of 1802 declared that education should be encouraged by the legislature (Art. VIII, Sec. 3); that no law was to be passed which would keep the poor from equal partici-

[79] Sen. J. 1868, pp. 33–39.

[80] House J. 1868, pp. 44–51. The vote was 56 to 46.

[81] Ibid.; 65 Ohio Laws 280, 281.

pation in federally-supported schools (Art. VIII, Sec. 25); and that such schools were to be open "without any distinction or preference whatever * * *." (Ibid.)

School laws of 1821[82] and 1825[83] initiated a system of public schools. The first racial references are found in the school law of 1831.[84] Under this statute a school fund was to be raised for the instruction of white children (Sec. 1) with the aid of a property tax, from which the property of "blacks and mulattoes" was exempted (Sec. 2). The schools in each district were to be open, for at least three months each year, to all white children residing in the district (Sec. 34).

Common schools for colored children were first provided by a statute enacted in 1848.[85] This statute permitted the organization of colored school districts, to be administered by the colored residents. However, it was superseded in 1849 by a law which made separate school mandatory wherever the local school authorities deemed it not expedient to admit colored children to the existing common schools; these separate schools were subject to the same laws and regulations as those governing the common schools.[86]

Difficulties arose in Cincinnati when an attempt was made in 1850 to establish colored

[82] 19 Ohio Laws 51.
[83] 23 Ohio Laws 36.
[84] 29 Ohio Laws 414.
[85] 46 Ohio Laws 81 (General Acts).
[86] 47 Ohio Laws 17.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

schools. After the Negro residents had elected their school trustees, employed teachers and rented school houses, the city treasurer withheld the funds apportioned for the schools. He contended that the Negro trustees, not being electors, did not qualify as office holders under the Ohio Constitution, and hence could not draw any money from the city treasury.[87] The dispute was decided in favor of the Negro trustees in State v. City of Cincinnati, 19 Ohio St. 178 (1850). The Supreme Court of Ohio held that the constitutional requirements for voting and public office did not apply to school trustees. Subsequent legislation eliminated the colored trustees from the city's school administration[88] but in 1856 the Negro residents of the city again obtained the right to elect their own trustees.[89]

The general school law of 1864, which was in force at the time of Ohio's ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, authorized and required separate schools for colored children whenever their number in a district or in adjoining districts exceeded twenty; where the number of such children was less than twenty, or where distance made a separate school impracticable, a proportionate share in the school fund had to be appropriated for their education.[90]

---

[87] See Special Report of the U. S. Commissioner of Education (1871), p. 371, House Exec. Docs., 41st Cong., 2d Sess., vol. 13, No. 315.

[88] 51 Ohio Laws 508; 52 Ohio Laws 48.

[89] 53 Ohio Laws 117. See also Special Report, supra, p. 372.

[90] 61 Ohio Laws 31 (1864), section 4, amending section 31 of the school law of 1853 (51 Ohio Laws 429), which had similar provisions for colored schools.

In 1859 the Supreme Court of Ohio, in Van Camp v. Board of Education of Logan, 9 Ohio St. 406, held that mulatto children were not entitled to enter the white common schools. The dissenting opinion declared that "caste-legislation" was inconsistent with the theory of a free and popular government "that asserted in its bill of rights the equality of all men" (p. 415).

The Commissioner of Common Schools, in 1868, described the situation in the State as follows:

> Colored youths of legal school age, i. e., between the ages of 5 and 21 years, are entitled to the privileges of the public school fund. Colored youth cannot of legal right claim admittance to our common schools for white youth. The local school authorities may, however, admit a colored youth to the public schools for white youth, and as a matter of fact in the largest part of the State, the colored youth are admitted on equal terms with the white youth to the common or public schools.[91]

In 1871, the Supreme Court of Ohio held that the school segregation law of the State did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198. This appears to be the first case in which the highest court of a State passed on the effect of the Fourteenth Amendment on racial segregation in the schools. The court, discussing the question in terms of the "privileges and immunities" clause of the Amendment, concluded that school privileges derived from state law alone were not covered; [91] See Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana for 1867–68, pp. 25–26, Ind. Doc. 1867–1868.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the clause was limited to federal rights. In any event, according to the court, "separate but equal" facilities did not violate the "privileges and immunities" clause.

The decision in State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann played a prominent role in the discussion on schools which took place in the Constitutional Convention of 1873–74.[92] The Committee on Education submitted a proposed constitutional provision that contained no reference to segregation.[93] Mr. Baber offered an amendment providing for separate schools for the two races, "so as to give each the equal benefit of a common school education," but with a local option for mixed schools.[94]

In explanation, he said:

> * * * One reason why I offer this amendment is that I concur very much in the views expressed by the gentleman from Hamilton [Mr. Carbery] and other gentlemen, that, if ever the school system of this State fails, it will be in consequence of the insane desire for a central bureau of education at Washington, for civil rights bills, and other means of interfering with the schooling of the children under State authority. I protest against it. I believe that it is the exclusive right of the State, and yet at the same time I am disposed to be as liberal as anybody. * * * Now, at once to end this controversy, at once to put [92] The Constitution drafted by the Convention was rejected by the electorate in 1874. See 3 Page's New Annotated Ohio General Code 6584 (1926).

---

[93] Ohio Constitutional Convention, 1873–74, Debates, vol. 2, pp. 2186 et seq.

[94] Id., p. 2238.

this matter into the hands of the school districts of the State—because, I understand, that in the northern parts of the State, and also in a good many other places, where colored children are allowed to be admitted into the schools without any controversy—where a large majority of the electors desire that to be done, let it be done without any taxpayer coming forward and bringing suit for the purpose of stopping it by injunction. But on the other hand, I say that, where the people do not desire it to be done, and especially in my own locality, in the city of Columbus, where they have a large separate school, and where all the friends of education much prefer it, I do not want to see any sort of intermeddling. * * *

He continued:

* * * Now, what I want to call the attention of the Convention to is, to the claim that this interferes with the Fourteenth Amendment, under which claim this Congress of the United States, in pursuance of a cause of usurpation that it has been promising ever since the time, now attempts to come into the State and interfere with the right of Ohio to control her schools. With regard to that amendment the court says: [Quoting from pp. 209–210 of the opinion in the McCann case, supra.]

* * * * *

They go on, and, by argument, show that this is a matter for the State, that it is not one of the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States, under which broad scope of power Congress may sweep away all our rights and privileges. * * *

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> Mr. ALEXANDER. I presume that the amendment [to the report of the Committee of Education] is intended to remedy some evil. I would consequently ask whether the evil that he intends to remedy is the admission of colored children to the schools or their exclusion therefrom?
>
> Mr. BABER. The evil I desire to remedy is in order to have the Constitution of Ohio stand up for its own citizens against Federal usurpation; that wherever they desire the admission of these children, I want them to come in; but when the people do not desire it, I do not want them forced to break up the common schools. Is the gentleman answered?
>
> Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, sir.[95]

There was no further debate on this issue. The proposed amendment was not submitted to a vote by the Convention.

In 1887 the provision of the school law regarding segregated schools was repealed.[96]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The law of 1849[96a] which provided for the establishment of colored schools, also repealed the "black laws" of 1804,[97] 1807[98] and 1834,[99] together with all provisions of other acts insofar as they created any disabilities or conferred any special privileges on account of color. There were excepted, however, the act of 1831 relating to juries and the poor law of 1831.

---

[95] Id., pp. 2238–39, 2240–41.

[96] 84 Ohio Laws 34.

[96a] 47 Ohio Laws 18.

[97] 2 Ohio Laws 63.

[98] 5 Ohio Laws 53.

[99] 32 Ohio Gen. Laws 22.

Until the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment Negroes were barred from voting and from jury service.[1] A law making miscegenation a misdemeanor, passed in 1861,[2] was repealed in 1887 by the same act which abolished separate schools.[3]

OREGON

Oregon ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in October, 1866, but rescinded its ratification in October, 1868. There had been no racial distinctions in the schools of the state since their inception. The Constitution of 1857 excluded from the state all Negroes not already resident. Negroes were barred from the polls and juries. The legislature which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment shortly thereafter prohibited miscegenation.

RATIFICATION

In September, 1866, the Governor recommended that the Legislature ratify the Fourteenth Amendment as "a matter of the greatest importance."[4] In his Inaugural Address on September 12, he proclaimed that the "States' rights" theory was dead, slavery had perished, and that the fruits of victory must not be yielded up:

> Can any truly loyal man object to, or could the rebels themselves expect less, than the repudiation of the rebel debt, to pledging the national faith for the payment of the federal debt, to the securing in the full exercise

[1] Const. 1851, Art. V, sec. 1; Ohio, Rev. Stats., 1870, c. 62, sec. I.

[2] 58 Ohio Laws 6.

[3] 84 Ohio Laws 34.

[4] House J., 1866, App., p. 427.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> of all their civil rights, of all persons in the republic * * *? The terms are eminently just and proper * * * [the proposed constitutional amendment] founded in justice and right * * * merits your highest admiration.[5]

The Senate voted for ratification on September 14.[6] The House, after a favorable report of its Judiciary Committee,[7] followed on September 19.[8]

In 1868, after the Republican Party had been defeated in the election, the Legislature rescinded its ratification. A Joint Resolution introduced in the Senate on September 16, 1868,[9] recited that the legislatures of the Southern states which had ratified the Amendment "were created by a military despotism against the will of the legal voters of the said states under the reconstruction acts (so called) of Congress, which are usurpatrous, unconstitutional, revolutionary and void." The resolution was adopted on October 5.[10] In the House the resolution was passed on October 15.[11]

SCHOOLS

In his message to the Legislature in 1866, in which he recommended adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Governor discussed at length the subject of education.[12] He mentioned the "unjus-

[5] House J., 1866, pp. 29–30.
[6] Sen. J., 1866, pp. 35–36.
[7] House J., 1866, p. 72.
[8] Id., p. 77.
[9] Sen. J., 1868, pp. 32–37.
[10] Id., p. 131.
[11] House J., 1868, pp. 270–273.
[12] House J., 1866, App., pp. 432 et seq.

tifiable failure to meet the wants of the rising generation" and of the "wretched condition of our present common school system," and advocated a revision of the school laws and the creation of an independent department of public instruction. In his Inaugural Address,[13] he urged establishment of a general system of good common school education "within the reach of every child, rich or poor, within the State."

Schools were established while a territorial government existed. These were free to all children.[14] After Oregon became a state, the same provision was written into its school law of October 17, 1862.[15] The Constitution of 1857, under which Oregon was admitted in 1859, stated that

> Provision shall be made by law for the distribution of the income of the common school fund among the several counties of the state, in proportion to the number of children resident therein between the ages of four and twenty years.[16]

There was no legislation containing any reference to racial distinctions in the public schools. The school law of 1872[17] provided that public schools "shall be free to all persons between the ages of four and twenty years, residing [in the district]" (Sec. 46).

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The Oregon Constitution of 1857, in its Bill of Rights, provided that

[13] House J., 1866, p. 30.
[14] Ore. Stats., 1853–55, p. 466.
[15] Ore. General Laws, 1845–1864, c. 5, tit. II, sec. 24.
[16] Const. 1857, Art. VIII, Sec. 4.
[17] Ore. Laws, 1872, p. 145.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> No free negro or mulatto, not residing in this state at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall come, reside or be within this state, or hold any real estate, or make any contracts, or maintain any suit therein; * * *[18]

The Constitution also restricted the franchise to white males.[19] The Civil Code, adopted in 1862, likewise limited jury service to white males.[20]

In 1866 the Legislature which had a month earlier ratified the Fourteenth Amendment enacted a statute prohibiting marriage of whites with Negroes, Chinese, Kanakas, and Indians.[21]

PENNSYLVANIA

Pennsylvania ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in February, 1867, after extended debate from which it appears that both its supporters and opponents believed that the "privileges and immunities" and "equal protection" clauses were to be interpreted broadly. Provision for racially segregated schools had been made in 1854. In 1881 an inferior court held that these provisions violated the Fourteenth Amendment. Commonwealth ex rel. Allen v. Davis, 10 Weekly Notes of Cases 159 (1881). The law was repealed a month later. Racial segregation in homes for soldiers' orphans was required by a law enacted shortly after Pennsylvania ratified the Fourteenth Amendment. In 1867, almost concurrently with its ratification of the Fourteenth [18] Const. 1857, Art. I, sec. 35.

---

[19] Art. II, sec. 2.

[20] Ore. Gen. Laws, 1843–1872, Civ. Code, c. 12, title 1, sec. 918.

[21] Ore. Laws, 1866, p. 10.

Amendment, the Pennsylvania legislature prohibited racial discrimination by railroad companies. The sponsor of that measure indicated that Negro equality demanded integrated schools. Pennsylvania excluded Negroes from the franchise and from juries until 1870.

RATIFICATION

Pennsylvania ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in the legislative session which began January, 1867. Extensive debates took place both in the Senate (January 14, January 17) and in the House (January 23, 30).[22] On January 17, the Senate voted for ratification, 21 to 11.[23] On February 6, the House concurred by a vote of 62 to 34.[24]

Neither the message of Governor Curtin, in which he recommended ratification,[25] nor the Inaugural Address of his successor, Governor Geary,[26] discussed the Amendment in detail. Governor Curtin referred to the election of 1866, which, he said, showed that a large majority of the people favored the Amendment. To him, this was not surprising, since the Amendment was nothing but a restatement of long established principles:

> That every person, born in the United States and free, whether by birth or manumission, is a citizen of the United States,

---

[22] Pennsylvania is the only state which published verbatim reports of legislative debates.

[23] Sen. J., 1867, pp. 125–126.

[24] House J., 1867, pp. 278–279.

[25] Sen. J., 1867, pp. 16–18; Pa. Leg. Rec., 1867, pp. 9–10.

[26] Sen. J., 1867, pp. 105–6.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> and that no State has a right to abridge the privileges of citizens of the United States—these are principles which were never seriously doubted anywhere, until after the insane crusade in favor of slavery had been for some time in progress. What is called the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Dred Scott case, has made it expedient and proper to re-assert these vital principles in an authoritative manner, and this is done in the first clause of the proposed amendments.[27]

Both in the Senate and the House there were extended debates. These indicate that both the supporters of the Amendment and the opposition believed that the "privileges and immunities" and "equal protection" clauses should be interpreted broadly. Some supporters argued that the purpose of the first section of the Amendment was to implement the Declaration of Independence. Thus, Mr. Day stated in the House debate that

> We propose, in the first place, to write, in substance, the civil rights bill * * * Put all upon an equality before the law. Put it in black and white in the organic law that negroes have rights which white men are bound to respect—the rights to life, liberty and property; in short, the inalienable rights enunciated in the Declaration of Independence, not to be accepted as "glittering generalities," but as original, self-evident truths * * *[28]

---

[27] Id., p. 16.

[28] Pa. Leg. Rec., 1867, App., p. LXV. See also the speeches of Landon in the Senate (p. IX), and of Mann (p. XLVIII) and Kinney (p. LIV) in the House.

Others stated that it was designed to give full effect to the Thirteenth Amendment. Senator Bigham, for example, declared:

> * * * the whole of these four articles of this amendment are simply carrying out the last section of the amendment of two years ago. Everyone of them arose out of the condition of things in reference to that amendment abolishing slavery.[29]

Most of the speakers expressed their understanding of the effect of the Amendment in terms of broad principles rather than with regard to specific applications. Thus, according to Senator Taylor, the first section met the "universal demand" "to destroy all legal caste within our borders";[30] Senator Bigham said that since the Negroes' response to the call to arms, "it has been only a question of time how soon all legal distinction will be wiped out".[31] Senator Landon stated the object of the first section to be "complete justice to the colored race,"[32] and defined this more specifically as follows:

> * * * You ask me: What do you want for the colored man? I reply, do you let the white rebel go to school? I claim that the colored man shall go to school; do you protect the white man before the law, you shall protect the colored man before the same law; do you punish a crime in a colored man, you shall punish the same in

---

[29] Id., p. XVI. Similiarly, M'Creary in the House, id., p. LXXI.

[30] Id., p. XXII.

[31] Id., p. XVII.

[32] Id., p. IX.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> a white man in the same way; and a virtue that will reward a white man shall be rewarded in the colored man.[33]

Mr. Jenks, opposing ratification, made the following statement in the House:

> By the first section it is intended to destroy every distinction founded upon a difference in the caste, nationality, race or color of persons who have been or may be born in and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, which has found its way into the laws of the Federal or State Governments which regulate the civil relations or rights of the people. No law shall be made or executed which does not secure equal civil rights to all. In all matters of civil legislation and administration there shall be perfect legal equality in the advantages and securities guaranteed by each State to every one here declared a citizen, without distinction of race or color, every one being equally entitled to demand from the States and State authorities full security in the enjoyment of such advantages and securities.[34]

Representative Rhoads, also in opposition, said that the effect of the Amendment would be to recognize the Negro "as the equal, politically and socially, of the white man." [35]

One of the principal objections raised against the Amendment was that it granted wide powers to Congress. Senator Wallace said:

> * * * negroes are citizens, and no State shall say they are not the equal of the white

---

[33] Ibid.

[34] Id., p. XLI.

[35] Id., p. LIV.

> man in every sense. Privilege means "everything that it is desirable to have." Immunity—"a privileged freedom from anything painful." By the one we obtain an actual good, by the other, the removal of an evil. When the power to enforce these privileges and immunities in favor of the negro is vested in Congress, is it possible to conceive of any of the dearest rights of which we are possessed, that Congress may not bestow upon him also? Equal protection of the law, and the rights of life, liberty and property, with the right to enforce them by appropriate legislation by Congress, gives the power to enact laws regulating and controlling the liberty or property of the citizen and providing for equal protection of the law. If this be the power granted, what further need have we of the State government? * * * [36]

According to Representative Jenks,

> By [the first section], in connection with the fifth section, the regulation of the civil relations of each State is placed under the control of the Federal Government, the States to be used simply as instruments to execute its will, and nearly their entire civil and criminal jurisdiction placed under the control of Congress.[37]

While the Fourteenth Amendment was being discussed in the House, the Senate had under consideration a bill prohibiting racial discrimina-

---

[36] Id., p. XIII.

[37] Id., p. XLI. Some members denied that section 1 gave Congress the power to confer suffrage upon the Negroes. See Senator Landon, id., p. IX; Representative Wright, id., p. LXXXIV.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

tion by railway companies.[38] The sponsor of the bill was Senator Lowry, who had supported the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in the Senate. He stated that the bill was "one of many rights which we must bestow upon [the Negroes]",[39] and,

> In all things we must give the colored man on this continent an equal chance with ourselves in his struggle for life and for immortality. If he fills our pulpits, our schoolhouses, our academies, our colleges and our Senate chambers, I bid him God speed.[40]

SCHOOLS

The Constitution of 1790 provided for the establishment of schools throughout the State, "in such manner that the poor may be taught gratis," and for the promotion of the arts and sciences "in one or more seminaries of learning." (Art. VII, Secs. 1, 2.) These clauses were incorporated in the Constitution of 1838 (Art. VII, Secs. 1, 2), in effect when Pennsylvania ratified the Fourteenth Amendment. The school laws of the early 1800's were designed for a system of pauper schools.[41] A general system of tax-supported public schools was initiated by the school law of 1834.[42]

---

[38] Pa. Leg. Rec., 1867 (Feb. 5), pp. 212 et seq.

[39] Pa. Leg. Rec., 1867, App., p. LXXXIV.

[40] Ibid.

[41] Wickersham, A History of Education in Pennsylvania (1886), pp. 282, et seq.

[42] Pa. Laws, 1833–34, No. 102. According to Wickersham, Thaddeus Stevens, then a member of the Pennsylvania legislature, in 1835 saved the law from repeal. Op. cit., pp. 332 et seq.

In his Report to the Legislature for the year 1866–1867, the Superintendent of Common Schools stated that > * * * Since 1834 our schools are open to all and free to all. * * *

>
> * * * * *
>
> In * * * other countries, sex, race, color is allowed to make a difference in educational privileges.
>
> A common school system recognizes no such unjust distinctions or discriminations in respect to education. The great principle that underlies such a system is, that since God made all minds capable of being educated, it is their right to be educated—to be educated to the highest degree practically attainable.[43]

The laws of Pennsylvania at that time provided for separate schools for colored children. The school law of 1854 [44] authorized and required the directors of the several districts > to establish, within their respective districts, separate schools for the tuition of negro and mulatto children, whenever such schools can be so located as to accommodate twenty or more pupils; and whenever such separate schools shall be established, and kept open four months in any year, the directors or controllers shall not be

---

[43] Report, p. XXXVII, Pa. Ex. Doc., 1867.

[44] Pa. Laws, 1854, No. 610, p. 617. In 1869, "An Act consolidating the wards of the city of Pittsburgh for educational purposes," Pa. Laws, 1869, No. 133, p. 150 (Feb. 12, 1869), provided for segregated schools. The clause in section 54 excluding colored persons was repealed in 1872. Pa. Laws, 1872, No. 999, p. 1048.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> compelled to admit such pupils into any other school of the district: Provided, That in cities or boroughs, the board of controllers shall provide for such schools out of the general funds assessed and collected by uniform taxation for educational purposes (sec. 24).

Commenting on this provision, J. P. Wickersham, Superintendent of Common Schools from 1866 to 1881, said that

> * * * Previously, such [colored] children were received into any public school at which they presented themselves; but the prevailing prejudice against them was so great that many preferred rather to remain away from school altogether than to face it. The provision for separate schools was practically a boon to the colored people, although it probably grew out of an indisposition to permit their children to attend school with white children.[45]

In 1870 the Superintendent published the following rulings concerning the rights of colored children under section 24 of the school law of 1854:

> No. 180. The twenty colored children necessary to constitute a school of this class are to reside within reasonable distance of the proposed point. If that number, or even more, are scattered over the whole district but so far from each other that twenty cannot attend the same school, the school is not to be established.
>
> No. 181. If the requisite number (20) cannot be collected into one school, there [45] Op. cit., p. 506.

> is no provision in the law which excludes them from the white schools.
>
> No. 182. Colored schools are to have the same duration of instruction as the white schools, and are not to be closed in all cases at the end of 4 months.[46]

Ruling No. 181 was upheld by the Court of Common Pleas for Luzerne County in 1873, in Commonwealth ex rel. Brown v. Williamson, 10 Phila. 490. The court held that where there were less than 20 colored children in a district they must be admitted to the same public school as the whites. The court was of the opinion that the Fourteenth Amendment had no bearing on the case:

> In the case before us, we fail to discover that any great constitutional question is involved, or that any right of the relator, or his children, growing out of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, or under the civil rights bill, has been challenged, invaded, or denied (p. 492).

In 1881, in Commonwealth ex rel. Allen v. Davis, 10 Weekly Notes of Cases 156, the Court of Common Pleas of Crawford County held that the provision for separate schools (section 24 of the school law of 1854) violated the Fourteenth Amendment, and also that it was "virtually under the prohibition of the XIIIth Amendment," since it made a distinction which put a "badge of servitude" on the Negroes and involved "the very personification of caste" (p. 160).

---

[46] The Common School Laws of Pennsylvania and Decisions of the Superintendent (1870).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

One month later, a law was enacted "to abolish all distinction of race or color in the public schools." [47]

Section 2 of that law expressly repealed section 24 of the school law of 1854.

In the Senate, the sponsor of the bill said that

> In proposing the repeal of the act of 1854, which, in terms would be prohibited by the present State or Federal Constitutions, it seems a matter of surprise that an act so directly in conflict with the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States should have been permitted to have remained on the statute book until this time. * * * It is to the discredit of the United States and of Pennsylvania that any discrimination on account of color should have existed in our statutes * * *.
>
> It is the right and heritage of all of our citizens, that their children shall participate in [the school law's] benefits without restriction. To uphold or permit a color line of distinction is not only unjust in itself, but in conflict with the plain provisions of the Constitution.[48]

He then stated that Acting School Commissioner Lindsey in 1872 had declared the provision for separate schools inoperative,[49] and continued:

> I have placed this enactment upon the ground of right, and as required by the provisions of the fundamental law.
>
> * * * * *

---

[47] Pa. Laws, 1881, No. 83, p. 76.

[48] Pa. Leg. Rec., 1881, p. 1943.

[49] This ruling is not incorporated in the various editions of The Common School Laws of Pennsylvania and Decisions of the Superintendent.

> I am happy to believe that, on the part of many, it has been more from inattention than design that this statute has been left unrepealed, and that, with the majority of law makers, a mere suggestion of its existence will be sufficient to induce its repeal.[50]

The Senate voted unanimously for the bill.[51] Mr. Landis, its sponsor in the House, stated that the measure was required by the Fifteenth Amendment.[52] In Kaine v. The Commonwealth, 101 Pa. St. 490 (1882), the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that under this statute any assignment of pupils to schools on the basis of color was unlawful.

The question of school segregation was discussed shortly after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in connection with the establishment of homes for soldiers' orphans. The Senate, in March, 1867, passed a bill which provided for separate school and homes for the orphans of colored soldiers, > subject to the same regulations and restrictions provided in relation to the education and maintenance of the orphans of our white soldiers and sailors.[53]

In the House, Representative M'Creary proposed an amendment eliminating segregation and authorizing the admission of Negro children to any such home. He stated that his amendment was justified by reasons of justice and equality; that

---

[50] Pa. Leg. Rec., 1881, p. 1943.
[51] Id., pp. 1943–44.
[52] Id., p. 2190.
[53] Pa. Leg. Rec., 1867, pp. 598–9.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

if the homes were segregated many colored children could not be taken care of because their number in some areas did not warrant separate homes. He also stated that the same discrimination existed in regard to the public schools.[53a] His proposal met with opposition. One member said that

> We are bound to respect the rights of the negro race, so far as liberty, and property, and educating them is concerned * * *

but he owed it to his constituents to protest against this proposal.[54] Representative Meyers pointed out that

> * * * The Republican members of the Senate seemed to think that sufficient justice would be done to the orphans of colored soldiers by giving them the means of being educated in separate schools. Why should we not be satisfied with the action of the Senate and the committee, on this matter? [55]

Mr. M'Creary withdrew his amendment.[56] Throughout the debate on this and other proposed amendments to the segregation clause there was no reference to the Fourteenth Amendment.

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

Article III, Section 1 of the 1838 Constitution restricted the franchise to white males, and continued in force until the Fifteenth Amendment was adopted.[57] Prior to 1867, juries were se-

---

[53a] Id., App., p. CCCXLII.
[54] Id., pp. CCCXLIV–CCCXLV.
[55] Id., p. CCCXLV.
[56] Id., p. CCCXLVI.
[57] Pa. Laws 1870, No. 33, sec. 10 (April 6).

lected from "taxable citizens,"[58] but in April of that year, when the jury law was revised, the qualifications were narrowed to "electors."[59] In 1865, the Legislature had rejected a proposal "to extend to all American citizens of African descent, and all persons of color, the same privileges as are now extended to white citizens in attending places of public amusement, worship, and meeting * * *,"[60] and also a bill to prohibit racial discrimination by the railways of the commonwealth.[61] In 1867, shortly after it had ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, the Legislature adopted a bill forbidding racial segregation by railroad companies,[62] having rejected an amendment to permit separate cars.[63] The opposition argued that the bill meant "social equality,"[64] while its supporters stated that "social equality" differed from > a man's natural, civil and political rights to life, liberty and property, and equal suffrage with which to protect them.[65]

An amendment incorporating the provisions of the proposed 1865 bill prohibiting racial discrimination in places of public amusement and worship was defeated.[66]

---

[58] Purdon's Digest, 9th ed., 1700–1861, p. 580, sec. 8.
[59] Pa. Laws, 1867, No. 41, sec. 2.
[60] Pa. Leg. Rec., 1865, p. 146.
[61] Id., p. 712.
[62] Pa. Laws, 1867, No. 21.
[63] Pa. Leg. Rec., 1867, p. 214.
[64] Id., p. 217.
[65] Id., App., p. CVI.
[66] Id., pp. 585–6.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

RHODE ISLAND

RATIFICATION

Rhode Island ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on February 12, 1867,[67] by a vote of 26 to 2 in the Senate, and 60 to 9 in the House.[68]

SCHOOLS

Prior to 1866, the Rhode Island statutes provided that

> No person shall be excluded from any public school, in the district to which such person belongs, if the town is divided into districts, or if not so divided, from the nearest public school, on account of being over fifteen years of age, nor except by force of some general regulation applicable to all persons under the same circumstances, and in no case on account of the inability of himself, his parents, guardian or employer, to pay any rate bill, tax or assessment whatever.[69]

There existed two separate schools for colored children in Providence. These had been established in the 1830's, but by 1865 they were described as presenting a "vexed question", which had engaged the attention of the city's School Committee for many years.[70] At the end of 1866

---

[67] Acts and Resolves, 1867, p. 161. There are no printed journals of the Rhode Island legislature for this time. The original journal references are 25 Senate Journal, 1865–68, and 41 House Journal, 1866–69, February 7, 1867.

[68] McPherson, Reconstruction (1871), p. 194.

[69] Rhode Island, Rev. Stats., 1857, Tit. XIII, C. 71, Sec. 1.

[70] 21st Annual Report on Public Schools, App., pp. 4–5. R. I. Doc., 1866, App. No. 3.

281209—53——23

it was reported that the legislature had abolished "caste schools" in accordance with the "rapidly changing sentiment of the people in regard both to slavery and the colored race."[71] On March 7, 1866, a law had been enacted providing that

> In deciding upon applications for admission to any school in this State, maintained wholly or in part at the public expense, no distinction shall be made on account of the race or color of the applicant.[72]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The first constitution of the state, adopted in 1842, conferred suffrage upon all male citizens.[73] Eligibility for jury duty depended basically upon the right to vote.[74] There was no discrimination against the Negro as a witness.

Marriage between whites and Negroes was prohibited until 1881.[75]

SOUTH CAROLINA

The South Carolina legislature convened under the Reconstruction Constitution ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in July 1868, reversing the state's earlier rejection of December 1866. The same constitution, adopted in 1868, provided for

---

[71] 22d Annual Report on Public Schools, App., p. 7, R. I. Doc., 1867.

[72] Rhode Island, Acts and Resolves, Jan. 1866, C. 609, Sec. 1.

[73] Rhode Island Constitution, 1842, Art. II, Sec. 1.

[74] Rhode Island, Rev. Stats., 1857, Tit. XXV, C. 172, Sec. 1.

[75] Rhode Island, Rev. Stats., 1857, Tit. XX, C. 134, Sec. 6, repealed, Public Laws, Jan. 1881, C. 846.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

a system of public schools and declared that all schools "supported in whole or in part by the public funds, shall be free and open to all the children and youths of the State, without regard to race or color." Two governors of the state in 1868 interpreted this as permitting separate schools. Although the implementing legislation was silent on this specific question, it did provide for an enumeration of children classified according to race and sex. Two colleges in the state were opened to Negroes. In 1895, the state constitution was amended to provide expressly for racially segregated schools.

RATIFICATION

South Carolina rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in December, 1866. Among the arguments given by Governor Orr in his message transmitting the amendment to the Legislature and recommending its rejection were the following:

> Do not its first and last sections, if adopted, confer upon Congress the absolute right of determining who shall be citizens of the respective States, and who shall exercise and enjoy any and all of the rights, privileges and immunities of citizenship? * * * With this amendment incorporated in the Constitution, does not the Federal Government cease to be one of "limited powers" in all of the essential qualities which constitute such a form of Government? Nay, more; does not its adoption reverse the well-approved doctrine, that the United States shall exercise no powers, unless expressly delegated by the Constitution?[76]

[76] House Journal, 1866, p. 34.

The Committee on Federal Relations recommended rejection; its report contained no discussion or reasons for the recommendation.[77] Both Houses concurred.[78]

The Legislature convened under the Reconstruction Constitution ratified the amendment in July, 1868, without debate.[79]

SCHOOLS

In South Carolina there had been since 1834 a system of public schools supported by state appropriations, intended for the poor but open to the children of every "citizen."[80] Except in Charleston, however, appropriations were inadequate, and private education was the rule for children of those who could afford it. The public schools were open only to whites. After 1834, it was forbidden to teach slaves to read or write, and free persons of color were forbidden to maintain schools for either slaves or freedmen.[81]

During the early Reconstruction period schools for Negroes were established by philanthropic organizations, and in Charleston the public schools were reopened, with separate rooms for white and colored.[82]

---

[77] South Carolina Reports and Resolutions, 1866, p. 220.

[78] House Journal, 1866, p. 284; Senate Journal, 1866, p. 230.

[79] Senate Journal, 1868, p. 12; House Journal, 1868, p. 50.

[80] Teaching slaves to read was prohibited. South Carolina Laws, 1834, ch. 5, sec. 1.

[81] Knight, Public Education in the South (1922), pp. 215–228.

[82] Special Report of the Commissioner of Education, p. 385, House Exec. Docs., 41st Cong., 2d Sess., vol. 13, No. 315.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Constitution of 1868 contained the following provisions:

ARTICLE X

SEC. 3. The general assembly shall, as soon as practicable after the adoption of this constitution, provide for a liberal and uniform system of free public schools throughout the State, and shall also make provision for the division of the State into suitable school districts. There shall be kept open, at least six months in each year, one or more schools in each school district.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the general assembly to provide for the compulsory attendance, at either public or private schools, of all children between the ages of six and sixteen years, not physically or mentally disabled, for a term equivalent to twenty-four months, at least: Provided, That no law to that effect shall be passed until a system of public schools has been thoroughly and completely organized, and facilities afforded to all the inhabitants of the State for the free education of their children.

SEC. 10. All the public schools, colleges, and universities of this State, supported in whole or in part by the public funds, shall be free and open to all the children and youths of the State, without regard to race or color.

In his message to the Constitutional Convention of 1868, Governor Orr had urged that provision be made for education of the colored people, but did not refer to the question of mixed schools:

> Education is now the great desideratum of all the colored people of South Carolina.

> For obvious reasons it was the policy of the State, previous to emancipation, to exclude the slave population from the benefits and advantages of education. I will not discuss these reasons. But the relations of that population to the State are now materially changed. Hence it is of the utmost importance that the largest intelligence possible shall be communicated to that class. Men of intelligence have many more opportunities, through their reading and observation, of learning and appreciating the moral law and its requirements. Profound ignorance, almost universally couples with it crime and vice. Hence, the education of the black population—and, I am sorry to say, of many of the white population of the State—should command the earnest attention of this body.[83]

The Committee on Education had before it proposals for mixed schools,[84] and also a proposal stating merely that "* * * no discrimination * * * be made in favor of any class of persons."[85] The Committee reported a proposed article on education containing the above provisions in substantially the same form as finally adopted.[86] The article on education was debated fully,[87] with a later debate on the question of mixed schools.[88]

In the extensive debate on the requirement of compulsory education, the question of separate

---

[83] Convention Proceedings, p. 51.
[84] Id., pp. 71, 100.
[85] Id., p. 88.
[86] Id., pp. 265–6.
[87] Id., pp. 685–709.
[88] Id., pp. 889–94, 899–901.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

or mixed schools was raised. Mr. A. C. Richmond stated:

> * * * If the word "compulsory" remains, it will be impossible to enforce the law for sometime to come. We say the public schools shall be opened to all. Every school district will have its school houses and its teachers. There is to be a particular school fund, school districts, and school houses. * * * There must be schools to which colored children can go; but we wish to look into the propriety of compelling parents to send their children to school. I believe the efforts of the teachers, preachers, and all those interested in the welfare of the State, and the efforts of all those interested in the welfare of the colored people, will bring out nearly all the colored children. I believe nearly all the colored children of the State will go to school. We have societies that will help to furnish the books; we have preachers who are much interested; we have missionaries, all of whom are interested in this class of our people, and who will see to it that the colored children are educated, so that settles that point. The next point is, how are the white children going to school? By means of moral suasion nearly all the colored children will be brought to school; and by means of white schools, nearly all the white children will go to school and be educated. It will regulate itself. The word "compulsory" is used to compel the attendance of children in one or the other class of schools.[89]

In support of the Committee's recommendation, a member pointed out that

[89] Id., pp. 690–1.

> If anyone chooses to educate their children in a private school, this law does not debar them from that privilege.[90]

Mr. F. L. Cardozo, of the Committee on Education, stated in support of the proposal that > Before I proceed to discuss the question, I want to divest it of all false issues, of the imaginary consequences that some gentlemen have illogically thought will result from the adoption of this section with the word compulsory. They affirm that it compels the attendance of both white and colored children in the same schools. There is nothing of the kind, and no such construction can be legitimately placed upon it. It simply says all the children shall be educated; but how is left with the parents to decide. It is left to the parent to say whether the child shall be sent to a public or private school. The eleventh section has been referred to as bearing upon this section. I will ask attention to this fact. The eleventh section does not say, nor does the report in any part say there shall not be separate schools. There can be separate schools for white and colored. It is simply left so that if any colored child wishes to go to a white school, it shall have the privilege to do so. I have no doubt, in most localities, colored people would prefer separate schools, particularly until some of the present prejudice against their race is removed.

>
> We have not provided that there shall be separate schools; but I do not consider these issues as properly belonging to the question. * * *[91]

---

[90] Id., p. 694.

[91] Id., p. 706.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The later debate on the provision for mixed schools included Mr. Duncan's objection that the provision would impede the education of the poor whites:

> * * * Now, what is likely to be the result of retaining this section, and thereby opening the public schools to all? Simply, that they would be attended only by the colored children. If the attempt is made to enforce a mixture in this way, I have no idea that fifty white children in the State would attend the public schools. The freedmen's schools are now, if I mistake not, open to all; and yet I believe not one white pupil in the State attends them. The result would be exactly the same with our public schools. This is a state of affairs that we should certainly desire to avoid. In the first place, the poor white children would be deprived of any chance of education. They would continue ignorant and degraded and prejudiced. The whites who have means would send their children to private schools, but the poor whites would be as heretofore, unable to do so. * * *
>
> * * * Certainly, if we look at the condition of the country, we will see the necessity of adopting such measures as will secure the education of the white people as well as of the colored. It is estimated that from twenty to thirty per cent of the grown up white men of South Carolina are unable to read or write.[92]

Mr. Wright construed the section as permitting separate schools:

> * * * The gentleman who last resumed his seat has referred to the impropriety of

[92] Id., pp. 890–893.

> allowing the children of the two races to attend school together. If I read the section aright, it contemplates no such thing. It simply says, "all schools, colleges, etc., supported by public funds, shall be open to all classes, without regard to race, color or previous condition." * * * This provision leaves it so that white and colored children can attend school together, if they desire to do so; but I do not believe that colored children will want to go to the white schools, or vice versa. I think there will be separate schools established, and there is no clause in our Constitution that prevents it; therefore I hope this clause will be adopted exactly as it is. * * * [93]

The final argument was made by Mr. Cardozo:

> I think the opinion of the members is so fully established on this subject, that elaborate argument is unnecessary. I shall briefly notice some of the points made by the gentleman from Newberry (Mr. B. O. DUNCAN.)
>
> His first point is, that this provision runs counter to the prejudices of the people. To my mind, it is inconsistent that such an argument should come from a member of the Convention, or from one who favored the reconstruction scheme of Congress. The whole measure of reconstruction is antagonistic to the wishes of the people of the State, and this section is a legitimate portion of that scheme. It secures to every man in this State full political and civil equality, and I hope members will not commit so suicidal an act as to oppose the adoption of this section.

---

[93] Id., pp. 893–894.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The gentleman from Newberry said he was afraid we were taking a wrong course to remove these prejudices. The most natural method to effect this object would be to allow children; when five or six years of age, to mingle in schools together, and associate generally. Under such training, prejudice must eventually die out; but if we postpone it until they become men and women, prejudice will be so established that no mortal can obliterate it. This, I think, is a sufficient reply to the argument of the gentleman under this head.

We have carefully provided in our report that every one shall be allowed to attend a free school. We have not said there shall be no separate schools. On the contrary, there may be separate schools, and I have no doubt there will be such in most of the districts. In Charleston, I am sure such will be the case. The colored pupils in my school would not like to go to a white school. Without flattery, I think I may say I have not seen as good a public school in Charleston as my own. We have as able a corps of teachers as any in the country. They have come from the North, adopted teaching as their profession, and they will not, in point of efficiency, yield to any teachers in the State.

In sparsely settled country districts, where perhaps there are not more than twenty-five or thirty children, separate schools may be established; but for ten or fifteen white children to demand such a separation, would be absurd; and I hope the Convention will give its assent to no such proposition.[94]

---

[94] Id., pp. 900–901.

Mr. Cardozo's remark that "this section is a legitimate portion of" the reconstruction scheme is the only specific reference to the reconstruction acts in the debates on education. Throughout the Convention, however, references were made to the fact that "* * * We are to frame a Constitution in accordance with the reconstruction acts under which we are operating" and to the requirement that the Fourteenth Amendment be ratified.[95] Almost the next order of business after Mr. Cardozo's remarks was the adoption of an ordinance directing the legislature to be elected under the new constitution to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment.[96]

The provision in the South Carolina constitution was construed by Governor Orr in his message to the Legislature on July 7, 1868, as permitting separate schools.[97] His successor, Governor Scott, on July 10, 1868, also recommended the establishment of separate schools. He did not refer specifically to constitutional provisions, but stated that

> While the moralist and the philanthropist cheerfully recognizes the fact that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men," yet the statesman, in legislating for a political society that embraces two distinct, and, in some measure, antagonistic races, in the great body of its electors, must, as far as the law of equal rights will permit, take cognizance of existing prejudices among both.[98]

---

[95] Id., pp. 561, 218, 513, 833.
[96] Id., pp. 904–6.
[97] House Journal, 1868, p. 44.
[98] Id., p. 62.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The 1870 legislation to provide for schools did not specify either separate or mixed schools,[99] although it did provide for an enumeration of the children in each school district, classified as male and female, white and colored (sec. 38).

"An Act to Incorporate the Claflin University" of December 18, 1869,[1] prohibited discrimination:

> SEC. 5. No instructor in said University shall ever be required by the Trustees to have any particular complexion or to profess any particular religious opinions as a test of office, and no student shall be refused admission to, or denied any of the privileges, honors, or degrees of, said University on account of race, complexion or religious opinions which he may entertain: Provided, nevertheless, That this Section, in reference only to religious opinions shall not apply to the theological department of said University.

South Carolina College was opened to Negroes at this time.[2]

In 1895 the Constitution was amended to require segregated schools. Act. XI (7).

TENNESSEE

Tennessee ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in July 1866 over opposition which feared the measure would give Negroes the right to vote, hold office, sit upon juries and intermarry with whites, and "obliterat[e] all distinctions in regard to races * * *." A year later the Legislature

---

[99] South Carolina Acts, 1870, No. 238, p. 339.

[1] South Carolina Acts, 1869–70, No. 193.

[2] Knight, op. cit., p. 373.

established a common school system reserved to whites, while making provision for Negro education only "as far as practicable." In 1869 separate schools were formally established. Two months before ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment, the Legislature had "defined" the rights of Negroes, repealing in large part the "Black Code," but retaining the right to exclude Negroes from juries and to maintain separate schools. The Negro was enfranchised in 1870, shortly before the Fifteenth Amendment became effective.

RATIFICATION

A special session was called to consider the Fourteenth Amendment. Governor Brownlow, in his Proclamation of June 19, 1866,[3] stated that the Amendment established > equal protection of all citizens in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property.

His message to the Legislature on July 6, 1866,[4] summarized the first section of the Amendment in these terms:

> By the first section, equal protection in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property, is guaranteed to all citizens. Practically, this affects mainly the negro, who having been emancipated by the rebellion, and having lost that protection which the interest of the master gave him, became by the very laws of nature, entitled to the civil rights of the citizen, and to the means of enforcing those rights.

---

[3] Sen. J., Called Session, 1866, p. 4.

[4] Id., p. 8.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> To deny this to him, would be to place his life, property and labor in the power of every unfriendly local authority, or evil disposed person, and would be an instance of barbarism unworthy of the age. It will also prevent unjust and oppressive discrimination by one State against the citizens of other States.

Representative Leftwich, a Tennessee member of Congress, in an open letter to the Legislature in opposition to the Amendment dated June 26, 1866,[5] stated as follows on the subject of equality:

> We have done very much for the negro in giving him freedom, and all the civil rights necessary to its full enjoyment. We do not object to seeing him, if he is able, come up to perfect equality with our race, but we will not consent to lowering our race to an equality with him.

In the Senate, a proposal to submit the matter of ratification to the people was defeated.[6] The Senate also voted against an amendment to the resolution proposing ratification. This amendment read as follows:

> Provided, that the foregoing proposed amendments * * * shall not be so construed as to confer the right of suffrage upon a negro, or person of color, or to confer upon such negro or person of color the right to hold office, sit upon juries, or to intermarry with white persons; nor shall said proposed amendments be so construed as to prohibit any State from enacting and enforcing

---

[5] MacPherson's Scrap Book, Fourteenth Amendment, p. 16.

[6] Sen. J., Called Session, 1866, p. 18.

> such laws as will secure these ends, not inconsistent with the present Constitution of the United States, nor * * * to abridge the reserved rights of the States in the election and qualification of their own officers, and the management of their domestic concerns, as provided and secured by the present Constitution of the United States.[7]

The Senate voted for ratification on July 11, 1866.[7a]

For a while no quorum could be obtained in the House, because several members absented themselves. Finally, two members were apprehended, brought to the Legislature and counted as present. The ratifying resolution was passed on July 19, 1866.[8] Representative Jarvis filed a protest in which he stated that the Amendment "obliterates all distinctions in regard to races."[8a]

SCHOOLS

Legislation enacted in 1867[9] established a common school system for white children and provided for special schools for colored children "as far as practicable," i. e., when their number in a district exceeded twenty-five; if their number was below fifteen, the money raised based upon their number was to be used for educating them in a manner to be determined by the board of education.

---

[7] Id., p. 23.

[7a] Id., p. 24.

[8] House J., Called Session, 1866, pp. 23–25; McPherson's Scrap Book, Fourteenth Amendment, pp. 18–19.

[8a] House J., Called Session, 1866, pp. 37–38.

[9] Tenn. Laws, 1867, Chapter XXVII.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The school law was revised in 1869 to provide as follows:

> SECTION 4. That the schools for white children and for colored children shall be kept separate and apart from each other and the School Commissioners from each district will observe strictly this requirement.
>
> SECTION 6. That the taxes levied and collected by the respective counties under the provisions of this Act shall not be used for any other purposes than that of education, and shall be denominated the Common School Fund for said county; provided the school fund raised by each county shall be equally distributed pro rata among the white and colored scholastic population of the county.[10]

The Constitution of Tennessee, adopted in 1870, prohibited white and colored children from attending the same public school (Article 11, section 12). The same prohibition was written into section 30, Chapter 25 of the Public Acts of 1873.

In his Annual Report for the school year 1873–74 the State Superintendent of Public Instruction discussed the question of segregated schools in connection with the supplemental Civil Rights Bill then pending before Congress.[11] He declared that without the provision for separate schools for colored children no system of public schools would have been adopted and that if segregation were prohibited, the entire system would be destroyed.

---

[10] Tenn. Laws, 1869–1870, Chapter XXXIII.

[11] Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction, 1873–74, pp. 25–30, II Sen. J., 1875, App.

In May, 1866, two months before the Tennessee legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, it had enacted a measure to define the rights of "persons of color."[12] These included the rights > to make and enforce contracts, to sue and be sued, to be parties and give evidence, to inherit, and to have full and equal benefits of all laws and proceedings for the security of the person and estate, and [they] shall not be subject to any other or different punishment, pains or penalty, for the commission of any act or offense, than such as are prescribed for white persons * * *.

Negroes who were blind, deaf, dumb, lunatics, paupers, or apprentices were given "full and perfect benefit and application of all laws regulating and providing for white persons" in the same condition. It was expressly declared, however, that the statute was not to be construed as allowing Negroes to serve on juries, or requiring their education in the same schools with whites. The Act repealed all prior inconsistent legislation.

The Constitution of 1870, adopted shortly before the Fifteenth Amendment was declared in force, gave the Negro the right to vote.[13] Also included in the Constitution was a prohibition of intermarriage between whites and Negroes.[14]

TEXAS

The Texas legislature rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in October 1866, in part because it

---

[12] Tenn. Laws, 1865–66, c. XL.

[13] Art. IV, sec. 1. The former constitution, adopted in 1835, had restricted suffrage to whites. Art. IV, sec. 1.

[14] Art. XI, sec. 14.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

was thought to give Congress the power to "declare almost any right or franchise whatever, to be the privilege or immunity of a citizen of the United States * * *." In February 1870 the Amendment was ratified without debate. Although the Constitution of 1866 contemplated a separate system of schools for Negroes, no provision for Negro education was then made. The Constitution of 1870 was silent on segregation; legislation in 1870 and 1871 indirectly authorized separate schools, and in 1873 such schools were made mandatory.

RATIFICATION

The 1866 legislature refused to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment, in part because of its disfranchisement of those engaged in rebellion and also because it was thought to grant Congress the power to give to the freedmen rights which the legislature believed they should not have. In the House, the report of the Committee on Federal Relations, recommending rejection, stated in part

> The first section proposes to deprive the States of the right which they have possessed since the revolution of 1776 to determine what shall constitute citizenship of a State, and to transfer that right to the Federal Government. Its object is, provided the section shall become a part of the Constitution, under the color of a generality, to declare negroes to be citizens of the United States, and therefore, citizens of the several States, and as such entitled to all "the privileges and immunities" of white citizens; in these privileges would be embraced the exercise of suffrage at the polls, > participation in jury duty in all cases, bearing arms in the militia, and other matters which need not be here enumerated. It is unnecessary to appeal to the fact that in most of the original free States, negroes have been by law, and in all of them by immemorial usage, excluded from these "privileges and immunities," now sought to be forced on the Southern States, to show that the amendment proposed in this section contemplates and intends a violation not only of justice, but of the common instincts of our nature. * * *.

>
> There is scarcely any limit to the power sought to be transferred by this section from the States to the United States. Congress might declare almost any right or franchise whatever, to be the privilege or immunity of a citizen of the United States and it would immediately attach to every citizen of every State, whether white man or descendant of African. To estimate the comprehensive scope of the power herein sought for Congress—that body might declare miscegenation a privilege or immunity. * * *[15]

The Amendment was rejected on October 13, 1866, by a vote of 70 to 5.[16]

The report of the Senate Committee on Federal Relations was similar.[17] The Amendment was rejected by the Senate on October 27, 1866, by a vote of 27 to 1.[18]

After the adoption of the Constitution of 1870, the first legislature elected thereunder ratified

---

[15] House Journal, 1866, p. 578.

[16] Id., p. 584.

[17] Senate Journal, 1866, pp. 417–423.

[18] Id., p. 471.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the Fourteenth Amendment at a provisional session in February 1870, without discussion.[19]

SCHOOLS

In Texas there had been no occasion to consider public education for Negroes prior to 1865. There had been constitutional and statutory provision for public education, but those had not in practice led to an effective system of free public education even for white children.[20] The first Constitution, in 1836, recognized the obligation of the government for education, providing in Section 5 that

> It shall be the duty of congress, as soon as circumstances will permit, to provide by law a general system of education.

The 1845 Constitution was more detailed:

ARTICLE X

> Sec. 1. A general diffusion of knowledge being essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, it shall be the duty of the legislature of this State to make suitable provision for the support and maintenance of public schools.
>
> Sec. 2. The legislature shall, as early as practicable, establish free schools throughout the State, and shall furnish means for their support by taxation on property * * *.

By a statute enacted in 1854 there was set aside a fund of $2,000,000 United States 5% bonds,

---

[19] Senate Journal, Prov. Sess., Feb., 1870, p. 29; House Journal, Prov. Sess., Feb., 1870, p. 33.

[20] See Knight, Public Education in the South (1922), p. 261.

the interest of which was to be allotted to counties on the basis of the "free white population" between the ages of six and sixteen years in each county, for the payment of teachers only.[21] By 1860 there were 1,218 public schools in the State, not free, but with the patrons paying tuition.[22] During the War the school fund was dissipated.[23]

The Constitution of 1866 provided that the public-school fund be set aside for the education of the "white scholastic" population, and contemplated a separate system for "Africans" to be supported from taxes on them.[24] In fact, the legislature of 1866 made no provision for education of Negroes. The act authorizing the sale of public school lands belonging to counties specified that the interest on the proceeds be applied to "payment of the tuition of all the white scholastic population" in the county.[25] Allotments from the public school fund were to be on the basis of "the free white population."[26] Another "Act to provide for the education of the indigent white children" by payment of tuition provided that Africans or descendents of Africans and their property were exempted from local taxation for the purpose of this act.[26a] The few schools for Negroes were under the supervision of the Freedmen's Bureau.[27]

[21] Texas Laws, Fifth Legislature, 1853–54, c. 18, p. 17.

[22] Knight, op. cit., pp. 258–61.

[23] Superintendent's Report, Convention Journal I, p. 65.

[24] Art. X, secs. 1, 2, 7.

[25] Laws of Texas, 1866, ch. 79, p. 74.

[26] Laws of Texas, 1866, ch. 146, p. 170.

[26a] Laws of Texas, 1866, c. 154, p. 195.

[27] Special Report of the Commissioner of Education (1871), p. 390, House Exec. Docs., 41st Cong., 2d Sess., vol. 13, No. 315.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Constitutional Convention which was elected pursuant to the Reconstruction Act of 1867 was advised by the Governor that

> It is not my province to make recommendations for your action; but I trust that it will not be considered improper for me to suggest that, in the constitution you are about to form, it is expected—
>
> That you will declare that the pretended act of secession and all laws that have been enacted in aid of the late rebellion, or repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, are and were null and void from their inception; and that you will at once repeal all laws that make any discrimination against persons on account of their color, race or previous condition;
>
> * * * * *
>
> That you will secure equal civil and political rights to every inhabitant of the State who has not forfeited these rights by participation in the late rebellion, or by conviction for crime;
>
> * * * * *
>
> That you will make a liberal provision, by taxation upon property, for the immediate establishment of Free Public Schools for the education of every child in the State; * * *.[28]
>
> * * * * *

Insofar as education is concerned, the Convention had before it a report of the Superintendent of Public Schools outlining the history and status of education in the State and recommending a reservation of public lands solely for school purposes, a constitutional provision to protect the [28] Constitutional Convention Journal, I, pp. 14–15.

school fund, and additional state control over the educational system:

> Thus, while the paramount law ordains that there must be a system of free primary schools, open to the entire youth of the State, it may properly refer to the Legislature the settlement of the details thereof; the construction of buildings, the salary of teachers, the method of instruction, the question of separate or mixed schools, the plan of supervision, and the whole apparatus of the law.[29]

The Constitution, as adopted, contained the following provisions, recommended by the Convention's Committee on Education:

ARTICLE IX

> Section 1. It shall be the duty of the legislature of this State to make suitable provision for the support and maintenance of a system of public free schools, for the gratuitous instruction of all the inhabitants of this State between the ages of six and eighteen years.
>
> * * * * *
>
> Sec. 4. The legislature shall establish a uniform system of public free schools throughout the State.
>
> Sec. 5. The legislature, at its first session, (or as soon thereafter as may be possible,) shall pass such laws as will require the attendance on the public free schools of the State of all the scholastic population thereof, for the period of at least four months of each and every year:

[29] Id., I, p. 71.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Provided, That when any of the scholastic inhabitants may be shown to have received regular instruction, for said period of time in each and every year, from any private teacher having a proper certificate of competency, this shall exempt them from the operation of the laws contemplated by this section.

* * * * *

Sec. 9. The legislature shall at its first session (and from time to time thereafter, as may be found necessary), provide all needful rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this article. It is made the imperative duty of the legislature to see to it that all the children in the State, within the scholastic age, are, without delay, provided with ample means of education. The legislature shall annually appropriate for school purposes, and to be equally distributed among all the scholastic population of the State, the interest accruing on the school-fund, and the income derived from taxation for school purposes; * * *

The original Report of the Committee on Education, consisting of a proposed constitutional provision, contained no reference to separate or mixed schools.[30] An amendment to the report to require separation was tabled by a vote of 36 to 30.[31] Another, by Mr. Schuetze of the Committee on Education, was adopted by a vote of 48 to 12.[32] A proposed proviso to permit mixed schools where separate schools were not established was tabled [30] Id., I, pp. 609–14.

[31] Id., I, p. 896.
[32] Id., I, p. 898.

by a vote of 40 to 20.[33] Proposals to specify that separation be discretionary were tabled by votes of 38 to 22 [34] and 38 to 27,[35] and the Schuetze amendment again approved, 52 to 14.[36] The proposed article was subsequently recommitted to the Committee on Education.[37] That Committee reported back that it would not change its original report, which contained no reference to separation.[38] The article was adopted as originally reported.[39]

Governor Davis in his message of April 29, 1870, recommended some provision for education, but made no reference to Negroes or to the Amendment:

> Next in importance to the measures necessary to the establishment of law and order, you will find the question of providing for the education of the children of the State. No better civilizer has been found than a liberal system of education * * *
>
> * * * there is a special necessity for education in our country where the government depends upon the people themselves. The success of Republican institutions and universal suffrage is assured by universal education.[40]

The legislature on August 13, 1870, enacted a law concerning public schools which made no direct

---

[33] Ibid.
[34] Ibid.
[35] Id., I, p. 912.
[36] Ibid.
[37] Id., II, p. 146.
[38] Id., II, p. 229.
[39] Id., II, pp. 417–21.
[40] Senate Journal, April 1870, p. 16.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

reference to the question of separate schools. Among other matters, it provided that the County Court should act as a board of school directors and that "they may make any separation of the students or school necessary to insure success, so as not to deprive any student or students of scholastic benefits, except for such misconduct as demands expulsion." [41]

The Act of 1871 was similarly indirect, in providing that > * * * the Board of Education for this State shall prescribe no rule or regulation that will prevent the directors of the school districts from making any separation of the students that the peace and success of the school and the good of the whole may require.[42]

In 1873 the trustees were directed to prepare separate lists of white and colored children, and to separate "the children" and so arrange "the schools and school houses that good order, peace and harmony may be maintained in the schools." [43]

The Constitution of 1876 specified that

> Separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored children, and impartial provision shall be made for both. (Article VII, Sec. 7)

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The failure to provide education prior to 1870 was a part of the general treatment of freed-

[41] Texas Laws, 1870, ch. 68, p. 113.
[42] Texas Laws, 1871, ch. 54, sec. 3, p. 58.
[43] Texas Laws, 1873, ch. 63, pp. 84, 90.

men as a separate class."[44] An 1866 act concerning "persons heretofore known as slaves, and free persons of color" gave them the rights to contract, sue, inherit, buy and sell property, and to "have and enjoy the rights of personal security, liberty, and private property." However, they could not marry whites, serve on juries, hold office, vote, and, except in limited instances, testify in court.[45] Another statute enacted the same year provided that > every Railroad Company heretofore incorporated or which may hereafter be incorporated, by the Legislature of this State, shall be required to attach to each passen-

---

[44] The Attorney General of the State resigned in 1868 because he was unwilling to take an oath which recognized as "laws" of Texas the Constitution of 1866 and the Acts of the Legislature of 1866. He prepared several opinions on their unconstitutionality, copies of which were printed for distribution to the members of the Convention (Convention Journal, I, p. 129). In his opinion on the "pretended legislation" of 1866 he listed 22 statutes and two joint resolutions which he declared to be unconstitutional, as aimed directly at the freedmen and opposed to the Civil Rights Act and the Thirteenth Amendment. The law defining "persons of color" was objectionable because its "sole object * * * was to defeat equality before the law—justice; to discriminate on account of race." The law defining the rights of "persons of color" was "Subject to the same objection. It was, he said, restrictive, giving them no more rights than free persons of color had during the existence of African slavery; it takes special care not to declare them to be 'citizens.'" He described as in violation of the United States Constitution the laws concerning schools, that providing for separate railroad cars, and those restricting jury service and the militia to whites. (Id., I, p. 953 ff.)

[45] Laws of Texas, 1866, ch. 128, p. 131.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> ger train run by said Company, one car for the special accommodation of Freedmen.[46]

In 1871, the latter act was superseded by one that declared

> That the equality of all persons before the law is herein recognized, and shall ever remain inviolate, nor shall any person ever be deprived of any right, privilege or immunity, nor be exempted from any burdens or duty on account of race, color or previous condition.
>
> SEC. 2. That all public carriers in this State are hereby prohibited, in accordance with the above and foregoing section, from making any distinctions in the carrying of passengers * * *[47]

In the same year Negroes were made eligible to testify in court.[48]

VERMONT

RATIFICATION

The Republican state convention on June 20, 1866, indicated some dissatisfaction that the Fourteenth Amendment did not go farther than it did, stating:

> That, while approving the constitutional amendment lately proposed by Congress as a present practical measure toward securing just ends, we yet insist that every scheme of restoration is imperfect that is not based upon equal and exact justice to all, and the equal rights, personal, civil,

---

[46] Laws of Texas, 1866, ch. 102, p. 97.

[47] Laws of Texas, 1871, 2d Sess., ch. 21, p. 16.

[48] Laws of Texas, 1871, 1st Sess., ch. 104, p. 108.

> and practical, of all loyal citizens, irrespective of color or race; * * *.[49]

The Governor referred the Amendment to the Legislature in his address of October 12, 1866.[50] While the Amendment was under discussion in the House, it was again suggested that the Amendment was not strong enough. It was regretted > that the amendment was so imperfect as it was; that the first article which seems to make such abundant provision for securing every right of every citizen of the United States in each of the States, should in the last article make provision for recognizing the disfranchisement of 4,000,000 of citizens, principally in the States yet to be admitted. He thought the principles enunciated in the first article could and ought to be interpreted as securing each and every political and civil right to each citizen;

Mr. Hubbard stated that if this were not so, he would propose a joint resolution addressed to Congress seeking such an amendment.[51] Mr. Woodbridge explained > that if it was not all that ought to be given it was all that could now be done. It made Southern and Northern representation in Congress on nearly equal terms. It encouraged Southerners to educate and enfranchise blacks.[52]

---

[49] Appleton's Annual Cyclopaedia, 1866, pp. 761–2.

[50] House J., 1866, pp. 32–34.

[51] (Windsor) Vermont Journal, Oct. 27, 1866, p. 2, col. 1.

[52] Ibid.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Legislature ratified the Amendment, 28 to 0 in the Senate,[53] and 196 to 11 in the House.[54]

SCHOOLS AND LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The public school system in Vermont dates from its beginnings as a state, and seems never to have had racial segregation.[55] No laws discriminating against the Negro have been found. In reply to an inquiry from the Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana, in 1868, the Vermont Superintendent of Schools wrote:

> I am happy to say that the negro in Vermont is under no disabilities, nor has he ever been. Neither constitution nor statute recognizes any distinction based upon race or color.[56]

VIRGINIA

Virginia rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867 with only one dissenting vote. In October, 1869, it was ratified without debate. Negro education, proscribed before the war, was at the time of ratification restricted to a few schools established by benevolent societies and supported by the Freedmen's Bureau. The Constitution of 1870, drafted in 1867 and 1868, was [53] Sen. J., 1866, p. 75. The Journal states that the Appendix contains the report of the Senate Committee recommending ratification. The Appendix, however, does not contain that report.

---

[54] House J., 1866, p. 139.

[55] See Vt. General Stats., 1863, tit. 13, c. 22; Vt. Revised Laws, 1880, tit. 10.

[56] See Report of the Indiana Superintendent of Public Instruction, 1867–1868, p. 24. Ind. Doc., 1867–68.

silent on segregation in schools. The statute creating a uniform school system in 1870 specified segregation.

RATIFICATION

Governor Pierpoint in a message of December 3, 1866, recommended ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.[57] As to the scope of the Amendment, he said:

> There is no ambiguity in the language of the proposed amendment: it is before you for your mature consideration—for adoption or rejection: you are fully acquainted with all the circumstances which led to its proposal. The congress of the United States has made its acceptance a condition precedent to the admission of representatives, in the councils of the nation, from states now unrepresented.[58]

The General Assembly rejected the amendment by a vote of 74 to 1 in the House [59] and 27 to 0 in the Senate.[60]

Ratification in 1869, after the Amendment had been adopted, was perfunctory. Governor Walker's message of October 5, 1869, stated merely that

> The 5th section of the act of congress of March 2d, 1867, among other things, declares "That when said state, by a vote of its legislature elected under said constitution, shall have adopted the amendment to the constitution of the United States proposed by the thirty-ninth congress, and

[57] Senate Journal, 1866–67, pp. 28–34.
[58] Id., p. 29.
[59] House Journal, 1866–67, p. 108.
[60] Senate Journal, 1866–67, p. 103.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

known as Article Fourteen, and when said article shall have become a part of the constitution of the United States, said state shall be declared entitled to representation in congress, and senators and representatives shall be admitted therefrom, on their taking the oath prescribed by law." This law is still in full force, and Virginia was named in the preamble to the act as one of the states to which it was to be applied. It will be necessary, therefore, for you to comply with the condition therein named, although Article Fourteen has already been ratified by the requisite number of states, and has been officially proclaimed as a part of the constitution of the United States. A copy of the resolution of congress proposing Article Fourteen to the legislature of the several states is herewith submitted.[61]

Action in the Senate was in accord with the recommendation:

Mr. Herndon, from the select committee to whom was referred the governor's message, submitted the following report:

"The committee to whom was referred the governor's message, with instructions to report what action, if any, should now be taken upon the subjects therein mentioned, respectfully report that, after a conference with the house committee on the same subject, they agreed to report the two accompanying bills, one ratifying the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, and the other ratifying the fifteenth amendment to the same, with a recommendation that they do pass.

(Signed) CHARLES HERNDON, Chairman

* * * * *

[61] Senate Journal, 1869, p. 18.

silent on segregation in schools. The statute creating a uniform school system in 1870 specified segregation.

RATIFICATION

Governor Pierpoint in a message of December 3, 1866, recommended ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.[57] As to the scope of the Amendment, he said:

> There is no ambiguity in the language of the proposed amendment: it is before you for your mature consideration—for adoption or rejection: you are fully acquainted with all the circumstances which led to its proposal. The congress of the United States has made its acceptance a condition precedent to the admission of representatives, in the councils of the nation, from states now unrepresented.[58]

The General Assembly rejected the amendment by a vote of 74 to 1 in the House [59] and 27 to 0 in the Senate.[60]

Ratification in 1869, after the Amendment had been adopted, was perfunctory. Governor Walker's message of October 5, 1869, stated merely that

> The 5th section of the act of congress of March 2d, 1867, among other things, declares "That when said state, by a vote of its legislature elected under said constitution, shall have adopted the amendment to the constitution of the United States proposed by the thirty-ninth congress, and

[57] Senate Journal, 1866–67, pp. 28–34.
[58] Id., p. 29.
[59] House Journal, 1866–67, p. 108.
[60] Senate Journal, 1866–67, p. 103.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

known as Article Fourteen, and when said article shall have become a part of the constitution of the United States, said state shall be declared entitled to representation in congress, and senators and representatives shall be admitted therefrom, on their taking the oath prescribed by law." This law is still in full force, and Virginia was named in the preamble to the act as one of the states to which it was to be applied. It will be necessary, therefore, for you to comply with the condition therein named, although Article Fourteen has already been ratified by the requisite number of states, and has been officially proclaimed as a part of the constitution of the United States. A copy of the resolution of congress proposing Article Fourteen to the legislature of the several states is herewith submitted.[61]

Action in the Senate was in accord with the recommendation:

Mr. Herndon, from the select committee to whom was referred the governor's message, submitted the following report:

"The committee to whom was referred the governor's message, with instructions to report what action, if any, should now be taken upon the subjects therein mentioned, respectfully report that, after a conference with the house committee on the same subject, they agreed to report the two accompanying bills, one ratifying the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, and the other ratifying the fifteenth amendment to the same, with a recommendation that they do pass.

(Signed) CHARLES HERNDON, Chairman

* * * * *

[61] Senate Journal, 1869, p. 18.

> No. 1, A bill to ratify the joint resolution of congress passed June 16th, 1866, proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States of America, was taken up, read the first and ordered to be read a second time; and on motion of Mr. Herndon (two-thirds concurring), was read the second time, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being forthwith engrossed, was, on his further motion (two thirds concurring), read the third time; and the question on the passage of the bill was put and determined in the affirmative—ayes 36; noes 4.[62]

Similar action followed in the House:

> A message was received from the senate by Mr. Patterson, who informed the house of delegates that the senate had passed No. 1 senate bill, entitled, "An act to ratify the joint resolution of congress, passed June 16th, 1866, proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States of America;" in which they respectfully request the concurrence of the house of delegates.
>
> The speaker laid before the house senate bill No. 1, as requiring immediate attention. It was read the first and second times.
>
> On motion of Mr. Crenshaw, the rule was suspended requiring its reference to a committee.
>
> Mr. Budd moved that senate bill No. 1 be read a third time this day, which was agreed to, two-thirds of the members elect to the house of delegates concurring.
>
> The bill was read a third time and passed—yeas 126; nays 6.[63]

---

[62] Id., pp. 26–27.

[63] House Journal, 1869, p. 37.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

SCHOOLS

Public schools in the ante-bellum period were predominantly of the "pauper" type. A permanent public-school fund, the so-called literary fund, was established in 1810,[64] and a year later its purpose was defined to be the "education of the poor".[65] Beginning in 1818, a fixed annual sum from the income of the fund was appropriated for the education of poor children.[66] In some cities and towns, and perhaps a dozen counties, the so-called free-school system was adopted, which was supported by local taxation.[67]

Negroes, both slave and free, were prevented by law from obtaining any education. The Code of 1819[68] prohibited "all meetings or assemblages of slaves, of free negroes or mulattoes mixing and associating with such slaves, at any meeting-house or houses, or any other place or places, in the night, or at any school or schools for teaching them reading and writing, either in the day or night." The penalty for any violation was twenty lashes. Schools for free Negroes, which had been tolerated in Richmond, Norfolk and other cities[69] were suppressed in 1831. All meetings of free Negroes or mulattoes for teaching purposes were declared unlawful as-

[64] Va. Laws 1809–10, ch. 14.

[65] Va. Laws 1810–11, ch. 8.

[66] Va. Laws 1817–18, ch. 11.

[67] Va. Code 1849, ch. 82. The preceding chapter dealt with "schools for indigent children" (ch. 81). See Knight, Public Education in the South (1922), p. 209.

[68] Va. Rev. Code 1819, ch. 111, sec. 15.

[69] Special Report of the U. S. Commissioner of Education (1871), p. 394, House Exec. Docs., 41st Cong., 2d Sess., vol. 13, No. 315.

semblies, and any colored participant was liable to corporal punishment; white persons teaching such groups were punishable by fine and imprisonment.[70] These laws were incorporated with a few changes in the Criminal Code.[71]

Beginning in 1861, schools for freedmen were established by benevolent associations [72] and later supported by the Freedmen's Bureau.[73]

The Virginia Constitution of 1870, approved by popular vote on July 6, 1869, was drawn up in a convention held in 1867 and 1868. It provided

> That all citizens of the State are hereby declared to possess equal civil and political rights and public privileges (I, 20).

It required the General Assembly to establish a free school system, but did not refer to the question of separation:

> The general assembly shall provide by law, at its first session under this constitution, a uniform system of public free schools, and for its gradual, equal, and full introduction into all the counties of the State by the year eighteen hundred and seventy-six, or as much earlier as practicable (VIII, 3).

In the convention, proposals to require separate schools were rejected.[74] A contrary proposal to require mixed schools was also rejected.[75]

---

[70] Va. Laws 1831, ch. 39, secs. 4–6.
[71] Va. Code 1849, ch. 198, secs. 31–32.
[72] Special Report, p. 395.
[73] Id., pp. 396 et seq.
[74] Convention Journal, pp. 299, 301, 308, 336.
[75] Id., pp. 333, 340.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The General Assembly in enacting "An Act to Establish and Maintain a Uniform System of Public Free Schools," approved July 11, 1870,[76] specifically provided for segregation:

> The public free schools shall be free to all persons between the ages of five and twenty-one years, residing within the school district; * * * provided, that white and colored persons shall not be taught in the same school, but in separate schools, under the same general regulations as to management, usefulness, and efficiency. * * * (Sec. 47.)

This was repeated in subsequent acts.[77] In 1902 a Constitution was adopted, containing a provision that

> White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school (Sec. 140).

WEST VIRGINIA

The West Virginia legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867. Segregation, authorized from the establishment of the school system in 1863, was required after 1866, and embodied in the 1872 constitution. The constitutional provision was later held not to violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Martin v. Board of Education, 42 W. Va. 514 (1896). As a prerequisite to admission to the Union, West Virginia had instituted in 1863 a gradual emancipation of slaves, but Negroes were not permitted to vote, serve on juries, or marry whites; restrictions on their competence as witnesses, however, were removed in 1866.

[76] Va. Laws, 1869–70, ch. 259, p. 402.

[77] Va. Laws, 1871–72, ch. 370; Va. Laws, 1876–77, ch. 38.

RATIFICATION

The Governor submitted the Fourteenth Amendment for ratification on January 15, 1867. He stated that it left the question of Negro suffrage open and urged its ratification.[78] Upon the reading of the Governor's message in the Senate, a joint resolution ratifying the Amendment was introduced; by vote, the ordinary reference to committee was omitted, and the resolution passed by a vote of 15 to 3.[79] The House of Delegates, which on January 15 had tabled a resolution ratifying the Amendment,[80] passed the Senate's proposal on January 16, by a vote of 43 to 11.[81]

SCHOOLS

The Free Schools Act of 1863, passed at the first session of the Legislature after the admission of West Virginia as a state, provided separate schools for colored children, but did not in terms prohibit their education together with whites.[82] In 1866, the Legislature passed a school law requiring segregation,[83] and reaffirmed this on February 27, 1867, six weeks after it had ratified the Fourteenth Amendment.[84] The Constitution of 1872 expressly incorporated a segregation require-

[78] Sen. J., 1867, p. 19.
[79] Id., p. 23.
[80] House J., 1867, pp. 7–8.
[81] Id., p. 11.
[82] W. Va. Acts, 1863, c. 137, sec. 17.
[83] W. Va. Acts, 1866, c. 74, sec. 26.
[84] W. Va. Acts, 1867, c. 98, sec. 19.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

ment.[85] This provision was upheld in 1896 against challenge under the Fourteenth Amendment. Martin v. Board of Education, 42 W. Va. 514.

The Report of the Superintendent of Schools dated December 8, 1866, contains the following remark:

> Owing to the fact that these freedmen are widely separated, their school privileges are necessarily limited.[86]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

When the Constitution of West Virginia was first submitted to Congress for approval, it contained a provision that no slave or free Negro could enter the state to take up permanent residence. This was changed to apply to slaves only, and a further provision added that all children born of slaves after July 4, 1863, were to be free; all children of slaves under 10 years of age at that time would become free upon attaining the age of 21; and all children of slaves between 10 years and 21 years of age would become free upon attaining the age of 25.[87] Voting was restricted by the Constitution to white males.[88] Negroes were excluded from juries by statute until the decision in Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303. However, Negroes were permitted to appear as witnesses in the same manner as [85] Art. XII, section 8.

[86] Report of Superintendent of Schools, p. 15, House J., 1867, Appendix.

[87] Const., 1863, Art. XI, section 7. See also 12 Stat. 634.

[88] Const., 1863, Art. III, section 1.

whites.[89] Miscegenation was prohibited under a Virginia statute, which was carried over into the laws of West Virginia.[90]

WISCONSIN

In February, 1867, Wisconsin ratified the Fourteenth Amendment. A minority report in the Senate objected that the Amendment transferred to Congress legislative powers theretofore reserved to the states. Wisconsin schools had been open to all children since the admission of the state in 1849. In 1866 it was held that a law enacted in 1849 conferred the franchise on Negroes.

RATIFICATION

The Fourteenth Amendment was presented to the Legislature by Governor Fairchild in his address of January 9, 1867, in which he urged ratification.[91]

The Senate referred the Amendment to its Committee on Federal Relations, which reported favorably on January 22.[92] The majority report contained no discussion of the scope of the Amendment, but the minority commented at length, stating in part:

> The apparent object of the proposed amendments is to declare the Africans lately in servitude in the southern states of

---

[89] W. Va. Acts, 1866, c. 89.
[90] W. Va. Code, 1870, c. 149, section 8.
[91] Sen. J., 1867, pp. 32 et seq.
[92] Id., p. 96.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> this republic, citizens, and to give to the Congress of the United States the power to make them citizens of the several states wherein they reside, and thereby to extend to them the right of suffrage, and, also, to give to Congress the power to legislate for the citizens of the several states. The object accomplished, if the amendments are ratified, will be a surrender of certain rights and powers which the several states of the union now hold by their sovereign power in trust over the persons and property of their citizens to the federal government, so as to make it the arbiter between the states and the citizens and resident [sic] thereof.[93]
>
> * * * * *
>
> The first section, in connection with the fifth, will give to the federal government the supervision of all the social and domestic relations of the citizens in the state and to subordinate state governments to federal power.[94]

The minority report also questioned the authority of Congress as it was then constituted to propose the Amendment.

The Senate voted for ratification on January 23, by a vote of 22 to 10.[95] The Assembly followed on February 7, by a vote of 69 to 10.[96]

There was some debate in both houses. Senator Hadley, in expressing his approval of the first section, "thought it already provided for in the

---

[93] Ibid.

[94] Id., p. 98.

[95] Id., p. 119.

[96] Assembly Journal, 1867, p. 224.

constitution."[97] General Hobart, in the Assembly, made a statement to the following effect:

> No State shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of of law, or the equal protection of law.—He could see no objection to this proposition; and none could be urged, unless it tended to give too much power to the Supreme Court of the United States. It would prevent any attempt at secession in the future. * * * Under this proposition all persons will be equal before the law.[98]

Assemblyman Dyer explained:

> The first [section] defines some of the rights of citizenship, and prohibits the abridgment of the privileges and immunities of the citizen. This, it may be said, is already in the constitution, and it is true, that instrument does, in effect, guaranty to the citizen, the enjoyment of life, liberty and property. But its provisions in that respect have been disregarded; State legislation in hostility to them has been tolerated and encouraged, and it is well to provide anew and with greater emphasis that the immunities of the citizen shall never be abridged nor his equal protection of the laws be denied.[99]

SCHOOLS

Wisconsin does not appear to have made any distinction between whites and Negroes in the [97] (Madison) Wisconsin State Journal, January 24, 1867, p. 2, col. 3.

[98] Id., February 6, 1867, p. 2, col. 1.

[99] Id., p. 2, col. 2.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

field of education. The original State Constitution of 1848 provided that

> The legislature shall provide by law for the establishment of district schools, which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable, and such schools shall be free and without charge for tuition to all children between the ages of four and twenty years, and no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein.[1]

The school legislation of the State has been free of any reference to race or color.[2]

LEGAL STATUS OF NEGROES

The Constitution of 1848 limited suffrage to white males and to certain Indians.[3] Eligibility for jury service was restricted by statute to qualified voters.[4]

In 1866, the Wisconsin Supreme Court held that Negroes were entitled to vote by virtue of a law enacted in 1849.[5] Gillespie v. Palmer, 20 Wis. 544.

---

[1] Art. X, Sec. 3.

[2] See Chapter 19, Revised Statutes 1849; Chapter XXIII, Revised Statutes 1858; Chapter XXIII, Revised Statutes, 1871.

[3] Art. III, sec. 1; see also, Wis. Rev. Stats., 1858, tit. II, c. 7, sec. 1.

[4] Wis. Rev. Stats., 1858 and 1871, c. 118, sec. 1.

[5] Wis. Laws, 1849, c. 137.

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1965

INDEX

	Page
I. This Court has full power to direct such relief as will be most effective and just	3
II. The vindication of the constitutional rights involved should be as prompt as feasible	4
III. The public interest requires an intelligent, orderly and effective solution of the problems that may be encountered in complying with this Court's decision in particular areas	6
IV. The nature and extent of the problems that the desegregation of public school systems may entail will vary from area to area	8
V. The formulation and execution of programs for transition to nonsegregated school systems should be undertaken by the responsible school authorities under the supervision of the courts of first instance	22
VI. The cases should be remanded to the lower courts with directions to carry out this Court's decision as rapidly as the particular circumstances permit	27
Conclusion	29

CITATIONS

Cases:
Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 347 U. S. 483	2, 5, 6, 7, 8
Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60	19
Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629	5
Federal Statutes:
Act of June 25, 1948, c. 646, § 39, 62 Stat. 992	23
R. S. 698 (28 U. S. C. (1946 ed.) 863)	23
28 U. S. C. 2106	3

State Statutes: Page

D. C. Code (1951 ed.), § 31–670 10
§ 31–671 10
§ 31–1110 10
§ 31–1112 10
Maryland Annotated Code (Flack ed., 1951), Art. 77, §§ 42 (4), 208 10
Mississippi Code (1942 ed.) 6276 10
South Carolina Code (1952) §§ 21–251, 290 10

Miscellaneous:

Ashmore, The Negro and The Schools (1954), pp. 158–159 15
New York Times, June 30, 1954, p. 19 30
Southern School News, September 3, 1954, p. 3 10
Stone, The Common Law in the United States, 50 Harv. L. Rev. 4 19
U. S. Department of Commerce, Statistical Abstract of the United States (1952), p. 355 9
Williams and Ryan, Schools in Transition (1954) 22

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

No. 1[1]

OLIVER BROWN ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES ON THE FURTHER ARGUMENT OF THE QUESTIONS OF RELIEF

This brief is filed in response to the Court's invitation to the Attorney General of the United States to participate in the further argument of these cases on the questions of relief. It is now the settled law of the land that segregation of white and colored children in the public schools of a State or of the District of Columbia is unconstitutional. There remain for consideration and decision only the questions as to the decrees that should be entered in these cases in order to achieve compliance with the Court's ruling.

[1] Together with No. 2, Harry Briggs, Jr., et al. v. R. W. Elliott, et al.; No. 3, Dorothy E. Davis, et al. v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, et al.; No. 4, Spottswood Thomas Bolling, et al. v. C. Melvin Sharpe, et al; and No. 5, Francis B. Gebhart, et al. v. Ethel Louise Belton, et al.

The views of the Government on these questions are set forth in this brief. At the outset it may be helpful to state, in summary fashion, our answers to the questions formulated by the Court (347 U. S. 483, 495–96):

> 4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment
>
> (a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice? No.
>
> (b) or may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions? Yes.
>
> 5. On the assumption on which questions 4 (a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4 (b),
>
> (a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases? No.
>
> (b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach? ---
>
> (c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees? No.
>
> (d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and, if so, what

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees? Yes. The provisions suggested for inclusion in the decrees are outlined at pp. 27–29, infra.

I

THIS COURT HAS FULL POWER TO DIRECT SUCH RELIEF AS WILL BE MOST EFFECTIVE AND JUST

Question 4 need not detain the Court long. The Government, in its brief submitted on the previous reargument, reviewed the authorities bearing on the scope of the Court's remedial powers (Br. 152–167), and concluded that the Court has "undoubted power in these cases to enter such decrees as it determines will be most effective and just in relation to the interests, private and public, affected by its decision" (Br. 167). We noted that Congress has expressly empowered the Court, in fashioning effective relief in cases coming before it, to enter "such appropriate judgment, decree, or order, or require such further proceedings to be had as may be just under the circumstances" (28 U. S. C. 2106). This provision reflects the breadth and flexibility of judicial remedies which are available to the Court. The shaping of appropriate relief in the present cases, as all will agree, involves considerations of a most sensitive and difficult nature. But, as was stated in our earlier brief (p. 154), "we believe there can be no doubt of the Court's power to grant such remedy as it finds to be most consonant with the interests of justice."

II

THE VINDICATION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS INVOLVED SHOULD BE AS PROMPT AS FEASIBLE

The fashioning of relief in these cases does not call for the formulation or application of new or unusual legal principles. On the contrary, the task confronting the Court is one which presents itself whenever it has been judicially found that legal rights have been, and are continuing to be, violated. The question is always one of determining how, in the light of the facts presented and within the limits of the power possessed by it, the Court can best insure the removal of the condition of illegality in a manner comporting not only with the interests of the parties but also, to the extent it may be involved, with the public interest.

In many instances the solution to this problem is quite simple. The balancing of the relevant considerations may lead inescapably to the conclusion that the legitimate interests of all concerned require only immediate termination of the unlawful conduct. In such circumstances a court of equity normally does no more than to enter a decree enjoining that conduct. It is where the scales are not so clearly tipped in that direction that the shaping of the appropriate remedy involves difficulties.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Court recognized, in restoring these cases to the docket for further argument (347 U. S. at 495), that "the formulation of decrees in these cases presents problems of considerable complexity." These problems must be viewed in proper perspective. The starting point must be a recognition that we are dealing here with basic constitutional rights, and not merely those of a few children but of millions. These are class actions. Under the Court's decision the maintenance of segregated schools is in violation of the constitutional rights not only of the individual plaintiffs but of all other "similarly situated" colored children upon whose behalf the suits were brought. Relief short of immediate admission to nonsegregated schools necessarily implies the continuing deprivation of these rights. The "personal and present" right (cf. Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 635) of a colored child not to be segregated while attending public school is one which, if not enforced while the child is of school age, loses its value. Hence any delay in granting relief is pro tanto an irretrievable loss of the right.

The unconstitutionality of racial segregation in public schools is no longer in issue. However, in considering whether any delay in granting full relief is justifiable, it must be borne in mind that continuation of school segregation has harmful effects both on the individuals concerned and on the public. The right of children not to be segregated because of race or color is not a technical legal right of little significance or value. It is a fundamental human right, supported by considerations of morality as well as law. "To separate [colored children] from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone" (347 U. S. at 494). Racial segregation affects the hearts and minds of those who segregate as well as those who are segregated, and it is also detrimental to the community and the nation.

In the absence of compelling reasons to the contrary, therefore, there should be no unnecessary delay in the full vindication of the constitutional rights involved in these cases, and if any delay is required, it should be kept to a minimum.

III

THE PUBLIC INTEREST REQUIRES AN INTELLIGENT, ORDERLY AND EFFECTIVE SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEMS THAT MAY BE ENCOUNTERED IN COMPLYING WITH THIS COURT'S DECISION IN PARTICULAR AREAS

No objective examination of the problems of relief can overlook the fact that the impact of the Court's decision holding racial segregation in public schools to be unconstitutional goes far beyond the areas and parties involved in these cases. As a binding precedent the decision requires the termination of segregation in school systems in more than one-third of the States and in the District of Columbia.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Because public education is, as the Court has recognized (347 U. S. at 493), "perhaps the most important function of state and local governments," there is a public interest to be served in permitting the transition to be carried out in an orderly manner, so as to avoid needless dislocation or other impairment of the effective operation of the school systems concerned. A prime consideration in dealing with the problems of desegregation must be that the systems of public education in the United States should not be adversely affected. Public education is one of the glories of the United States, and an indispensable source of its power. The richest resources of the United States are its citizens, and, as the Court has observed (347 U. S. at 493), education "is the very foundation of good citizenship."

It must be recognized that racial segregation in public schools is not a separate and distinct phenomenon. It is part of a larger social pattern of racial relationships. The Court's decision in these cases has outlawed a social institution which has existed for a long time in many areas throughout the country—an institution, it may be noted, which during its existence not only has had the sanction of decisions of this Court but has been fervently supported by great numbers of people as justifiable on legal and moral grounds. The Court's holding in the present cases that segregation is a denial of constitutional rights involved an express recognition of the importance of psychological and emotional factors; the impact of segregation upon children, the Court found, can so affect their entire lives as to preclude their full enjoyment of constitutional rights. In similar fashion, psychological and emotional factors are involved—and must be met with understanding and good will—in the alterations that must now take place in order to bring about compliance with the Court's decision. The practical difficulties which may be met in effecting transition to nonsegregated public school systems should therefore be taken into account in determining the most effective means for ending school segregation in particular areas. The Court itself has recognized, in restoring these cases to the docket for further argument on the questions of relief, that these difficulties cannot be resolved by a single stroke of the judicial pen.

Broadly speaking, therefore, the decrees in these cases should be framed to require a transition which achieves the most expeditious compliance with the constitutional mandate and at the same time permits the intelligent, orderly, and effective solution of the problems that may be encountered in desegregating school systems in particular areas.

IV

THE NATURE AND EXTENT OF THE PROBLEMS THAT THE DESEGREGATION OF PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEMS MAY ENTAIL WILL VARY FROM AREA TO AREA

As the Court has noted (347 U. S. at 495), there is a "great variety of local conditions,"

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

which will undoubtedly affect the nature and extent of the changes in public school systems and practices required to bring about compliance with its decision. Without elaborating in detail the structure and organization of the educational systems of the States and the District of Columbia, it is not difficult to outline some of the kinds of problems which may arise in making a transition to nonsegregated systems.

1. The implementation of any program for the desegregation of public school facilities will be, of course, the responsibility of no single individual or administrative body. Indeed, of all governmental activities, education is undoubtedly the most decentralized, its administrative and financial base being shared between the states and their political subdivisions. And the extent of local participation is brought into perhaps sharper focus by the fact that of the approximately 120,000 governmental units tabulated by the Census Bureau in 1951, more than 70,000 were school districts.[2]

The division of authority between state and local school officials customarily is delineated by the state legislature. In most jurisdictions, the state board of education and school superintendent have the statutory duty of making the broad policy decisions affecting the state school system as a whole, enforcing state laws relating to the operation of schools and, in general, insuring that all school units meet certain minimal standards. Local authorities, within the framework of state educational policy as embodied in statutes, regulations and directives, exercise control over the intimate details of school management within their district or other operating unit.

[2] U. S. Department of Commerce, Statistical Abstract of the United States (1952), p. 355.

The problems that will confront authorities on the state level thus will be principally ones of revising state laws and regulations which were tailored to fit the needs of a segregated school system. In South Carolina, for example, the statutory formula now employed in the distribution of state funds for teachers' salaries requires that minimum enrollment and average daily attendance in each district be determined separately for each race.[3] In several jurisdictions, the law provides for school officials whose duties are limited to the supervision of Negro schools;[4] in others, the legislature has provided for entirely separate Negro and white school districts encompassing the same area.[5]

[3] South Carolina Code (1952), §§ 21-251, 290. Cf. D. C. Code (1951 ed.), §§ 31-1110, 31-1112.

[4] See e. g., D. C. Code (1951 ed), §§ 31-670, 31-671; Anno. Code of Maryland (Flack ed., 1951), Art. 77, §§ 42 (4), 208.

[5] See e. g., Mississippi Code (1942 ed.) 6276. In some states separate Negro school districts are maintained even in the absence of a legislative requirement. In Delaware, for example, there are at least 42 such districts. It has been reported that at the next session of the Delaware General Assembly, legislation will be introduced to merge them with white school districts. See Southern School News, September 3, 1954, page 3.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2. Because local school authorities have considerable discretion respecting many facets of school administration, and because there is a wide variety in local conditions, it can be expected that, even within the same state, no two school districts will be faced with precisely the same problems in accomplishing an effective transition to nonsegregated school systems.

(a) In districts where there is more than one school, adjustments in the method employed for allocating students to particular schools may have to be made. In the majority of such districts, children are given little, if any, choice as to the school they are to attend. Instead, each school in the district is assigned a particular attendance area and the pupil must enroll in the facility within whose attendance boundaries he resides.

Many factors are taken into consideration in drawing these boundaries, foremost among them being the size and character of the school, the geographical distribution of the school population in the district, and the ease and safety of public travel to and from school. In the case of segregated school systems, boundaries are formulated separately for white and colored facilities, with the result that the overall objective of making the maximum use of total school facilities and minimizing travel difficulties is seldom achieved. Changes in the racial character of a neighborhood frequently cause overcrowding in some schools while others operate at far below capacity.

Similarly, children of both races are often compelled to travel long distances to reach the segregated schools to which they are assigned.

The extent of the boundary alterations required, in the reformulation of school attendance areas on a non-racial basis, will vary. This is illustrated by the recent experience in the District of Columbia in recasting attendance boundaries on a wholly geographical basis. In the neighborhoods where there is little or no mixture of the races, and where school facilities have been fully utilized, it was found that the elimination of the racial factor did not work any material change in the territory served by each school. In biracial neighborhoods, however, the objective of securing maximum utilization of facilities, on a non-racial basis, could be achieved only by making radical revisions in the area covered by the formerly Negro and white schools.

In connection with the formulation of new attendance boundaries, school districts may be called upon to review or alter prevailing practices regarding pupil transfers. Because it is almost impossible to fix boundaries which do not work a hardship on any pupils, many communities now permit enrollment outside the attendance area of residence in exceptional circumstances. Pupils on the secondary school level occasionally are allowed to attend a school at a distance from their homes because it offers courses of instruction not otherwise available. Specialized needs of mentally or physically handicapped children may cause them to be grouped together for instructional purposes. And pupils not possessing an adequate knowledge of the English language sometimes are placed in separate schools until that knowledge is acquired. While the allowance of transfers and special assignments for reasons of this character is fully warranted and undoubtedly will be continued, some districts may be confronted with efforts by students to attend schools in other areas for the sole and unjustifiable purpose of avoiding enrollment in a biracial facility.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(b) At the same time that procedures are devised for the assignment of pupils to schools on a basis not involving distinctions of color, some districts may have to readjust the use of their facilities. In low population rural areas now maintaining two schools solely by reason of the dual system, educational and economic considerations may dictate consolidation. There are several ways in which this consolidation might be accomplished. Where existing structures are small or otherwise inadequate, a new school might be constructed to accommodate all children. Another solution might be to close one of the schools and transfer its pupils to the other.

In areas where there is a considerable disparity in the quality and curricula of the former white and Negro schools, the problem of readjustment may be more troublesome. Parents will be understandably reluctant to send their children to schools markedly inferior to those previously attended, or which do not provide courses of instruction that would have been begun or continued if no transfer had been required. While the long-range answer to a substantial part of this problem may be the improvement of substandard schools, or the construction of new ones, school administrators may have to devise stopgap methods—not involving continuation of racial segregation—to protect the interests of children now in school.

(c) Teachers may have to be reassigned and changes made in the method of their selection, with due regard to the safeguarding of seniority and tenure rights. In areas which now have separate eligibility lists for white and colored teachers, new lists combining applicants of both races may be established.[6] Salary differentials

[6] This step was taken in both the District of Columbia and in Baltimore. In the former, under the segregated system, Negro and white applicants for teaching positions took separate examinations conducted by separate boards of examiners. Performance on these qualifying examinations determined position on the eligibility lists maintained for applicants of each race and the lists in turn provided the sole basis of appointment. In June 1954, the boards of examiners were merged into a single board under the direct chairmanship of the superintendent of schools, teacher examinations were held on an integrated basis for the first time, and eligibility lists were consolidated. For each level of

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

may have to be eliminated.[7] And, on the supervisory level, in communities maintaining separate supervisors for Negro schools a general realignment of duties may be necessary.[8]

(d) Most rural and some urban areas provide transportation to and from schools. Communities which have maintained separate transportation facilities for the two races may have to reorganize schedules and routes. And some localities may discover that there will be a need instruction, there is now but a single list on which no reference is made to the race of any of the named individuals.

---

In Baltimore, the compilation of separate lists involved not only the grade received on a written examination, administered to white and colored alike, but in addition the results of an oral interview and the evaluation of the applicant's previous experience. In combining the lists, Baltimore did not disturb these criteria; nor was a change made in the established practice of selecting any one of the five highest ranking qualified individuals to fill a vacancy.

[7] In 1952, the average annual salaries of white and Negro classroom teachers in 12 Southern states were $2,740 and $2,389, respectively. A part of this differential may be explained by the fact that the average amount of college training possessed by the white teachers was slightly higher. And between 1940 and 1952, the gaps in both salary and training averages were substantially diminished. See Ashmore, The Negro and The Schools (1954), pp. 158–159.

[8] Baltimore's dual system, for example, had five assistant school superintendents serving on a systemwide basis and one assistant superintendent for Negro schools.

322344—54——3

for additional vehicles or, conversely, that less equipment will be necessary.[9]

(e) A few school districts may have to compensate for differences in the educational backgrounds of newly integrated pupils. In localities where the segregated Negro facilities were inferior, colored students may find it difficult to pursue satisfactorily the same studies as white students in the same grades. School authorities faced with that problem may desire to give tests to determine the grade to which each student should be assigned. Or such tests might be employed for the purpose of selecting students for additional and intensified instruction in subjects in which they are deficient.

3. Because, as has been noted, the responsibility for the financial support of public education is distributed between the state and its subdivisions, the economic burdens incident to the implementation of integration also will fall upon several levels of government. These burdens, however, will flow largely from the present inequality, in a physical sense, of separate Negro schools. As a consequence, even if the dual system were to continue, many areas would be faced [9] The requirement of additional equipment will be generally restricted, of course, to places where present facilities have not been sufficient to provide adequate transportation for all pupils. It cannot therefore be regarded as, in any real sense, a problem arising from the elimination of segregation.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

with the necessity of making substantial outlays for capital improvements.

Indeed, the financial cost of an "equalization" program for separate schools unquestionably would be far greater. No matter how small the Negro population in the particular area, it would have to be provided with facilities and equipment equivalent in all respects to those provided in white schools. In similar circumstances, a non-segregated school system may find that the educational needs of all children will be satisfied by merely closing down the former Negro school and transferring its pupils to other facilities.

While, placed in perspective, economic considerations would seem to furnish less of an obstacle to the maintenance of integrated schools than to "separate but equal" schools, it should be noted that if expenditures per classroom unit are to be continued at current levels for white children, an additional annual expenditure of over 160 million dollars will be required in the states involved and the District of Columbia. In respect to pupil transportation services, the estimated capital outlay is 40 million dollars. And the estimated cost of "equalizing" Negro schools is in excess of two billion dollars.[10]

4. In addition to problems of a purely administrative or fiscal character, school authorities

[10] These estimates have been furnished by the Office of Education, U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

may have to cope with a certain amount of popular hostility towards the elimination of segregation in public schools. This results from the fact that in each of the areas involved the dual system has existed for generations and is accepted by many as being a part of the "way of life" of the area. And the fear has been expressed in some quarters that the opposition to any departure from the existing pattern will manifest itself in the withdrawal of state aid to education and in other action on state and local levels designed to prevent or impair the effective operation of public schools on a nonsegregated basis.

We do not believe that there is warrant for presuming that responsible officials and citizens will tolerate violations of the Constitution.[11] The solutions to these problems, like all others in a democracy, will emerge from the "sober second [11] The well-publicized student disturbances which occurred recently in some localities certainly provide no basis for such a presumption. For one thing, these disturbances were isolated; in the overwhelming majority of the areas which have begun or completed compliance with this Court's decision, the adjustment has been remarkably free of untoward incident. Moreover, it appears to be the fact that the misconduct was in substantial measure incited by a small number of reckless and irresponsible individuals and groups, many from without the community, who took full advantage of some students' immaturity. And, as is so often true in such circumstances, where school and law enforcement authorities made clear their determination neither to countenance nor to capitulate to lawlessness, the disturbances ended as abruptly as they had started.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

thought of the community, which is the firm base on which all law must ultimately rest." (Stone, The Common Law in the United States, 50 Harv. L. Rev. 4, 25.) Popular hostility, where found to exist, is a problem that needs to be recognized and faced with understanding, but it can afford no legal justification for a failure to end school segregation. Racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional and will have to be terminated as quickly as feasible, regardless of how much it may be favored by some people in the community. There can be no "local option" on that question, which has now been finally settled by the tribunal empowered under the Constitution to decide it.[12]

While general community hostility cannot serve as justification for avoiding or postponing compliance with the constitutional mandate, it is relevant in determining the most effective method for ending segregation in the particular [12] "That there exists a serious and difficult problem arising from a feeling of race hostility which the law is powerless to control, and to which it must give a measure of consideration, may be freely admitted. But its solution cannot be promoted by depriving citizens of their constitutional rights and privileges." Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 80–81.

In any event, this would not be the proper occasion or time to adjudicate possible attempts to evade or circumvent this Court's decision. Such questions, like all other questions of constitutional law, must be resolved when they arise concretely, in a factual setting, and when this Court can have the benefit of findings of fact and the judgment of the lower courts.

locality. School administrators will have an obvious concern in obtaining public support and acceptance of the transition. The extent of the difficulties which may be encountered will depend, of course, upon the state of local opinion, which in turn is influenced by such varied factors as the economic structure, geographical location, and relative numbers of whites and Negroes in the community. There is, however, a general recognition of the need for thoughtful advance preparations to resolve the problems of desegregation with as few disruptions as possible. If any lesson can be derived from past experiences in ending segregated school systems, it is the importance of public confidence in the ability of school administrators to accomplish the adjustment without, in the process, losing sight of or sacrificing the basic and continuing educational needs of all the children affected.[13]

---

[13] In presenting his program for integration for the approval of the Board of Education, the Superintendent of Schools of the District of Columbia laid emphasis on the consideration of the educational growth and welfare of the school child. Thus, in justification of the proposal that each presently enrolled pupil be granted a limited option to remain in the school he now attends even though he does not reside within its new attendance boundaries, the Superintendent enumerated the ways in which this would provide "stability, continuity and security in the educational experiences of pupils during the transition period." (See brief for respondents in No. 4, p. 13.)

While we do not describe the District of Columbia pro-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In some areas it may be found advisable to preface the desegregation process with programs, not extending for more than a few months, designed to promote interracial understanding among students, teachers, and parents. Such preparatory measures were taken in many of the localities which have abolished segregated school systems in recent years. In one New Jersey community, for example, funds were appropriated to allow several selected teachers to attend a special workshop on human relations conducted at a state university. In addition, an extension course on the same subject was offered by school authorities during the year preceding desegregation and was well attended by teachers. In other areas civic, P-TA, religious, and fraternal groups took the initiative in establishing a favorable climate for making the transition. It was found that the efforts of these groups were instrumental in reducing many of the pre-existing racial tensions in the community, with the result that gram in detail here, since this is undertaken in the brief for respondents in No. 4, we think it reflects credit upon those responsible for its formulation and execution. In every significant respect, the plan evidences painstaking care on the part of school officials to realize the expressed objective of an expeditious transition calculated "to make the best use of the total resources of the school system in plant and personnel, to serve the best interest of all the pupils, and to promote the general welfare of the community." (See brief for respondents in No. 4, p. 11.)

---

integration was accomplished speedily and with little or no serious friction or incident.[14]

V

THE FORMULATION AND EXECUTION OF PROGRAMS FOR TRANSITION TO NONSEGREGATED SCHOOL SYSTEMS SHOULD BE UNDERTAKEN BY THE RESPONSIBLE SCHOOL AUTHORITIES UNDER THE SUPERVISION OF THE COURTS OF FIRST INSTANCE

For the reasons which have been summarized, it is clear that no single formula or blueprint is readily susceptible of application to all localities which must end segregation in their school systems. The measures essential to bringing about an expeditious, orderly, and effective transition in any given area will depend on the special conditions and problems in that area. And since there is wide variance in local conditions, what may be practicable in one community may be wholly inappropriate in another.

A prerequisite to the formulation, initiation, and supervision of any practicable program for ending segregation is a knowledge of the special problems and needs of the particular community. It is the responsible school authorities and the courts of first instance in each area who will have the greatest familiarity with local conditions and [14] The transitional experiences of twenty-four communities in six states which within the past ten years desegregated their public school systems are the subject of a study conducted under the auspices of the Fund for the Advancement of Education of the Ford Foundation. Williams and Ryan, Schools in Transition (1954).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

who will be in the best position to evaluate their significance and effect in accomplishing desegregation in as short a period as feasible. For this reason, this Court should not, either itself or with the assistance of a special master appointed by it,[15] delineate the precise steps that each of the defendants should take in ending segregation in the public school systems. Instead, the primary responsibility for both devising and carrying out programs for the expeditious accomplishment of the required transition should be placed upon the defendants, to be exercised under the continuing direct supervision of the district courts or appropriate state courts.

This Court, we believe, should lay down standards for the guidance of the lower courts in carrying out its decision. A remand for further proceedings, without more, would add to the uncertainty and doubt which already exist and would only serve to make the process of adjustment more difficult.

Specifically, the lower courts should be instructed to require the defendants either to admit

---

[15] While we do not believe that the Court should appoint a special master to hear evidence, there can be no question of its power to do so. In the 1948 revision of the Judicial Code, Congress expressly repealed R. S. 698 [28 U. S. C. (1946 ed.) 863] which had provided that "[u]pon the appeal of any cause in equity, * * * no new evidence shall be received in the Supreme Court." Act of June 25, 1948, c. 646, § 39, 62 Stat. 992. We find nothing to suggest that the legislative purpose was other than to remove the restriction entirely.

the plaintiffs, and other Negro children similarly situated, forthwith to public schools on a non-segregated basis or to propose promptly, for the court's consideration and approval, an effective program for accomplishing the transition as soon as practicable. In passing upon the acceptability of proposed programs, the criterion should be whether the defendants have sustained the burden of showing that their particular program will bring about the total elimination of racial considerations in the admission of pupils to public schools as rapidly as local conditions allow. And in determining whether the projected plan represents the most expeditious means of accomplishing an effective transition, the courts should be permitted to take into account the scope of the administrative adjustments that are called for and the particular conditions existing in the community. Where there are no solid obstacles to desegregation, delay is not justified and should not be permitted. It is only where the lower court finds, upon clear and convincing evidence, that the defendants have met the burden of showing that immediate (i. e., at the beginning of the next school term) completion of the desegregation program is impracticable, that any delay is justifiable. And, in such a situation, the district court should fix the shortest practicable period for completing desegregation.

Although it would be helpful if this Court could

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

specify outside limits for the period of desegregation, we do not think it would be feasible to do so at this time. Apart from the fact that there is no way of judging at this point what integration will involve in the particular area, maximum periods tend to become minimum periods. This Court should not enter any order which might have the practical effect of slowing down desegregation where it could be swiftly accomplished. The Court, however, should make it clear that any proposal for desegregation over an indefinite period will be unacceptable, and that there can be no justification anywhere for failure to make an immediate and substantial start toward desegregation, in a good-faith effort to end segregation as soon as feasible.

Further, the lower courts should be instructed to be insistent that any interval permitted for the accomplishment of desegregation is being fully utilized. Any period during which little or nothing is being done to further the transition would serve no useful purpose and, indeed, would only intensify the difficulties. Whether time will be useful will depend on how it is used; delay solely for the sake of delay is intolerable. Where a period of time is allowed for transition, it should be for the sole purpose of enabling necessary constructive measures to be taken, and not for the purpose of permitting postponement per se.

If the program for desegregation formulated by the defendants will remove, as expeditiously as possible, state-imposed or state-supported racial classifications of pupils in public schools, the lower courts should not substitute their judgment respecting the administrative features of the program for that of the school authorities. The Constitution prohibits the maintenance of segregaged school systems. It does not compel the adoption of any specific type of nonsegregated system. The decisive inquiry is whether race or color has been entirely eliminated as a criterion in the admission of pupils to public schools. The essence of the Court's decision in these cases is that there be no governmental action which enforces or supports school segregation.

This Court, we believe, should not in its present decrees give blanket approval to any particular programs for desegregation. The determination of the necessity for, and constitutionality of, any specific plan should not be made in vacuo. Flexibility in responding to developing circumstances may become important. The experience in carrying out a plan, once it is begun, may alter the assumptions on which it was based. For example, it may develop, after a plan is in operation, that it can be carried out more quickly than was anticipated at the outset, as has been demonstrated by the experience in the District of Columbia.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

VI

THE CASES SHOULD BE REMANDED TO THE LOWER COURTS WITH DIRECTIONS TO CARRY OUT THIS COURT'S DECISION AS RAPIDLY AS THE PARTICULAR CIRCUMSTANCES PERMIT

For the reasons outlined above, the Government suggests that the Court should enter decrees (a) declaring that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional and that all provisions of law requiring or permitting such segregation are invalid, and (b) remanding the cases to the appropriate courts of first instance for such further proceedings and orders as are necessary and proper to carry out this Court's decision.[16] The decrees should contain specific provisions substantially as follows:

(1) That the lower court shall forthwith enter orders directing the defendants to submit within 90 days a plan for ending, as soon as feasible, racial segregation of pupils in public schools subject to their authority or control.

---

[16] In the Delaware case, No. 5, Gebhart v. Belton, the Attorney General of Delaware, in his brief for petitioners (pp. 17–18), now agrees that the judgment of the state Supreme Court should be affirmed. Accordingly, since the respondents did not file a cross-petition for certiorari, it would appear that in the Delaware case this Court should simply enter an order of affirmance.

(2) That, unless a satisfactory plan is submitted to and approved by the lower court, it shall forthwith enter appropriate orders, by way of injunction or otherwise, directing admission of the plaintiffs and other children similarly situated to nonsegregated public schools at the beginning of the next school term.

(3) That, upon submission of a plan by the defendants, the lower court shall promptly hold a hearing to determine whether it provides for transition to a nonsegregated school system as expeditiously as the circumstances permit. The defendants shall have the burden of proof on the question of whether, and how long, an interval of time in carrying out full desegregation is required. In approving any proposed program, the court shall make such modifications as may be required, and shall fix the earliest practicable date for completion of the program. And no program shall be sanctioned which does not call for the immediate commencement of the procedures necessary to the accomplishment of the transition.

(4) That during the period, if any, allowed for completion of the program for transition to a nonsegregated system, the lower court shall require the defendants to submit detailed periodic reports showing the progress made in ending segregation. The court shall enter such further orders as may be required from time to time in order to insure against unnecessary delay in the execution of the program.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(5) That this Court shall retain jurisdiction for the purpose of making such further orders, if any, as may become necessary for carrying out its mandate. To this end the lower courts should be required to submit information reports to this Court at specified intervals showing in detail the actions taken in bringing about compliance with the requirements of the Constitution. (The Court may wish to appoint a special master to review such reports and to make appropriate recommendations thereon to this Court and to the lower courts.)

CONCLUSION

The responsibility for achieving compliance with the Court's decision in these cases does not rest on the judiciary alone. Every officer and agency of government, federal, state, and local, is likewise charged with the duty of enforcing the Constitution and the rights guaranteed under it. And, ultimately, it is the obligation of every citizen to respect and abide by the law, once it is authoritatively declared. We have no doubt that the American people and the officials through whom they act will meet these responsibilities in the spirit, to quote the words of the President, of "patience without compromise of principle."[17]

Respectfully submitted.

HERBERT BROWNELL, JR.,
Attorney General.

SIMON E. SOBELOFF,
Solicitor General.

J. LEE RANKIN,
Assistant Attorney General.

PHILIP ELMAN,
ALAN S. ROSENTHAL,
Special Assistants to the Attorney General.

NOVEMBER 1954.

[17] New York Times, June 30, 1954, p. 19.

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1954

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

INDEX

	Page
I. The instant suits are class actions under Rule 23(a)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure	1
II. The decrees may extend to persons in the respective classes who have not individually appeared in the proceedings	6
III. In any event, members of the class who have not yet intervened are still eligible to do so	13

CITATIONS

Cases:

Carter v. School Board, 182 F.2d 531	5
Davis v. Cook, 80 F. Supp. 443, reversed on other grounds, 178 F.2d 595, certiorari denied, 340 U.S. 811	11, 12
Draper v. City of St. Louis, 92 F. Supp. 546, appeal dismissed, 186 F.2d 307	5
Gonzales v. Sheely, 96 F. Supp. 1004	11
Gramling v. Maxwell, 58 F.2d 256	5, 9
Guaranty Trust v. York, 143 F.2d 503, reversed on other grounds, 326 U.S. 99	14
Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U.S. 32	7
Kansas City, Mo. v. Williams, 205 F.2d 47, certiorari denied, 346 U.S. 826	4
McGrath v. Tadayasu Abo, 186 F.2d 766, certiorari denied, 342 U.S. 832	9, 14
Mendez v. Westminster School District, 64 F. Supp. 544, affirmed, 161 F.2d 774	5, 11
National Hairdressers' and Cosmetologists' Assn. v. Philad Co., 41 F. Supp. 701, affirmed, 129 F. 2d 1020	5
Oppenheimer v. F. J. Young & Co., 144 F. 2d 387	8
Pentland v. Dravo Corp., 152 F.2d 851	8, 14
System Federation No. 91 v. Reed, 180 F.2d 991	5, 10, 15
Thomas v. Hibbitts, 46 F. Supp. 368	5, 12

Cases—Continued

	Page
Trailmobile Co. v. Whirls, 331 U.S. 40	5
Weeks v. Bareco Oil Co., 125 F.2d 84	5
Wilson v. City of Paducah, 100 F. Supp. 116	5, 12

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure:

Rule 20	6
Rule 23	6, 14
Rule 23(a)(1)	2
Rule 23(a)(2)	2
Rule 23(a)(3)	2
Rule 24(b)	6

Miscellaneous:

Chafee, Bills of Peace with Multiple Parties, 45 Harv. L. Rev. 1297	3
Federal Class Actions: A Suggested Revision of Rule 23, 46 Col. L. Rev. 818	6, 7
Kalven and Rosenfield, The Contemporary Function of the Class Suit, 8 U. of Chi. L. Rev. 684	6
Moore, Federal Practice (2d ed.)	6
Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence (5th ed.)	3
Restatement Judgments, Section 86	7

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

No. 1 [1]

OLIVER BROWN, ET AL., APPELLANTS

v.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, ET AL.

SUPPLEMENTAL MEMORANDUM FOR THE UNITED STATES ON THE FURTHER ARGUMENT OF THE QUESTIONS OF RELIEF

Pursuant to the Court's request at the oral argument, the Government submits this supplemental memorandum dealing with the "class action" character of the suits at bar.

I

The instant suits are class actions under Rule 23(a)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure [2]

We note at the outset that the plaintiffs instituted their suits in the district courts, not only on their

---

[1] Together with No. 2, Harry Briggs, Jr., et al. v. R. W. Elliott, et al.; No. 3, Dorothy E. Davis, et al. v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, et al.; No. 4, Spottswood Thomas Bolling, et al. v. C. Melvin Sharpe, et al.; and No. 5, Francis B. Gebhart, et al. v. Ethel Louise Belton, et al.

[2] No. 5, which arose in the state courts, was brought, of course, pursuant to Delaware procedure.

own behalf, but also on behalf of persons similarly situated;[3] that the suits were treated as class actions in the various courts below;[4] and that they were described as such in this Court's opinion of last term, 347 U. S. at 495. This treatment, in our view, was correct.

The authority to institute a class action is conferred by Rule 23(a) in the following terms:

> If persons constituting a class are so numerous as to make it impracticable to bring them all before the court, such of them, one or more, as will fairly insure the adequate representation of all may, on behalf of all, sue or be sued, when the character of the right sought to be enforced for or against the class is
>
> (1) joint, or common, or secondary in the sense that the owner of a primary right refuses to enforce that right and a member of the class thereby becomes entitled to enforce it;
>
> (2) several, and the object of the action is the adjudication of claims which do or may affect specific property involved in the action; or
>
> (3) several, and there is a common question of law or fact affecting the several rights and a common relief is sought.

---

[3] See No. 1, R. 4, 7; No. 2, R. 5, 10-11; No. 3, R. 6, 9-10, 23.

[4] This is evident from the findings, opinions, and lower-court decrees. See No. 1, R. 244; No. 2, R. 190, 210; No. 3, R. 617-618, 624.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Subdivision (1) deals with a type of class action traditional under equity practice—the situation where the members of the class have a joint or common interest predicated upon a jural relation between or among them.[5] A familiar example is a suit by representatives of an unincorporated association. Subdivision (2) has to do with individual plaintiffs and a claim to a common fund or res. Subdivision (3), which is here pertinent, relates to the situation in which each member of the class has an individual or personal right, in no way dependent for its assertion upon the joinder of other members of the class, in which a class action is permitted on the ground that "there is a common question of law or fact affecting the several rights and a common relief is sought." Its purpose is to provide a device, in appropriate circumstances, for the avoidance of multiplicity of actions.

It would appear that the conditions for a class suit under subdivision (3) are satisfied here. There is no dispute that the members of the class are numerous. There is no suggestion that the individual plaintiffs fail to represent the interests of all. It is plain that the rights are several and similar; each member of the class has a constitutional right not to be segregated in public school because of his race or color. These individual rights have already been adjudicated upon the basis of common questions of law and fact. And, in each case, declaratory and injunctive relief was requested for the benefit of all of the members of the class, and not merely on behalf of the named plaintiffs.

---

[5] This is not to suggest that multi-party litigation involving persons having rights or duties which are several in character is strictly a recent development. The Chancellor not infrequently exercised his powers when the nature of the interest involved was neither joint nor common but the issue was one presenting a common question of law or fact. As to the avoidance of multiplicity of actions as a ground of equity jurisdiction, see generally, Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, Sec. 243 et seq. (5th ed.); Chafee, Bills of Peace with Multiple Parties, 45 Harv. L. Rev. 1297.

Thus, almost without exception, the lower federal courts have entertained class suits instituted on behalf of persons adversely affected by racial discrimination. As stated in Kansas City, Mo. v. Williams, 205 F. 2d 47, 52 (C. A. 8), certiorari denied, 346 U. S. 826 (representative suit by three Negroes challenging discrimination in the operation of a public recreational facility):

> Violations of the Fourteenth Amendment are of course violations of individual or personal rights, but where they are committed on a class basis or as a group policy, such as a discrimination generally because of race, they are no less entitled to be made the subject of class actions and class adjudication under rule 23, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A., than are other several rights. And the District Courts, where the question has so arisen, have practically unanimously so recognized. See, e. g., Gonzales v. Sheely, D. C. Ariz., 96 F. Supp. 1004; Wilson v. Board of Sup'rs of La. State University, etc., D. C. La., 92 F. Supp. 986; Johnson v. Board of Trustees of University of Kentucky, D. C., E. D. Ky., 83 F. Supp. 707; Davis v. Cook, D. C., N. D. Ga., 80 F. Supp. 443; Lopez v. Seccombe, D. C., S. D. Cal., 71 F. Supp. 769—to give but a few examples. See also Alston v. School Board of City of Norfolk, 4 Cir., 112 F. 2d 902, 997, 130 A. L. R. 1506; City of Birmingham v. Monk, 5 Cir., 185 F. 2d 859.[6]

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

---

[6] For other instances of representative suits challenging segregation, see Carter v. School Board, 182 F. 2d 531 (C.A. 4); Mendez v. Westminster School District, 64 F. Supp. 544 (S.D. Cal.), affirmed, 161 F. 2d 774 (C.A. 9); Draper v. City of St. Louis, 92 F. Supp. 546 (E.D. Mo.), appeal dismissed, 186 F. 2d 307 (C.A. 8); Thomas v. Hibbitts, 46 F. Supp. 368 (M.D. Tenn.); Wilson v. City of Paducah, 100 F. Supp. 116 (W.D. Ky.). Cf. System Federation No. 91 v. Reed, 180 F. 2d 991 (C.A. 6) (class action by non-union employees of a carrier to enjoin discrimination against their rights to acquire seniority, in violation of Railway Labor Act).

Of course, a case involving discrimination is but one of many factual situations in which Rule 23(a)(3) may provide an appropriate means of dealing in a single action with individual claims of right asserted by a large number of persons similarly situated. See, e.g., Weeks v. Bareco Oil Co., 125 F. 2d 84 (C.A. 7) (representative suit by two of 900 gasoline jobbers against oil companies, charging antitrust violations); National Hairdressers' and Cosmetologists' Assn. v. Philad Co., 41 F. Supp. 701 (D. Del.), affirmed, 129 F. 2d 1020 (C.A. 3) (representative suit seeking declaration that process used by several thousand members of a national hairdressers' association does not infringe defendant's patent and an injunction against infringement suits by defendant); Gramling v. Maxwell, 52 F. 2d 256 (W.D. N.C.) (representative suit by single taxpayer on behalf of himself and several hundred similarly situated to enjoin State Commissioner of Revenue from collecting unlawful tax). Another example familiar to the Court is provided by representative suits asserting rights under the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940. See Trailmobile Co. v. Whirls, 331 U.S. 40.

II

The decrees may extend to persons in the respective classes who have not individually appeared in the proceedings

To state that a suit meets the requirements of a class action under Rule 23 does not in and of itself necessarily determine whether relief should in terms extend to all members of the class or should be limited to those who individually identify themselves with the proceeding, either as original or intervening complainants.[7] Thus, Professor Moore takes the position that, when the suit is under subdivision (3) of the rule (i e., when the rights are several in nature), the action is "an invitation to joinder," rather than a "command performance," and that the "decree . . . binds only those actually before the court." 3 Moore, Federal Practice, 3443, 3465 (2d ed.). Other commentators are of the view that this unduly restricts the function of the class action; that, so interpreted, subdivision (3), which offers the greatest promise of facilitating disposition of important questions involving a substantial number of parties, accomplishes little more than the rules as to permissive joinder and intervention (Rules 20, 24(b)); and that, in appropriate cases, relief may go beyond the parties actually before the court. Kalven and Rosenfield, The Contemporary Function of the Class Suit, 8 U. of Chi. L. Rev. 684, 701 et seq.; Federal Class Actions: A Suggested Revision of Rule 23, 46 Col. L.

[7] We deal under Point III with the question of timely intervention.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Rev. 818. The Restatement, Judgments, Section 86, declares:

> A person who is one of a class of persons on whose account action is properly brought or defended in a representative action or defense is bound by and entitled to the benefits of the rules of res judicata with reference to the subject matter of the action.
>
> Comment a . . . [This] rule . . . applies where an action is brought by one . . . whose interests are similar to those of a large number of others, so that it is proper and convenient for him to speak on behalf of all. . . .

This Court has not passed directly upon the point, though it may be noted that the discussion in Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U. S. 32, addressed to the question whether a state court judgment may be binding upon absent members of a class, emphasizes the requirement of adequate representation but suggests no narrow strictures upon the method of defining the class.[8] The requirement made by the Restatement that the action be "properly" brought or defended would appear to embrace the due process requirements of fair notice and adequate representation emphasized in Hansberry. It is significant that one of the effects of the rule enunciated in the Restatement would be to hold absent members of a class, who were properly represented, bound by an unfavorable result. The problem here—whether the benefits of a decree should be extended to absent members of a plaintiff class—is certainly of a lesser order, since there can be no question that the defendants had their full day in court. ". . . there is by no means complete symmetry between binding the defendant to a favorable decree and binding the absentee to an unfavorable decree. Clearly, the defendant has been afforded his day in court; he has had the opportunity to present his case fully in his own right, and he has lost. He has no more reason to relitigate the entire controversy against the absentee members than he has to do so against the immediate plaintiff." Kalven and Rosenfield, op. cit., at 713.

---

[8] "It is familiar doctrine of the federal courts that members of a class not present as parties to the litigation may be bound by the judgment where they are ~~not~~ in fact adequately represented by parties who are present, or where they actually participate in the conduct of the litigation in which members of the class are present as parties . . . or where the interest of the members of the class, some of whom are present as parties, is joint, or where for any other reason the relationship between the parties present and those who are absent is such as legally to entitle the former to stand in judgment for the latter." [311 U.S. at 42-43.]

A considerable number of cases in the lower federal courts follow Professor Moore's view and hold that in a class action based upon the existence of a common question, relief will be limited to those who come before the court. Perhaps, the leading cases in this category are Oppenheimer v. F. J. Young & Co., 144 F. 2d 387 (C. A. 2) (class action by bondholders for damages), and Pentland v. Dravo Corp., 152 F. 2d 851 (C. A. 3), (representative suit to obtain overtime compensation under

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Fair Labor Standards Act [9]). Generally, the cases which hold that judgment will bind only the parties before the court have been actions for damages. The consideration that damages will vary from plaintiff to plaintiff has apparently been a practical consideration in inducing the holding that the effect of the decision will be confined to those who come into the proceeding. See Oppenheimer at 390; Pentland at 855.[10] In the situation presented by the Pentland case, the court was concerned, moreover, with the fact that separate defenses might be available as against some members of the plaintiff class.[11]

In "common question" cases in which relief of an equitable nature is sought, the courts have manifested a greater disposition to extend the benefits of the decree to absent members of a successful plaintiff class. Gramling v. Maxwell, 52 F. 2d 256 (W. D. N. C.), to which Mr. Justice Harlan referred at the oral argument, is an apt illustration.

---

[9] As the opinion in Penland shows, there have been numerous "common question" class suits under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

[10] Cf. McGrath v. Tadayasu Abo, 186 F. 2d 766 (C.A. 9), certiorari denied, 342 U.S. 832, in which determination of particular circumstances affecting each plaintiff was required.

[11] Thus, the court observed (p. 853):

> But because an employer fails to obey the law as to employee A, it does not follow that he has not obeyed it as employees B, C or D. B may not be engaged in interstate commerce or the production of goods for commerce, while A may. Employee C may be a salaried worker or a supervisor who does not come under the Act. Employee D may have been paid the statutory minimum and not have worked any overtime at all.

That suit was brought before a three-judge district court to restrain the North Carolina Commissioner of Revenue from collecting a tax on peddlers of fruits and vegetables. The ground of challenge was that the tax, which was not applicable to those purveying fruits and vegetables grown in North Carolina, was a burden on interstate commerce. The complainant, who owned 100 trucks, each of which would have been subject to a $50 license tax, sought an injunction on his own behalf and others similarly situated. Holding that the tax was unconstitutional, the court concluded that the injunction against attempted collection should run in favor of all members of the class, irrespective of the fact that some of its members would not have had standing (because of the absence of the requisite jurisdictional amount) to sue individually in the federal courts (pp. 260-263). In reaching this conclusion, the court emphasized the function of equity in avoiding an unnecessary multiplicity of litigation.[12]

In System Federation No. 91 v. Reed, 180 F. 2d 991 (C. A. 6), a representative suit by railroad employees to enjoin discrimination against the [12] In this connection, the opinion refers to Pomeroy's treatise. See note 5, supra. In his discussion of representative suits by taxpayers whose "only community . . . is in the questions at issue to be decided," Pomeroy declares that the decisions of many able courts have "demonstrated the fact that complete and final relief may be given to an entire community by means of one judicial decree, which would otherwise require an indefinite amount of separate litigation by individuals, even if it were attainable by any means." Pomeroy, op cit., pp. 529-537.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

acquisition of seniority rights by non-union employees, the decree forbade discrimination "against the plaintiffs and the classes represented by them" (p. 993). Subsequent to entry of the decree, a member of the class who was not a named plaintiff was permitted to come into the case and to apply for a citation of contempt (p. 998).

The same approach is reflected in numerous suits for injunctive relief challenging racial discrimination.

Mendez v. Westminster School District, 64 F. Supp. 544 (S. D. Cal.), affirmed, 161 F. 2d 774 (C. A. 9), was a class action against public school authorities to compel the admission of five named plaintiffs and some 5000 other Mexican children similarly situated. The court determined that the plaintiffs were entitled to injunctive relief restraining further discriminatory practices against "pupils of Mexican descent in the public schools of defendant school districts" (p. 551).

Draper v. City of St. Louis, 92 F. Supp. 546. (E. D. Mo.), appeal dismissed, 186 F. 2d 307 (C. A. 8), was a class action to compel admission of Negroes to a swiming pool maintained by the city. The court entered a decree prohibiting the defendant from denying admission to the named plaintiff and others of the Negro race.

Gonzales v. Sheely, 96 F. Supp. 1004 (D. Ariz.), was a class action to enjoin the segregation of students of Latin or Mexican descent within a school district. The court indicated that an injunction to this effect should issue.

Davis v. Cook, 80 F. Supp. 443 (N. D. Ga.), reversed on other grounds, 178 F. 2d 595 (C. A. 5), certiorari denied, 340 U. S. 811, was a class action brought by a Negro teacher on behalf of himself and all other Negro teachers and principals similarly situated to require the defendants to cease discriminating against Negro principals and teachers in respect to salaries. The district court determined that the named plaintiff was entitled to the relief sought for himself and for the "principals and teachers he represents." Thomas v. Hibbitts, 46 F. Supp. 368 (N. D. Tenn.), is to the same effect.

Wilson v. City of Paducah, 100 F. Supp. 116 (W. D. Ky.), was a representative suit brought to compel the admission of Negroes to a municipal junior college. The district court entered summary judgment on the motion of the named plaintiffs. Some ten months thereafter, two individuals who were not named in the original action moved to intervene, alleging that they had been denied admission to the college solely by reason of their race. The city contended that the original complaint did not establish the suit as a class action and that the judgment had not conferred rights upon individuals other than the named plaintiffs. It further contended that the motion to intervene was not timely. The court rejected both contentions, holding (1) that the question as to the class nature of the action had been disposed of on the motion for summary judgment and was res judicata, and (2) that the applicants, being members of the class, were entitled to intervene in order to secure to themselves the benefits afforded by the decree.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In light of the preceding discussion, we believe that there is no legal barrier to extending the relief in the instant cases to persons "similarly situated." As earlier noted, the defendants have had full opportunity to litigate the issues. The rights of the unnamed members of the classes do not differ in character from those of the named plaintiffs. There is no question of separate defenses. It appears, moreover, that to give truly effective relief to the few will actually require effective relief for the many. We conclude that the power of equity is sufficient to avoid the multiplicity of litigation which would doubtless follow from a decree limited to a relatively few plaintiffs, and that this Court may, and should, fashion decrees protecting the constitutional rights of children similarly situated.

III

In any event, members of the class who have not yet intervened are still eligible to do so

"Upon timely application anyone may be permitted to intervene in an action . . . (2) when an applicant's claim or defense and the main action have a question of law or fact in common" (Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 24(b)). The timeliness of an application is a matter for the discretion of the court. "In exercising its discretion the court shall consider whether the intervention will unduly delay or prejudice the adjudication of the rights of the original parties" (ibid.).[13]

Consistently with this rule, the district courts might entertain applications for intervention in the instant cases. Such applications, if made, would not delay or prejudice adjudication of the rights of the original parties; presumably, they would be made only to secure to unnamed members of the described classes the benefits of the relief ultimately decreed. If this Court should conclude that the decrees entered in these cases are to run only to named parties, it becomes particularly important that a liberal policy be adopted in permitting intervention by other members of the class, many of whom have undoubtedly assumed that the decrees would not be so restricted. Compare the liberal intervention policy followed in Pentland v. Dravo Corp., supra, 152 F. 2d at 856, and McGrath v. Tadayasu Abo, supra, 186 F. 2d at 769-770, and suggested in Guaranty Trust v. York, 143 F. 2d 503, 529, reversed on other grounds, 326 U. S. 99. And see Kalven and Rosenfield, op. cit., 8 U. of Chi. L. Rev. at 695 (". . . the basic function of the class suit is achieved only if the decree is held open to permit the absentee members of the class to come under the decree after the decision . . ."). This Court might insure the adoption of such a policy by an appropriate direction to the district courts.

If the Court should conclude that the decrees

---

[13] Rule 23, relating to class actions, is silent on the question of timeliness of intervention.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

should run to all members of the described classes, we presume that any member of a class would be entitled to vindicate his rights under the decree and to seek such ancillary orders as might prove necessary for that purpose. See System Federation No. 91 v. Reed and Wilson v. City of Paducah, discussed supra.

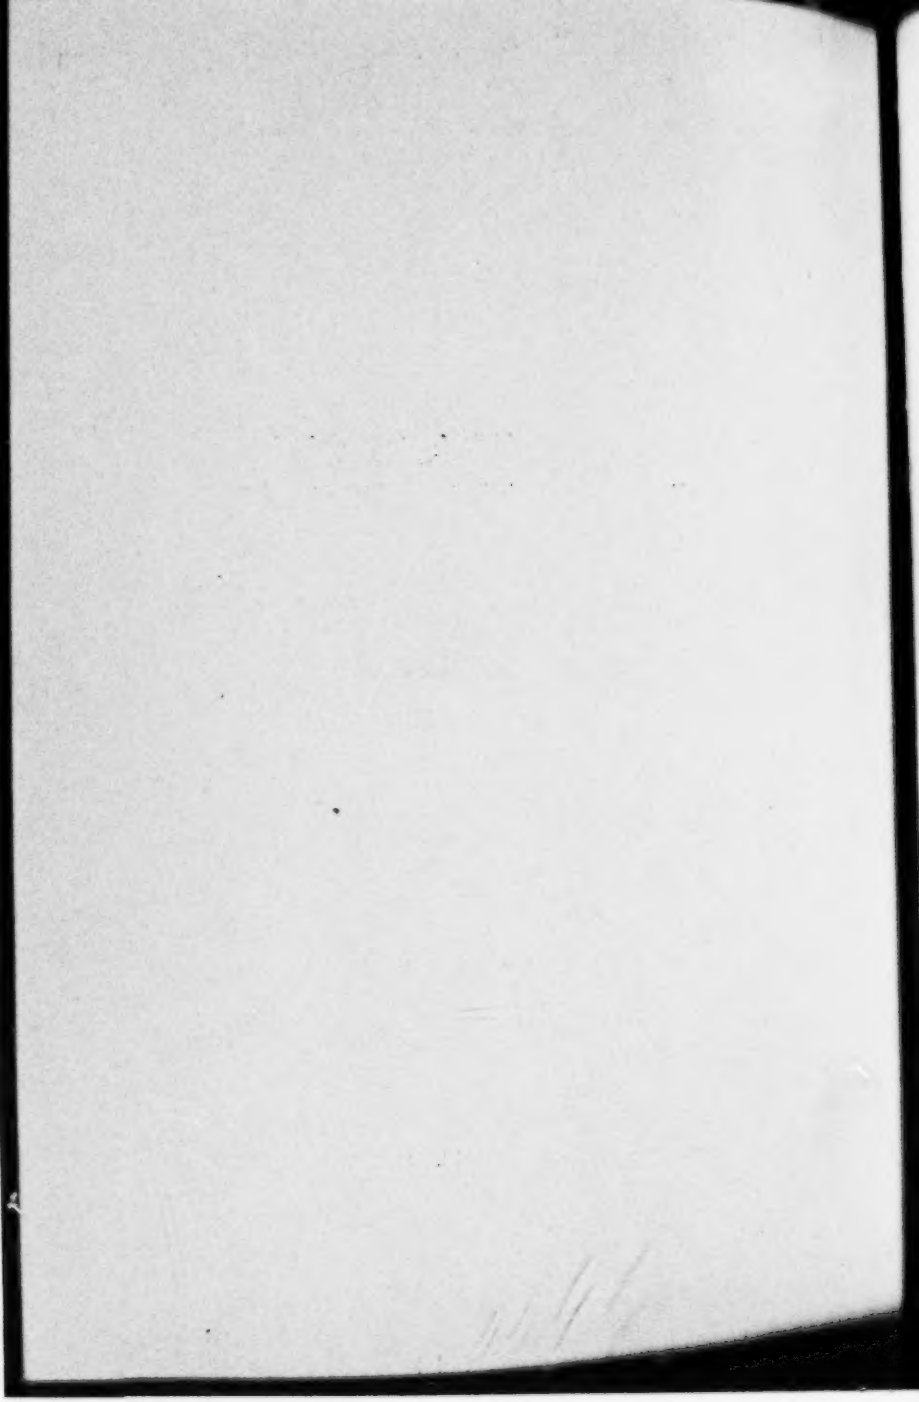
Respectfully submitted,

SIMON E. SOBELOFF,
Solicitor General.

PHILIP ELMAN,
RALPH S. SPRITZER,
Special Assistants to the Attorney General.

APRIL, 1955.

☆ U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1955 341396 1329



BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

JOINT APPENDIX

INDEX

	PAGE
Complaint	1
Motion for Interlocutory Injunction	14
Motion to Dismiss	18
Order	19
Notice of Appeal	20
Order allowing certiorari	21

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

JOINT APPENDIX

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Civil Action No. 4949-50

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, a minor by Sarah Bolling, his mother and next friend,
WANAMAKER VON BOLLING, a minor, by Sarah Bolling, his mother and next friend,
SARAH LOUISE BRISCOE, a minor, by William Briscoe, her father and next friend,
ADRIENNE JENNINGS, a minor, by James C. Jennings, her father and next best friend,
BARBARA JENNINGS, a minor, by James C. Jennings, her father and next best friend,
SARAH BOLLING, personally, 1732 Stanton Terrace, Southeast, Washington, D. C.,
WILLIAM BRISCOE, personally, 1232 Eaton Road, Southeast, Washington, D. C., JAMES C. JENNINGS, personally, 1139 Stevens Road, Southeast, Washington, D. C., and CONSOLIDATED PARENT GROUP, INC., a corporation, 1113 Montello Avenue, Northeast, Washington, D. C., Plaintiffs,

vs.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, 929 E Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C., ADELBERT W. LEE, 3211 Pennsylvania Ave., Southeast, Washington, D. C., LENORE W. SMITH, 3249 Newark Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C.
JAMES A. GANNON, 1915 Biltmore Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C.

VELMA G. WILLIAMS, 2700 Georgia Avenue, Northwest, Washington, D. C.,

ALBERT E. STEINEM, Colorado Building, Washington, D. C.,

ELVIRIA Z. MAGDEBURGER, 1612 Missouri Avenue, Northwest, Washington, D. C.,

PHILLIP T. JOHNSON, 1742 Sixth Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C.,

WOOLSEY W. HALL, 1330 Wallach Place, Northwest, Washington, D. C., being and constituting the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, and

HOBART M. CORNING, Superintendent of Schools, Franklin Administration Building,

NORMAN J. NELSON, First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Divisions 1-9, Franklin Administration Building,

GARNET C. WILKINSON, First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Divisions 10-13, Franklin Administration Building,

LAWSON J. CANTRELL, Associate Superintendent, Divisions 1-9, Franklin Administration Building, and

ELEANOR P. McAULIFFE, Principal, Sousa Junior High School, Defendants.

COMPLAINT

1. This is an action for an interlocutory injunction and a permanent injunction restraining defendants and each and every one of them from excluding minor plaintiffs from enrollment and instruction in the Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color, and from denying minor plaintiffs admission as students in said Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color, and from applying and so construing Statutes enacted by the Congress of the United States, providing for education of children in the District of Columbia, so as to require the exclusion of these minor plaintiffs from the Sousa Junior High School,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

and the denial of their admission thereto solely because of their race or color, and restraining the defendants and each and every one of them from taking steps which may lead to the criminal prosecution of the adult plaintiffs for failure to send their children, minor plaintiffs in this cause, to other schools in the District designated by the defendants as a part of the exclusion of these minor plaintiffs from the Sousa Junior High School solely on account of race or color, and seeking a declaratory judgment to the effect that Statutes enacted by Congress regulating public education in the District of Columbia do not require the exclusion of these plaintiffs from said Sousa Junior High School on the ground of race or color alone.

2. (a) The jusisdiction of this Court is invoked under Title 28, United States Code, section 1331. This action arises under the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; Article I, section 9, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, relating to the Bill of Attainder; and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, section 3 and Chapter IX, Articles 55 and 56, relating to the promotion, encouragement and observance of human rights without racial distinctions, as hereinafter more fully appears. The matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of Three Thousand ($3,000) Dollars, exclusive of interests and costs.

2. (b) The jurisdiction of this Court is also invoked under Title 28, United States Code, section 1343, which provides for the original jurisdiction of this Court in suits involving civil rights. This action is authorized by Title 8, United States Code, section 43, to be commenced by any citizen of the United States, or other person within the jurisdiction thereof, to redress the deprivation of the rights, privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and Title 8, United States Code, section 41, provides for the equal rights of citizens and of all other persons within the jurisdiction of the United States, as hereinafter more fully appears.

2. (c) The jurisdiction of this Court is also invoked under the general jurisdiction provision of the District of Columbia Code (1940), Title 11, section 301, and the jurisdiction of this Court as a Court of the United States under District of Columbia Code (1940), Title 11, section 305.

2. (d) The jurisdiction of this Court is also invoked under Title 28, United States Code, sections 2201 and 2202, relating to declaratory judgments.

3. Minor plaintiffs, Spottswood Thomas Bolling, Wanamaker Von Bolling, Sarah Louise Briscoe, Adrienne Jennings and Barbara Jennings, are Negroes, are residents of and domiciled in, the District of Columbia, are within the statutory age limits of eligibility to attend the public schools of said District of Columbia, possess all qulifications and satisfy all requirements for admission to the junior high schools in said District, and do now attend a junior high school in said District.

4. Adult Plaintiffs, Sarah Bolling, William Briscoe and James C. Jennings, are residents of, and domiciled in, the District of Columbia, are parents of minor plaintiffs, are taxpayers of the United States and of the District of Columbia, are required by law to send their respective children to the public schools of said District, and are subject to criminal prosecution for failure so to do. The Consolidated Parent Group, Inc., is a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia which has for its objective, as outlined in its Constitution, "to seek, by every lawful means, to promote abolition of racial segregation and other discriminatory practices now invoked upon minority groups in the public schools and recreational areas of the District of Columbia; and to engage, as a non-profit organization, in educating the community towards these goals."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

5. All plaintiffs bring this action in their own behalf, and, there being common questions of law and fact affecting the rights of all Negro citizens of the United States residing in the District of Columbia similarly situated, who are so numerous as to make it impracticable to bring all before the Court, and a common relief being sought, as will hereinafter more fully appear, bring this action pursuant to Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, as a class suit on behalf of themselves and of all Negro citizens of the United States residing in the District of Columbia similarly situated and affected, as will hereinafter more fully appear. The interests of all members of the class above referred to are fairly and adequately represented in this suit.

6. (a) Defendants C. Melvin Sharpe, Adelbert W. Lee, Lenore W. Smith, James A. Gannon, Velma G. Williams, Albert E. Steinem, Elviria Z. Magdeburger, Phillip T. Johnson and Woolsey W. Hall now constitute the Board of Education of the District of Columbia. The Board of Education of the District of Columbia has, under law, control of the public schools of the District of Columbia, and is empowered to determine all questions of policy relating to the schools, to appoint specified executive officers and define their duties, and to direct expenditures. (District of Columbia Code, Title 31, sections 101 and 103, June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, 317, Chapter 3446, section 2; January 26, 1929, 45 Stat. 1139, Chapter 105).

6. (b) Defendant Hobart M. Corning is the superintendent of all the public schools in the District of Columbia, who, under law, has direction of, and supervision in, all matters pertaining to the instruction in all the schools under the Board of Education, controls personnel in all the schools, and performs such other duties necessary for the operation of the public school system as may be authorized by the Board of Education. (District of Columbia Code, Title 31, sections 105 and 106, June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 317, Chapter 3446, section 3; April 22, 1932, 47 Stat. 134, Chapter 131, Section 1).

6. (c) Defendant Norman J. Nelson is first assistant suintendent of schools, Division 1-9, who, under law, has general supervision over the white schools of the District of Columbia, under the direction of the superintendent of schools. (Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Congress, 1st Session, as amended by Act of October 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 18st Congress, 1st Session.)

6. (d) Defendant Garnet C. Wilkinson is first assistant superintendent of schools, Division 10-13, who, under law, has sole charge of all employees, classes and schools in which colored children are taught, under the direction of the superintendent of schools. (Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Congress, 1st Session, as amended by Act of October 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 81st Congress, 1st Session.)

6. (e) Defendant Lawson J. Cantrell is associate superintendent of schools, Divisions 1-9, who has immediate charge of, and responsibility for, the general direction and supervision of instruction, organization and management of the white junior and vocational high schools of the District of Columbia, under the direction of the first assistant superintendent of schools, Division 1-9, including Sousa Junior High School.

6. (f) Defendant Eleanor P. McAuliffe is principal of Sousa Junior High School and has direct administrative and supervisory jurisdiction of pupils, teachers, and clerical, custodial and maintenance personnel, as well as the operation of the school, under the direction of the Associate Superintendent of schools, Division 1-9, who, under law, has junior and vocational high schools of the District of Columbia.

6. (g) All defendants are sued in their official capacities.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

7. On the 11th day of September, 1950, the minor plaintiffs, possessing all qualifications for admission to the Sousa Junior High School, presented themselves at the said junior high school for registration therein, within the time and at the place specified for such registration, and were refused admission by defendant Eleanor P. McAuliffe, Principal of Sousa Junior High School, solely because of their race or color.

On the 27th day of October, 1950, the minor plaintiffs, through their parents and attorneys, requested defendant Lawson J. Cantrell to admit said minor plaintiffs to Sousa Junior High School and were refused admission by the said defendant, solely because of their race or color.

On the 31st day of October, 1950, the minor plaintiffs, through their attorneys, requested defendant Norman J. Nelson to admit said minor plaintiffs to Sousa Junior High School and were refused admission by the said defendant, solely because of their race or color.

On the 31st day of October, 1950, the minor plaintiffs, through their attorneys, requested defendant Hobart M. Corning to admit said minor plaintiffs to Sousa Junior High School and were refused admission by the said defendant, solely because of their race or color.

On the 31st day of October, 1950, the minor plaintiffs appealed through their attorneys, to the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, the administrative body having the final authority on admission to public schools in the District of Columbia, and requested admission to Sousa Junior High School.

On November 1, 1950, the defendant Board voted to uphold the actions of its subordinates described above, and to deny and exclude minor plaintiffs from enrollment and instruction in Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color.

8. The defendants, and each of them, have pursued and are pursuing, the policy, practice, custom and usage of denying minor plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated admission to and excluding them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School, and from enjoyment of the educational opportunities afforded therein solely because of their race or color, thus depriving minor plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated of their liberty and property without due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

9. The defendants, and each of them, pursued and are pursuing, the policy, practice, custom and usage of denying minor plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated admission to and excluding them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School, and from enjoyment of the educational opportunities afforded therein solely because of their race or color, in violation of Title 8, United States Code, section 41, which provides that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to the full and equal benefits of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white persons, and shall be subjected to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses and exactions of every kind, and to no other.

10. The defendants, and each of them, have pursued and are pursuing, the policy, practice, custom and usage of denying minor plaintiffs, and other Negro children similarly situated, admission to and excluding them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School, and from enjoyment of the educational opportunities afforded therein solely because of their race or color, in violation of Title 8, United States Code, section 43, which provides for a civil action for the deprivation of any rights, privileges or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws.

11. The defendants, and each of them, are construing and applying Acts of Congress so as to require them to deny to

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the minor plaintiffs, and other Negro children similarly situated, admission to and to exclude them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School, for no other reason than because of their race or color, thus depriving minor plaintiffs of their liberty and property without due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the Untied States.

12. The defendants, and each of them, are construing and applying Acts of Congress so as to require them to deny to the minor plaintiffs, and other Negro children similarly situated, admission to and to exclude them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color, in violation of Title 8, United States Code, section 41, which provides that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subjected to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses and exactions of every kind, and to no other.

13. The defendants, and each of them, are construing and applying Acts of Congress so as to require them to deny to the minor plaintiffs, and other Negro children similarly situated, admission to and to exclude them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color, in violation of Title 8, United States Code, Section 43, which provides for a civil action for the deprivation of any rights, privileges or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws.

14. The defendants, and each of them, are construing and applying Acts of Congress so as to require them to deny to the minor plaintiffs, and other Negro children similarly situated, admission to and to exclude them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color, in violation of Article I,

Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States which forbids a Bill of Attainder.

15. The defendants, and each of them, have pursued, and continue to pursue, the policy, practice, custom and usage of excluding minor plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated from attendance at, and denying them admission to, the Sousa Junior High School and the educational opportunities afforded therein, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, section 3, which submits that the purpose of the United Nations is directed to the solution of economic, social, cultural, and humanitarian problems, and includes promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion; and Chapter IX, Article 55, which provides that the subscribers of the Charter with respect to the enumerated principles shall promote, respect and observe human rights and fundamental freedoms without racial, liguistic, religious or sex distinctions; and Chapter IX, Article 56, which pledges all member signatories to take joint and separate action for the achievement of the purposes set forth in the foregoing sections. 59 Statutes 1035 ff, U.S. Code, Congressional Service, 79th Congress, 1945, p. 964 et seq.

16. A present actual case or controversy exists between plaintiffs and defendants. Plaintiffs, and other Negroes similarly situated, on whose behalf this suit is brought, are suffering irreparable injury in the future by reason of the acts of defendants hereinbefore set forth. They have no plain, adequate or complete remedy to redress the wrongs or illegal acts hereinbefore set forth other than this action for an injunction. Any other remedy to which plaintiffs, and other Negroes similarly situated, could be remitted would be attended by such uncertainties and delays as to deny substantial relief, would involve a multiplicity of suits, and would cause further irreparable injury, damage, vexation and inconvenience to plaintiffs and other Negroes similarly situated.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

WHEREFORE, the plaintiffs respectfully pray:

1. That this Court enter a declaratory judgment pursuant to Rule 57 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, stating that the defendants are without right in construing the statutes having to do with public education in the District of Columbia so as to require said defendants to exclude the minor plaintiffs from attendance at the Sousa Junior High School and denying to them the right of attendance at the Sousa Junior High School in violation of their rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by Title 8, United States Code, sections 41 and 43, and by Article I, section 9, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting legislation in the nature of a Bill of Attainder and by the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56, and further stating that the said defendants are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor plaintiffs to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them because of their race or color.

2. That this Court enter an interlocutory injunction restraining defendants, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents and employees from precluding the admission of minor plaintiffs, and other Negro children similarly situated to the Sousa Junior High School, for no other reason than because of their race or color, upon the grounds that said refusal of admission as applied to minor plaintiffs, or other Negro children similarly situated, in whose behalf they sue, denies them their privileges and immunities as citizens of the United States and is in violation of their rights as enunciated under the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, sections 41 and 43, Article I, section 9, clause 3, of the constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56.

3. That this Court enter an interlocutory injunction requiring defendants, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents and employees to admit the minor plaintiffs to attendance at the Sousa Junior High School, and other Negroes similarly situated to said Sousa Junior High School in conformity with their rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, Article I, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56.

And plaintiffs respectfully pray further that upon a full hearing hereof:

4. That this Court enter a permanent injunction restraining defendants, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents and employees from precluding the admission of minor plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated to the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race and color, upon the grounds that said refusal of admission as applied to minor plaintiffs or other Negroes similarly situated, in whose behalf they sue, denies them their privileges and immunities as citizens of the United States, and is in violation of their rights as enunciated under the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, Article I, Section 9, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56.

5. That this Court enter a permanent injunction requiring defendants, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents and employees to admit the minor plaintiffs to attendance to the Sousa Junior High School in conformity with the rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and Article I, Section 9, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Section 55 and 56.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

6. That this Court allow plaintiffs their costs herein, and grant them such further, other, additional or alternative relief as may appear to the Court to be equitable and just in the premises.

Sarah Bolling, personally, and as mother and next of friend of Spottswood Thomas Bolling and Wanamaker Von Bolling, minors.
William Briscoe, personally, and as father and next of friend of Sarah Louise Briscoe, minor.
James C. Jennings, personally, and as father and next of friend of Adrienne Jennings and Barbara Jennings, minors.
Gardner L. Bishop, President, Consolidated Parent Group, Incorporated.

Plaintiffs.

George E. C. Hayes, 613 F Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C. National 2702.
Harry B. Merican, 1815 17th Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C.
James M. Nabrit, Jr., 330 College Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C.
Attorneys for the plaintiffs.
Julian R. Dugas, Sr.
George M. Johnson
Herbert O. Reid, Sr.
James A. Washington, Jr.
Of Counsel.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, SS:

We, Sarah Bolling, William Briscoe, James C. Jennings and Gardner L. Bishop, personally and respectfully in our reperesentative capacities, as hereinbefore indicated, being first duly sworn, depose and state that we have read the foregoing Complaint by us subscribed and know the contents thereof, and that all matters stated therein to our own personal knowledge are true, and those alleged upon information and belief we believe to be true.

Sarah Bolling, personally, and as mother and next of friend of Spottwood Thomas Bolling and Wanamaker Von Bolling, minors.

William Briscoe, personally, and as father and next of friend of Sarah Louise Briscoe, minor.

James C. Jennings, personally, and as father and next of friend of Adrienne Jennings and Barbara Jennings, minors.

Gardner L. Bishop, President, Consolidated Parent Group, Incorporated.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 7th day of November, 1950.

Don Lockett Young, Notary Public, D. C.

Filed Nov. 9, 1950. Harry M. Hull, Clerk

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Civil Action No. 4949-50

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, a minor, by Sarah Bolling, his mother and next friend,

WANAMAKER VON BOLLING, a minor, by Sarah Bolling, his mother and next friend,

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

SARAH LOUIS BRISCOE, a minor, by William Briscoe, her father and next friend,
ADRIENNE JENNINGS, a minor, by James C. Jennings, her father and next friend,
BARBARA JENNINGS, a minor, by James C. Jennings, her father and next friend,
SARAH BOLLING, personally, 1732 Stanton Terrace, Southeast, Washington, D. C.,
WILLIAM BRISCOE, personally, 1323 Eaton Road, Southeast, Washington, D. C., JAMES C. JENNINGS, personally, 1139 Stevens Road, Southeast, Washington, D. C.,

and

CONSOLIDATED PARENT GROUP, INC., a corporation, 1113 Montello Avenue, Northeast, Washington, D. C., Plaintiffs,

vs.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, 929 E Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C., ADELBERT W. LEE, 3211 Pennsylvania Ave., Southeast, Washington, D. C., LENORE W. SMITH, 3249 Howard Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C.,
JAMES A. GANNON, 1915 Biltmore Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C.,
VELMA G. WILLIAMS, 2700 Georgia Avenue, Northwest, Washington, D. C.,
ALBERT E. STEINEM, Colorado Building, Washington, D. C.,
ELVIRIA Z. MAGDEBURGER, 1612 Missouri Avenue, Northwest, Washington, D. C., PHILIP T. JOHNSON, 1742 Sixth Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C.,

WOOLSEY W. HALL, 1330 Wallach Place, Northwest, Washington, D. C., being and constituting the Board of Education of the District of Columbia

and

HOBART M. CORNING, Superintendent of Schools, Franklin Administration Building,

NORMAN J. NELSON, First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Divisions 1-9, Franklin Administration Building,

GARNET C. WILKINSON, First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Divisions 10-13, Franklin Administration Building,

LAWSON J. CANTRELL, Associate Superintendent, Divisions 1-9, Frankling Administration Building,

and

ELEANOR P. McAULIFFE, Principal, Sousa Junior High School,

Defendants.

MOTION FOR INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTION

The plaintiffs, by their attorneys, George E. C. Hayes, Harry B. Merican and James M. Nabrit, Jr., move this Court for an order granting an interlocutory injunction against the defendants, their successors in office, their agents, employees and servants, attorneys, and all persons in active concert or participation with them, pending this suit, and until further order of this Court, in accordance with the prayers numbered 2 and 3 as set forth in the complaint filed herein.

In support of this motion the plaintiffs attach their verified complaint, and in addition, state:

1. Unless restrained, the defendant will continue to ex-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

clude the plaintiffs, and other Negro children on whose behalf they sue, from admission to Sousa Junior High School, solely because of their race or color.

2. Irreparable injury, loss and damage has been caused the minor plaintiffs by the defendants' acts of excluding said minor plaintiffs from, and denying them admission to, the Sousa Junior High School on September 11, 1950, the opening date for the public schools of the District of Columbia; and the defendants, by continuing to exclude minor plaintiffs from attendance at, and admission to, the Sousa Junior High School, are causing further irreparable injury, loss and damage to the minor plaintiffs by denying to them the educational instruction and opportunities to which they are constitutionally entitled during the current school year.

3. If the defendants continue to exclude minor plaintiffs from, and deny them admission to, the Sousa Junior High School, and the educational opportunities afforded therein any judgment this Court may later render on final determination of this action will be ineffective to repair the injury, damage and loss currently being suffered, and the final judgment of this Court will not therefore give the minor plaintiffs the full and complete remedy to which they are entitled for a violation of their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

4. If this interlocutory injunction be granted, the injury, if any, to the defendants, if final judgment be in their favor, will be inconsequential and may adequately be indemnified by bond.

George E. C. Hayes, 613 F Street, N. W.; Harry B. Merican, 1815 17th St., N. W.; James M. Nabrit, Jr., 330 College Street, N. W., Attorneys for plaintiffs.

EXHIBIT 3

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Civil Action No. 4949-50

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, ET AL.,
Plaintiffs,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, ET AL.,
Defendants.

MOTION TO DISMISS

The defendants move to dismiss the above-entitled cause on the ground that the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

(s) Vernon E. West, Corporation Counsel, D. C.;
(s) Oliver Gasch, Assistant Corporation Counsel, D. C.; (s) Milton D. Korman, Assistant Corporation Counsel, D. C.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

EXHIBIT 1

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Civil Action No. 4949-50

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, ET AL.,
Plaintiffs,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, ET AL.,
Defendants.

ORDER

Upon consideration of the complaint, of the motion of the defendants to dismiss the above-entitled cause, of the memoranda of points and authorities in support of and in opposition to said motion, and of the arguments of counsel for the plaintiffs and for the defendants, it is, by the Court, this 9th day of April, 1951,

ORDERED, that the above-entitled cause be, and it is hereby, finally dismissed.

(s) Walter M. Bastian, Judge.

Copy of the foregoing form of Order mailed to George E. C. Hayes, Esq., attorney for plaintiffs, 613 F Street, N.W., Washington, D. C., this 9th day of April, 1951.

Milton D. Korman, Assistant Corporation Counsel, D. C., attorney for defendants.

Filed Apr. 10, 1951. Harry M. Hull, Clerk.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Civil No. 4949-50

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, et al.,
Plaintiffs,

vs.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, et al.,
Defendants.

NOTICE OF APPEAL

Notice is hereby given this 10th day of April, 1951, that the plaintiffs, Spottswood Thomas Bolling, et al., hereby appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia from the judgment of this Court entered on the 9th day of April, 1951, in favor of the defendants, C. Melvin Sharpe, et al., against said Spottswood Thomas Bolling, et al.

George E. C. Hayes, attorney for plaintiffs.

Serve: Milton D. Korman, Esq., Assistant Corporation Counsel, D. C., attorney for defendants.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, OCTOBER TERM, 1952

No. 413

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, et al., Petitioners,

vs.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, et al.

ORDER ALLOWING CERTIORARI—Filed November 10, 1952

The petition herein for a writ of certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit is granted. Case is assigned for argument immediately following No. 191.

And it is further ordered that the duly certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings below which accompanied the petition shall be treated as though filed in response to such writ.

FILE COPY

FILED
OCT 24 19
HAROLD B. WILLEY, C

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1952

No. 413 8 4

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, ET AL.,
Petitioners,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, ET AL.,
Respondents.

Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

GEORGE E. C. HAYES
JAMES M. NABRIT, JR.
Counsel for Petitioners

JULIAN R. DUGAS
GEORGE M. JOHNSON
HARRY B. MERICAN
HERBERT O. REID, JR.
JAMES A. WASHINGTON
DORSEY E. LANE
Of Counsel

Printed by Law Reporter Printing Co., 518 5th St., Wash., D. C.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
SUMMARY STATEMENT OF MATTERS INVOLVED	1
BASIS OF JURISDICTION	5
ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR	6
QUESTIONS PRESENTED	6
CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS, TREATY AND STATUTES INVOLVED	7
REASONS RELIED UPON FOR ALLOWANCE OF A WRIT	8
CONCLUSION	9

Table of Statutes Cited

Art. 1, sec. 9, cl. 3 of the Constitution of the United States	3, 4, 6, 7
Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States	3, 4, 6, 7
Title 8, U.S.C. § 41	3, 4, 5, 6, 7
Title 8, U.S.C. § 43	3, 4, 5, 6, 7
Title 28, U.S.C. § 1254(1)	5
Title 28, U.S.C. § 1291	5
Title 28, U.S.C. § 1331	5
Title 28, U.S.C. § 1343	5
Title 28, U.S.C. § 2101(e)	5
Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chap. 180, Sec. 6, as amended June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chap. 3446, Sec. 2 (D. C. Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 1110, 1111, 1112, 1113)	7
Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chap. 3446, Sec. 2 (D. C. Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 1109)	7
Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chap. 3446, Sec. 7, as amended by Act of June 4, 1924, 43 Stat. 370, Chap. 250, Art. 3 (D. C. Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 115)	7
Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Chap. 140, Art. I, Secs. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 201, 207)	2, 7
Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Congress, 1st Session, as amended by Act of October 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 81st Congress, 1st Session	7
Art. 1(3) of the Charter of the United Nations	3, 4, 7
Art. 2(2) of the Charter of the United Nations	3, 4, 7
Sec. 55(c) of the Charter of the United Nations	3, 4, 7
Sec. 56 of the Charter of the United Nations	3, 4, 7
Title 11, D. C. Code (1940), § 301	6
Title 11, D. C. Code (1940), § 305	6

Rules

	Page
Rule 57, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure	3
Rules 38 and 39, Supreme Court of U. S.	8

Table of Cases Cited

Briggs, et al., v. Elliott, et al., No. 101, October Terms, 1952, — U. S. —	8
Brown, et al., v. Board of Education of Topeka, et al., No. 8, October Term, 1952, — U. S. —	8
Browne, et al. v. Magdeburger, et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950)	4
Carr, et al. v. Corning, et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950)	4, 8
Davis, et al. v. County School Board, et al., No. 191, October Term, 1952, — U. S. —	8
Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816 (1949)	8
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 636 (1949)	8
Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 636 (1949)	8
The Conqueror, 166 U. S. 110 (1897)	9
Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D. C. 50 (1910)	8

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1952

No. .....

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, ET AL.,
Petitioners,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, ET AL.,
Respondents.

Petition for a Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

To the Honorable, the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Petitioners, Spottswood Thomas Bolling, et al., pray that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in the above-entitled cause which is now pending before the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

SUMMARY STATEMENT OF MATTERS INVOLVED

On the 11th day of September, 1950, and during the time when respondents were receiving students for enrollment and instruction in Sousa Junior High School, a public school in the District of Columbia attended solely by white children, all of the minor petitioners, Negroes between the ages of 7 and 16 years, citizens of the United States, residents of and domiciled in the District of Columbia, within the statutory age limits for eligibility to attend the public schools of the District of Columbia and subject to the compulsory school attendance law of the District of Columbia, accompanied by their parents, adult petitioners, presented themselves to respondent Eleanor P. McAuliffe, the principal of Sousa Junior High School, for enrollment and instruction therein. The adult petitioners are taxpayers and citizens of the District of Columbia, and are required by law to send their respective children, minor petitioners, to the specific public schools designated by the respondents, and are subject to criminal prosecution for failure so to do. Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Ch. 140, Art. I, Sec. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 201, 207). Each minor petitioner was denied and excluded from enrollment and instruction at the Sousa Junior High School solely because of his race or color.

On the 27th day of October, 1950, minor petitioners, through their attorneys, appealed to respondent Lawson J. Cantrell, Associate Superintendent of Schools in charge of the vocational and junior high schools in the District of Columbia, Divisions 1-9 (now Division I), restricted to white pupils. Again each minor petitioner was denied and excluded from enrollment and instruction at the Sousa Junior High School solely because of his race or color.

On the 31st day of October, 1950, minor petitioners, through their attorneys, appealed to respondent Norman J. Nelson, First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Divisions 1-9, restricted to white pupils, and to respondent Hobart M. Corning, Superintendent of all the public schools in the District of Columbia, and each denied and excluded each minor petitioner from enrollment and instruction at Sousa Junior High School solely because of his race or color.

On the 1st day of November, 1950, the respondent Board of Education of the District of Columbia upheld the actions

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

of the other respondents and itself denied and excluded minor petitioners from enrollment and instruction at Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color.

Having exhausted their administrative remedies, thereafter and on November 9, 1950, petitioners, on their own behalf and on behalf of others similarly situated, filed a complaint (R. pp. 2-11) and brought a class suit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, against the respondents in their respective official capacities. The action sought a declaratory judgment pursuant to Rule 57 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, stating that the defendants are without right in construing the statutes having to do with public education in the District of Columbia so as to require said defendants to exclude the minor plaintiffs from attendance at the Sousa Junior High School and denying to them the right of attendance at the Sousa Junior High School in violation of their rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by Title 8, United States Code, sections 41 and 43, and by Article I, section 9, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting legislation in the nature of a Bill of Attainder and by the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56, and further stating that the said defendants are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor plaintiffs to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them because of their race or color.

The action further sought an interlocutory and a permanent injunction restraining defendants, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents, and employees from precluding the admission of minor plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated to the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race and color, upon the grounds that said refusal of admission as applied to minor plaintiffs or other Negroes similarly situated, in whose behalf they sue, denies them their privileges and immunities as citizens of the United States, and is in violation of their rights as enunciated under the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, Article I, Section 9, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56.

The action also sought an interlocutory and a permanent injunction requiring defendants, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents and employees to admit the minor plaintiffs to attendance to the Sousa Junior High School in conformity with the rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and Article I, Section 9, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Section 55 and 56.

Subsequently, the respondents, through their attorneys, filed a motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted (R. p. 17). On April 9, 1951, the Honorable Walter M. Bastian granted the motion to dismiss (R. p. 18). The District Judge was of the opinion that he was bound by the holdings of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Carr, et al. v. Corning, 86 App. D.C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950), and Browne, et al. v. Magdeburger, et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950).

An appeal was taken to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit (R. p. 19), and briefs were filed therein. This case has not been set down for oral argument, nor has it been submitted for judgment on the briefs, and no orders with respect thereto have been entered by that Court.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

BASIS OF JURISDICTION

1. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1254 (1) and 2101 (e).

2. The jurisdiction for the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia was invoked under Title 28, United States Code, Section 1291.

3(a). The jurisdiction of the District Court for the District of Columbia was invoked under Title 28, United States Code, Section 1331. This action arises under the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States; Article I, section 9, clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, relating to the Bill of Attainder; and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, section 3 and Chapter IX, Articles 55 and 56, relating to the promotion, encouragement and observance of human rights without racial distinctions, as hereinafter more fully appears. The matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of Three Thousand ($3,000) Dollars, exclusive of interests and costs.

3(b). The jurisdiction of the District Court for the District of Columbia was also invoked under Title 28, United States Code, section 1343, which provides for the original jurisdiction of this Court in suits involving civil rights. This action is authorized by Title 8, United States Code, section 43, to be commenced by any citizen of the United States, or other persons within the jurisdiction thereof, to redress the deprivation of the rights, privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and Title 8, United States Code, section 41, provides for the equal rights of citizens and of all other persons within the jurisdiction of the United States, as hereinafter more fully appears.

3(c). The jurisdiction of the District Court for the District of Columbia was also invoked under the general jurisdiction provision of the District of Columbia Code (1940), Title 11, section 301, and the jurisdiction of this Court as a Court of the United States under District of Columbia Code (1940), Title 11, section 305.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR

The District Court of the District of Columbia erred in granting respondents' motion to dismiss minor petitioners' complaint on the ground that it failed to state a complaint on which relief could be granted.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

The questions presented here are:

1. Whether or not the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, in interpreting and enforcing certain Acts of Congress so as to require white and colored pupils to attend separate schools, deprives Negro minor petitioners of rights secured to them by the Constitution of the United States.

2. Whether or not the respondents in denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color, deprived them of liberty and property in violation of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

3. Whether or not the respondents in denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color, deprived them of their civil rights in violation of Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43.

4. Whether or not the respondents in denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color, deprived them of educational opportunities in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter 1, Article 1, Section 3, and Chapter IX, Article 55, and Chapter IX, Article 56.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

5. Whether or not segregation of the races for educational purposes in the District of Columbia is constitutionally permissible.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS, TREATY AND STATUTES INVOLVED

Constitutional Provisions:

Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, Article 1, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States.

Treaty:

Article 1(3), 2(2), 55(c) and 56 of The United Nations Charter, 59 Stat. 1035 et seq.

Statutes:

(A) Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43.

(B) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chap. 180, Sec. 6, as amended June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chap. 3446, Sec. 2 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 1110, 1111, 1112, 1113).

(C) Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chap. 3446, Sec. 2 (D. C. Code 1951 Edition, Title 31, Sec. 1109).

(D) Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chap. 3446, Sec. 7, as amended by Act of June 4, 1924, 43 Stat. 370, Chap. 250, Art. 3 (D. C. Code 1951 Edition, Title 31, Sec. 115).

(E) Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Congress, 1st Session, as amended by Act of Oct. 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 81st Congress, 1st Session.

(F) Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Chap. 140, Art. I, Secs. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code 1951 Edition, Title 31, Sec. 201, 207).

REASONS RELIED UPON FOR ALLOWANCE OF A WRIT

First, the questions involved are of grave public concern. The petitioners here allege that respondents refused to admit certain Negro children to a public school in the District of Columbia solely because of their race or color, and that such action on the part of the respondents deprived them of their rights under the Federal Constitution. The constitutional issues thus raised are recognized by the government of the United States to be of national and international concern and interest. See: The Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights, "To Secure These Rights" (1947); The President's Commission of Higher Education, 1 Higher Education for American Democracy (1947); Government's Briefs in Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816 (1949), Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1949), and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 636 (1949).

Secondly, since the issues here are so related to those posed in three cases now pending before this Court and consolidated for oral argument, it would appear to be within the public interest to consider simultaneously the petitioners' cause as well. Brown, et al. v. Board of Education of Topeka, et al.; Briggs, et al. v. Elliott, et al.; Davis, et al. v. County School Board, et al., Nos. 8, 101, and 191, October 8, 1952, Per Curiam.

Thirdly, although the questions raised have been considered in whole or in part by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, and decided adversely to the contentions of the petitioners, Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D.C. 50 (1910); Carr, et al. v. Corning, 86 App. D.C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950), the important Federal questions which are involved have never been submitted to this Court for consideration and judgment. Rules of the Supreme Court of the United States, Rules 38 and 39.

Fourthly, the facts of this case would appear to require

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

an early interposition by this Court in order to avoid further delay and further irreparable damage by a continuation of the denial to the minor petitioners of the educational instruction and opportunities to which they are entitled. The Conqueror, 166 U.S. 110, 113-114 (1897).

CONCLUSION

The petitioners respectfully request that for the foregoing reasons this Court grant this writ of certiorari and such other and further relief in the premises as may be just and proper.

GEORGE E. C. HAYES
JAMES M. NABRIT, JR.
Counsel for Petitioners

JULIAN R. DUGAS
GEORGE M. JOHNSON
HARRY B. MERICAN
HERBERT O. REID, JR.
JAMES A. WASHINGTON
DORSEY E. LANE
Of Counsel

FILE COPY
NOV
HAROLD B.

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1952

No. ~~413~~ 8 4

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, Et Al.,
Petitioners

V.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, Et Al.,
Respondents

BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS

GEORGE E. C. HAYES
JAMES M. NABRIT, JR.
Counsel for Petitioners

JULIAN R. DUGAS
GEORGE M. JOHNSON
DORSEY E. LANE
HARRY B. MERICAN
HERBERT O. REID, JR.
JAMES A. WASHINGTON
Of Counsel

Printed by Law Reporter Printing Co., 518 5th St., Wash., D. C.

INDEX

	PAGE
OPINION BELOW	1
JURISDICTION	1
QUESTIONS PRESENTED	2
TREATY AND STATUTES INVOLVED	3
STATEMENT OF THE CASE	4
ERRORS RELIED UPON	8
SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT	9
ARGUMENT	10
I. The action of respondents in excluding minor petitioners from admission to Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color and in refusing to permit adult petitioners to enroll their children in Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color deprives petitioners of their liberty and property without due process of law in contravention of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States	10
(A) Respondents' actions in regulating and administering the educational system of the District of Columbia pursuant to and under color of congressional authority, are limited by the provisions of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment	10
(B) The educational rights which petitioners assert are fundamental rights protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment from unreasonable or arbitrary restrictions	13
(C) The official action of respondents excluding minor petitioners from admission to Sousa Junior High School, solely because of race or color is immediately suspect and must be tested by standards laid down by this Court to determine whether petitioners' rights protected by the Fifth Amendment have been violated	16
(D) Petitioners sustain injury as the direct result of the action of respondents in excluding minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color	22
II. The Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia do not compel their segregation solely on the basis of race or color	23

PAGE

(A) The language of the Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia does not compel segregation of Negroes from whites 23

(B) An interpretation by this Court that these Acts of Congress compel the segregation of pupils in the District of Columbia solely on the basis of race or color alone would render them unconstitutional for they would then be met with the prohibitions of Article I. Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the limitations set by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States 31

(C) If these Acts of Congress are interpreted as permitting the segregation of pupils in the District of Columbia solely on the basis of race or color, then to the extent that this permissive legislation is implemented by the action of the appellees in denying admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School, the action of respondents is unconstitutional 48

III. The denial of admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color deprives them of their civil rights in violation of Artcile VI, Clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States and of Title 8 United States Code, Section 41 and 43, and in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, and Chapter IX, Articles 55 and 56 48

(A) The respondents' refusal to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely because of race deprives them of their civil rights in violation of Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, commonly referred to as the Civil Rights Act 48

(B) The respondents' refusal to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely because of race deprives them of fundamental freedoms in violation of Chapter I, Articles 1(3), 2(2), Chapter IX, Articles 55(c) and 56 of the Charter of the United Nations 54

IV. The Court below erred in not granting petitioners the relief prayed for and in granting appellees' motion to dismiss minor petitioners' complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted 62

CONCLUSION 64

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

TABLE OF CASES CITED

PAGE

Bacardi Corp v. Domanech, 311 U. S. 150, 85 L. Ed., 98 (1940) 56
Balfour, Guthrie & Co. v. United States, 90 F. Supp. 831 (N.D. Cal. S.D. 1950) 58
Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. U. S., 298 U. S. 349, (1938) 12
Browne, et al. v. Magdeburger, et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950) 7, 33
Callen v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540 (1888) 11
Capital Traction Co. v. Hof., 174 U. S. 1 (1899) 11
Carr, et al. v. Corning et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182, F. (2d) 14 (1950) 7, 27, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 41
Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall, 277 (1866) 22, 42, 46
Curran v. City of New York, 191 Misc. 229, 7 N.Y.S. (2d) 206, (1940); aff'd 275 App. Div. 784, 88 N.Y.S. (2d) 924 (1949) 59
Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283 (1944) 12, 19, 27
Ex Parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333 (1866) 36
Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284 (1927) 14, 17
Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253 (1829) 56
Fujii v. State, 242 P (2d) 617 (1952) 60
Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475 (1903) 22
Georgetown College v. Hughes, 130 F. (2d) 810 (1942) 15
Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816 (1950) 41, 53
Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100 (1943) 11, 18, 21, 53
Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24 (1948) 16, 49, 50, 52
Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214 (1944) 17, 18, 21
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637 (1950) 53
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390 (1923) 13, 14, 17, 41
Namba v. McCourt, 185 Ore. 579, 204 P. (2d) 569 (1949) 58
Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633 (1948) 26, 36, 41, 45, 57
Perez v. Lippold, 32 Cal. (2d) 711, 198 P. (2d) 17 (1948) 39, 60
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (1925) 14, 19
Railroad Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445 (1873) 36
Re Drummond Wren (1945), Ont. R. 778, 4 D.L.R. 674 61
Re McDougal and Waddell (1945), O.W.N. 272, 2 D.L.R. 244 61
Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118 (1943) 47
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1 (1948) 53
Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535 (1942) 45
Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649 (1944) 52
Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303 (1879) 52
Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1950) 11, 31, 41, 43
Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410 (1948) 52
United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542 (1876) 51
United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303 (1946) 35, 36, 37, 41
United States v. Perchman, 7 Pet. 51 (1833) 56
Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313 (1880) 51
Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D. C. 50 (1910) 32, 36, 47
Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 (1886) 52

AUTHORITIES CITED

PAGE

Berger, The Supreme Court and Group Discrimination Since 1937, 49 Col. L. Rev. 201, 204-5 39

Cooper, The Frustrations of Being a Member of a Minority Group: What does it do to the Individual and to his Relationship with Other People? 29 Mental Hygiene, 189-91 (1945) 40

Deutscher & Chein, The Psychological Effect of Enforced Segregation: A Survey of Social Science Opinion, 26 Journal of Psychology, 259, 261-2 39

Dollard, Caste and Color in a Southern Town, 424 (1937) 40

Myrdal, An American Dilemma, 645 (1944) 37, 39

MacIver, The More Perfect Union, 67-68 (1948) 37

McLean, Group Tension, 2 Journal of American Medical Women's Association, 479, 482 40

McLean, Psychodynamic Factors in Racial Relations, The Annals of the American Academy of Political Science (March, 1946) 159, 161 40

Prudhomme, The Problem of Suicide in the American Negro, 25 Psychoanalytic Review, 187, 200 40

NOTES

44 American Journal of International Law, 543, at Page 548 59

56 Yale Law Journal, 1059 at pp. 1061-2 (1947) 38

MISCELLANEOUS

Brief of the Committee of Law Professors filed as Brief Amicus Curiae in Supreme Court of the United States in Sweatt v. Painter, et al., #44, October term 1949, Page 34 ..... 15, 40

Petition and Brief in support of Petition for Writ of Certorari in the Supreme Court of the United States, in Sweatt v. Painter, #44, October term, 1949 43

UNITED STATES STATUTES AND CONSTITUTION

Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43 ..... 3, 7, 8, 9, 49, 50

Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1254(1), 2101(e) 2

Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Ch. 80, Sec. 6, as amended June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Ch. 3446, Sec. 2 (D.C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 1110, 1111, 1112, 1113) 3, 23, 24, 25

Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Ch. 3446, Sec. 2 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 1109) 4, 24

Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Ch. 3446, Sec. 7, as amended by Act of June 4, 1924, 43 Stat. 370, Ch. 250, Art. 3 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 115) 4, 25

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

UNITED STATES STATUTES AND CONSTITUTION—(Cont'd)

PAGE

Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., as amended by Act of Oct. 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 81st Cong., 1st Sess. 4, 25
Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Ch. 140, Art. 1, Secs. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 201, 207) 4, 22
Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States 6, 7, 8
Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States 6
Article I, Section 8, Clause 17 10
Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States 6, 7, 8, 10, 34
Article 6, Clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States 6, 9
Rule 57, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 5

TREATY

Charter of the United Nations, Chapter 1, Article 1, Sec. 3, Article IX, Secs. 55, 56 ..... 3, 7, 8, 10, 54

STATE STATUTES AND CONSTITUTIONS

Alabama, Constitution, Article XIV, 1901 28
Arkansas, Acts, 1931, #169, Section 97, p. 475; Pages Dig. Section 11535 28
Delaware, Constitution, Article X, Section 2, 1897 28
Florida, Constitution, Article XII, Section 12, 1885 28
Georgia, Constitution, Article VIII, Section 1, Par. 1, 1877 29
Kentucky, Constitution, Section 187, 1890 29
Louisiana, Constitution, Articles XII, Section 1, 1921 29
Maryland, Article 77, Chapter 9, Section 111; Chapters 18, Section 192, 193; Chapter 20, Section 203, 204; Chapter 21, Section 292 of Flack's Annotated Code of Maryland 29
Mississippi, Constitution, Article VIII, Section 207, 1890 29
Missouri, Constitution, Article XI, Section 3, 1875 29
North Carolina, Constitution, Article IX, Section 2, 1868, Convention 1875 ..... 22, 29
Oklahoma, Constitution, Article XIII, Section 3, Oklahoma Statutes Annotated, Title 70; Article 5, Sections 5-1, 5-4, 5-5 29
South Carolina, Constitution, Article XI, Section 7, 1895 29
Tennessee, Constitution, Article XI, Section 12, 1870 30
Texas, Constitution, Article VII, Section 7, 1876 30
Virginia, Constitution, Article IX, Section 140, 1902 30
West Virginia, Constitution, Article XII, Secton 8, 1872 30

In The

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1952

No. 413

Spottswood Thomas Bolling, Et Al.,
Petitioners

V.

C. Melvin Sharpe, Et Al.,
Respondents

BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS

OPINION BELOW

The final decree of The United States District Court for the District of Columbia is unreported, but appears in the Record (R. p. 19).

JURISDICTION

The final decree of the District Court was entered on April 9, 1951 (R. p. 19). The notice of appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit was given on April 10, 1951 (R. p. 20). Briefs were filed by petitioners and respondents in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Before argument, before submission of the case for judgment on the briefs, and before judgment petitioners filed a Petition for Writ of Certiorari in this Court, asking that this Court review the judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia before judgment by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Certiorari was granted by order of this Court dated November 10, 1952.

This is an appeal from a decree in a civil action denying an injunction and, denying an application for a declaratory judgment holding that the action of respondents, under color of law, in refusing admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color was in violation of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment and Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, and also in violation of Title 8, United States Code, Section 43, and further was in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter 1, Article 1, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56, and, denying an application for a declaratory judgment holding that respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them because of their race or color in affording them educational opportunities and, dismissing petitioners' complaint on the ground that it failed to state a cause of action on which relief could be granted. The jurisdiction of this Court to review by writ of certiorari before judgment in the United States Court of Appeals is conferred by Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1254(1) and 2101(e).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the Federal Government in providing educational opportunities for pupils of the District of Columbia has power under the Constitution and laws of the United States to segregate pupils solely on the basis of race or color.

2. (a) Whether Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia compel their segregation solely on the basis of race or color.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(b) If Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia compel their segregation solely on the basis of race or color, whether these acts are unconstitutional.

(c) If Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia permit segregation solely on the basis of race or color, whether to the extent that this legislation is thus permissive its implementation by actions of respondents is unconstitutional.

3. Whether the actions of respondents in refusing to admit minor appellants to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color violated petitioners' rights guaranteed them by the Constitution and Laws of the United States.

4. Whether the United States District Court for the District of Columbia erred, in denying petitioners' application for an injunction and for a declaratory judgment, and in granting respondents' motion to dismiss petitioners' complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted.

TREATY AND STATUTES INVOLVED

Treaty:

Article 1(3), 2(2), 55(c) and 56 of the United Nations Charter, 59 Stat. 1035 et seq.

Statutes:

(A) Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43.

(B) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Sec. 6, as amended June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Sec. 2 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 1110, 1111, 1112, 1113).

(C) Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Sec. 2 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 1109).

(D) Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Sec. 7, as amended by Act of June 4, 1924, 43 Stat. 370, Chapter 250, Art. 3 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 115).

(E) Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Congress, 1st Session, as amended by Act of Oct. 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 81st Congress, 1st Session.

(F) Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Chapter 140, Art. 1, Secs. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 201, 207).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On the 11th day of September, 1950, and during the time when respondents were receiving students for enrollment and instruction in Sousa Junior High School, a public school in the District of Columbia attended solely by white children, all of the minor petitioners, Negroes between the ages of 7 and 16 years, citizens of the United States, residents of and domiciled in the District of Columbia, within the statutory age limits for eligibility to attend the public schools of the District of Columbia and subject to the compulsory school attendance law of the District of Columbia, accompanied by their parents, adult petitioners, presented themselves to respondent Eleanor P. McAuliffe, the principal of Sousa Junior High School, for enrollment and instruction therein. The adult petitioners are taxpayers and citizens of the District of Columbia, and are required by law to send their respective children, minor petitioners, to the specific public schools designated by the respondents, and are subject to criminal prosecution for failure so to do. Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Ch. 140, Art. I, Secs. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs 201, 207). Each minor petitioner was denied and ex-

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

cluded from enrollment and instruction at the Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color.

On the 27th day of October, 1950, minor petitioners, through their attorneys, appealed to respondent Lawson J. Cantrell, Associate Superintendent of Schools in charge of the vocational and junior high schools in the District of Columbia, Divisions 1-9 (now Division 1), restricted to white pupils. Again each minor petitioner was denied and excluded from enrollment and instruction at the Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color.

On the 31st day of October, 1950, minor petitioners, through their attorneys, appealed to respondent Norman J. Nelson, First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Divisions 1-9, restricted to white pupils, and to respondent Hobart M. Corning, Superintendent of all the public schools in the District of Columbia, and each denied and excluded each minor petitioner from enrollment and instruction at Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color.

On the 1st day of November, 1950, the respondent Board of Education of the District of Columbia upheld the actions of the other respondents and itself denied and excluded minor petitioners from enrollment and instruction at Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color.

Having exhausted their administrative remedies, thereafter and on November 9, 1950, petitioners, on their own behalf and on behalf of others similarly situated, filed a complaint (R. p. 1) and brought a class suit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, against the respondents, members of the School Board and officials of the public school system of the District of Columbia, in their respective official capacities. The action sought a declaratory judgment pursuant to Rule 57 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, stating that the respondents are without right in construing the statutes having to do with public education in the District of Columbia so as to require said respondents to exclude the minor petitioners from attendance at the Sousa Junior High School and in denying to the minor petitioners the right of attendance at the Sousa Junior High School in violation of their rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and by Article I, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting legislation in the nature of a Bill of Attainder, and by the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56, and further stating that the said respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them because of their race or color.

The action further sought an interlocutory and a permanent injunction restraining respondents, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents, and employees from precluding the admission of minor petitioners and other Negro children similarly situated to the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color, upon the grounds that said refusal of admission as applied to minor petitioners or other Negroes similarly situated, in whose behalf they sue, denies them their privileges and immunities as citizens of the United States, and is in violation of their rights as enunciated under the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, Article I, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56.

The action also sought an interlocutory and a permanent injunction requiring respondents, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents and employees to admit the minor petitioners to attendance in the Sousa Junior High School in conformity with their rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and Article I, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Subsequently, the respondents, through their attorneys, filed a motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted (R. p. 18). The Honorable Walter M. Bastian, Judge in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, refused either to grant an injunction restraining respondents from denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color, or to issue a declaratory judgment that said denial was in violation of petitioners' rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or to issue a decree requiring respondents to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School free of any racial distinctions, and on April 9, 1951, granted the motion to dismiss (R. p. 19). The District Judge at the close of oral argument stated that he was bound by the holding of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Carr, et al. v. Corning, 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950), and Browne, et al. v. Magdeburger, et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950).

An appeal was taken to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit (R. p. 20), and briefs were filed therein. This case has not been set down for oral argument, nor has it been submitted for judgment on the briefs, and no orders with respect thereto have been entered by that Court.

ERRORS RELIED UPON

The District Court erred:

1. In refusing to enter a declaratory judgment holding that the respondents are without right in excluding minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School under color of law upon the ground that these actions violate rights secured by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment and Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, and by Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and by the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, and Article IX, Sections 55 and 56; and in refusing to hold that respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them because of their race or color.

2. In refusing to restrain respondents from denying admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color, upon the ground that this action is in violation of their rights secured under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, and Article VI, Clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, Article IX, Sections 55 and 56.

3. In refusing to issue a decree requiring respondents to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School in conformity with their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and in refusing to hold that Acts of Congress do not compel racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia, for they would then violate Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, and respondents were in error in applying and construing said statutes so as to require the exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

4. In granting respondents' motion to dismiss petitioner's complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. The Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States precludes the Federal Government from imposing distinctions or restrictions based on race or color alone in affording educational opportunities to pupils in the District of Columbia. Therefore, respondents, as school officials in the District of Columbia, have no constitutional power to deny minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color.

2. (a) The Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia do not compel their segregation solely on the basis of race or color.

(b) If these Acts of Congress are interpreted as compelling segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia of minor petitioners solely on the basis of race or color then these Acts of Congress are bills of attainder, prohibited by Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States as well as violative of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

(c) If these Acts of Congress are interpreted as not compelling segregation but as permitting segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia of minor petitioners solely on the basis of race or color, then to the extent that these Acts are implemented by the action of respondents in denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color, this action of respondents implementing this legislation is unconstitutional.

3. The denial of admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color deprives them of their civil rights in violation of Article VI, Clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article I, Section 3, and Chapter IX, Articles 55, 56.

4. The court below erred in not granting petitioners the relief prayed for and in granting respondents' motion to dismiss minor petitioners' complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted.

ARGUMENT

I.

THE ACTION OF RESPONDENTS IN EXCLUDING MINOR PETITIONERS FROM ADMISSION TO SOUSA JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL SOLELY BECAUSE OF RACE OR COLOR AND IN REFUSING TO PERMIT ADULT PETITIONERS TO ENROLL THEIR CHILDREN IN SOUSA JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL SOLELY BECAUSE OF RACE OR COLOR DEPRIVES PETITIONERS OF THEIR LIBERTY AND PROPERTY WITHOUT DUE PROCESS OF LAW IN CONTRAVENTION OF THE FIFTH AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

A. Respondents' Actions in Regulating and Administering the Educational System of the District of Columbia Pursuant to and Under Color of Congressional Authority Are Limited by the Provisions of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Article I, Section 8, Clause 17, of the Constitution of the United States grants to Congress the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over the District of Columbia. Pursuant to this power, Congress by legislation has provided a system of education for the District of Columbia and acting pursuant to and under color of this legislation respondents regulate and administer said system of education. Congressional legislation providing

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the system of education and the acts of respondents in regulating and administering the educational system of the District of Columbia, beyond question, are subject to the limitations of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. In Capital Traction Company v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 5 (1899) this Court observed:

> "The Congress of the United States, being empowered by the Constitution 'to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever' over the seat of the National Government, has the entire control over the District of Columbia for every purpose of government, national or local. It may exercise within the District all legislative powers that the legislature of a State might exercise within the State; . . . so long as it does not contravene any provision of the Constitution of the United States."

In Callen v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 550 (1888), this Court observed:

> ". . . There is nothing in the history of the Constitution or of the original amendments to justify the assertion that the people of this District may be lawfully deprived of the benefit of any of the constitutional guarantees of life, liberty and property . . ."

One of the constitutional guarantees, which petitioners may not lawfully be deprived of the benefit of, is that as citizens no distinctions be made between them and other citizens because of race or color alone.

This Court, in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100, (1943) said:

> "Distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality. For that reason, legislative classification or discrimination based on race alone has often been held to be a denial of equal protection . . ."

In that same case, in a concurring opinion where this Court upheld the deprivation of the liberty of 70,000 Japanese under a war-time curfew law, Mr. Justice Murphy said at page 111:

> ". . . The result is the creation in this country of two classes of citizens for the purposes of a critical and perilous hour—to sanction discrimination between groups of United States citizens on the basis of ancestry. In my opinion this goes to the very brink of constitutional power.
>
> "Except under conditions of great emergency a regulation of this kind applicable solely to citizens of a particular racial extraction would not be regarded as in accord with the requirement of due process of law contained in the Fifth Amendment. We have consistently held that attempts to apply regulatory action to particular groups solely on the basis of racial distinction or classification is not in accordance with due process of law as prescribed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments . . ."

Another constitutional guarantee, which minor petitioners may not lawfully be deprived of, is the right to go to Sousa Junior High School without any limitations based solely upon race or color.

Mr. Justice Murphy, in a concurring opinion in Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283, 308 (1944), said:

> ". . . For the Government to suggest under these circumstances that the presence of Japanese blood in a loyal American citizen might be enough to warrant her exclusion from a place where she would otherwise have a right to go is a position I cannot sanction."

In the instant case minor petitioners would have a right to go to Sousa Junior High School but for respondents' action in excluding them solely because of their race or color, an action forbidden by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Final determination of what constitutes due process of law is for the judiciary, not Congress. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. U. S., 298 U. S. 349 (1938).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

B. The Educational Rights Which Petitioners Assert Are Fundamental Rights Protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment from Unreasonable or Arbitrary Restrictions.

Minor petitioners assert rights to enjoy the educational opportunities provided in the District of Columbia unrestricted by reason of their race or color and adult petitioners assert rights to enroll their children in public schools in the District of Columbia, unrestricted by reason of race or color. These educational rights are fundamental rights protected by the Fifth Amendment against unreasonable or arbitrary restrictions.

This Court held in Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, 399, 400 (1923), that:

> "While this Court has not attempted to define with exactness the liberty thus guaranteed, the term has received much consideration and some of the included things have been definitely stated. Without doubt it denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness of free men. . . . The established doctrine is that this liberty may not be interfered with under the guise of protecting the public interest, by legislative action which is arbitrary or without reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State to effect. Determination by the legislature of what constitutes proper exercise of police power is not final or conclusive but is subject to supervision of the courts." (Emphasis supplied)

Again in Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at page 400, this Court stated:

> "The American people have always regarded education and the acquisition of knowledge as matters of > supreme importance which should be diligently promoted. . . . Corresponding to the right of control, it is the natural duty of the parent to give his children education suitable to their station of life; and nearly all the states, . . . enforce this obligation by compulsory laws."

In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510, 534-5 (1925), this Court held:

> "Under the doctrine of Meyer v. Nebraska . . . we think it entirely plain that the Act of 1922 unreasonably interferes with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control. As often heretofore pointed out, rights guaranteed by the Constitution may not be abridged by legislation which has no reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State. The fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this Union repose excludes any general power of the State to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only. The child is not the mere creature of the State: those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations."

Meyer v. Nebraska and Pierce v. Society of Sisters involved the protection given to educational rights by the Fourteenth Amendment against unreasonable or arbitrary State restrictions. It is clear, however, that these rights are similarly protected by the Fifth Amendment from unreasonable or arbitrary Federal restrictions.

In Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284, 298, 299 (1927), this Court said:

> "Enforcement of the Act probably would destroy most, if not all, of them; and certainly, it would deprive parents of fair opportunity to procure for their children instruction which they think important and we cannot say is harmful. The Japanese parent has the right to direct the education of his own child without unreasonable restrictions; the Constitution protects him as well as those who speak another tongue.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"The general doctrine touching rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment to owners, parents, and children in respect of attendance upon schools has been announced in recent opinions. Meyer v. Nebraska, . . . Bartels v. Iowa, . . . Pierce v. Society of Sisters . . . While that amendment declares that no State shall 'deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law,' the inhibition of the Fifth Amendment—'no person shall . . . be deprived of his life, liberty or property without due process of law'—applies to the federal government and agencies set up by Congress . . . Those fundamental rights of the individual which the cited cases declared were protected by the Fourteenth Amendment from infringement by the States are guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment against action by the Territorial Legislature or officers."

Courts have indicated a respect for opinion of legal scholars and teachers. See: Georgetown College v. Hughes, 130 F. (2d) 810 (1942). With this in mind, petitioners call attention of the Court to the brief of the Committee of law professors, at pages 36-38, filed as Brief, Amicus Curiae in the Supreme Court of the United States, Sweatt v. Painter, et al., No. 44, October Term, 1949, from which we quote in part:

"(1) A democratic society, like any other, seeks to transmit its cultural heritage, traditions and aspirations from generation to generation. While there are many instruments of transmission of culture—the family, the church, business institutions, political and social groups and the schools—in our society the school seems to have emerged as the most important . . .

"(2) Just as the principle of free public education was the first important step in realizing democratic objectives through our educational system, so completely non-segregated public education is an essential element in reaching that goal. If children have race superiority taught them as infants, we cannot expect them lightly to toss it aside in later life. The answer lies not, however, in simply indoctrinating them with the principle of racial equality. . . . 'Education in America must be education for democracy. If education is life and growth, then it must be life within a social group. . . . Schools must be democratic communities wherein children live natural, democratic lives with their companions and grow into adulthood with good citizenship a part of their experience.'

"(3) This modern educational theory of learning by doing, clearly implies the necessity of non-segregated education. The principle of equality of opportunity regardless of race or creed, so much a part of our American tradition, can be fully achieved only if this element in our cultural heritage is kept alive and allowed to grow. The school, as has been shown, is the most important institution through which this heritage can be transmitted. But, as has likewise been made clear, proper teaching of the principle of equality of opportunity requires more than mere inculcation of the democratic ideal. What is essential is the opportunity at least in the school, to practice it. This requires that the school make possible continuous actual experience of harmonious cooperation between members of various ethnic and religious groups and thus produce attitudes of tolerance and mutual sharing that will continue in later life. In the segregated school, this desirable environment does not exist. The most important instrument for teaching democracy to all people is thus rendered impotent."

C. The Official Action of Respondents Excluding Minor Petitioners from Admission to Sousa Junior High School Solely Because of Race or Color Is Immediately Suspect and Must Be Tested by Standards Laid Down by This Court to Determine Whether Petitioners' Rights Protected by the Fifth Amendment Have Been Violated.

Segregation of the races by government fiat is incompatible with our national policy. In Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24 (1948), not only did the Court reaffirm this national policy limiting government enforced racial distinctions, but this Court declared that it would correct any courts in the District of Columbia, pursuant to its supervisory power over them, which took any action contrary to this national policy. Consequently in the light of the Fifth Amendment cases herein cited and in view of the national public policy limiting government enforced distinctions based solely on race or color, this Court has placed upon the government the burden of justifying racial distinctions imposed upon its citizens. As this Court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Black in the Korematsu v. U. S., 323 U. S. 214, 216 (1944)—

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "It should be noted, to begin with, that all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. That is not to say that all such restrictions are unconstitutional. It is to say that courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny. Pressing public necessity may sometimes justify the existence of such restrictions; racial antagonism never can." (Emphasis supplied.)

In the Japanese cases this Court has evolved certain definite standards by which government enforced racial distinctions among its citizens must be tested.

1. The restrictions must be justified by an affirmative showing of peculiar circumstances, present emergency, or pressing public necessity.

(a) In Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, this Court invalidated a Nebraska statute restricting the teaching of foreign languages, as infringing educational rights protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. At page 402 the Court said:

> "The interference is plain enough and no adequate reason therefor in time of peace and domestic tranquility has been shown."

(b) In Farrington v. Tokushige, supra, this Court invalidated an Act of the Legislature of Hawaii restricting the operation of foreign language schools, as infringing educational rights protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. At page 298, this Court said:

> "Apparently all are parts of a deliberate plan to bring foreign language schools under a strict governmental control for which the record discloses no adequate reason."

In Hirabayashi v. U. S., supra, this Court upheld a military order confining Japanese-Americans to their homes at night as not infringing on the liberty of persons protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. At page 101, this Court said:

> "Our investigation here does not go beyond the inquiry whether, in the light of all relevant circumstances preceding and attending their promulgation, the challenged orders and statute afforded a reasonable basis for the action taken in imposing the curfew."

Again at page 108, Mr. Justice Douglas concurring said:

> "Detention for a reasonable cause is one thing. Detention on account of ancestry is another."

(d) In Korematsu v. U. S., supra, this Court upheld a military order excluding Japanese-Americans from a military area as not infringing on the liberty protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Again at page 218, this Court said:

> "True, exclusion from the area in which one's home is located is a far greater deprivation than constant confinement to the home from 8 P. M. to 6 A. M. Nothing short of apprehension by the proper military authorities of the gravest imminent danger to the public safety can constitutionally justify either."

In the instant case, no reason is given in justification of the restriction on the educational rights of petitioners. The only apparent reason is the race or color of petitioners, a reason sternly interdicted by this Court.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2. The restrictions must be for a purpose which government has authority to effect.

(a) In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, this Court invalidated a state statute the purpose of which was to compel general attendance at public schools by normal children, between eight and sixteen." (page 531) In concluding that the State had no authority to effect this purpose, this Court said at page 535:

> "The fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this Union repose excludes any general power of the State to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only."

In the instant case the apparent purpose of the action of respondents complained of, is, as to public education in the District of Columbia, to compel Negroes to attend only schools attended by Negroes and to accept instruction by Negro teachers only. It is submitted that the Federal Government has no authority to effect such a purpose.

3. The restrictions must be clearly authorized and if implied authority is relied upon it must appear that the restriction is clearly and unmistakably indicated by the language used in granting the authority.

(b) In Ex Parte Endo, supra, this Court invalidated the detention in a Relocation Center of a loyal Japanese-American because no authority to detain was expressly granted or necessarily implied. At page 297 this Court said:

> "We are of the view that Mitsye Endo should be given her liberty. In reaching that conclusion we do not reach the underlying constitutional issues which have been argued. For we conclude that, whatever power the War Relocation Authority may have to detain other classes of citizens, it had no authority to subject citizens who are concededly loyal to its leave procedure."

At page 300, it is said:

> "We must assume, when asked to find implied powers in a grant of legislative or executive authority, that the law makers intended to place no greater restraint on the citizen than was clearly and unmistakably indicated by the language they used."

Again at page 300 this Court said:

> "Their single aim was the protection of the war effort against espionage and sabotage. It is in light of that one objective that the powers conferred by the orders must be construed."

And at page 301, 302, this Court points out:

> "Neither the Act nor the orders use the language of detention. The purpose and objective of the Act and of these orders are plain. We do not mean to imply that detention in connection with no phase of the evacuation program would be lawful. The fact that the Act and the orders are silent on detention does not of course mean that any power to detain is lacking. Some such power might indeed be necessary to the successful operation of the evacuation program. At least we may so assume. Moreover, we may assume for the purpose of this case that initial detention in Relocation Centers was authorized. But we stress the silence of the legislative history and of the Act and the Executive Orders on the power to detain to emphasize that any such authority which exists must be implied. If there is to be the greatest possible accommodation of the liberties of the citizen with this war measure, any such implied power must be narrowly confined to the precise purpose of the evacuation program."

In the instant case it is clear from what is said under Point II of this brief that the respondents have no express authority to exclude minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color. No language of exclusion is found in any Congressional Acts relating to public education in the District of Columbia. It is to be assumed that these Acts were passed for educational purposes and objectives. It is submitted that no legitimate educational purpose is served by the classification and distinction of pupils solely on the basis of race or color and the exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School by respondents solely because of race or color. On the contrary, there is abundant authority for the proposition that governmentally enforced racial segregation is in conflict with educational purposes and objectives in our democratic society.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

4. The restrictions must have a reasonable relation to an authorized purpose within the competency of the government to effect.

In Hirabayashi v. U. S., supra, Mr. Justice Douglas said in his concurring opinion at page 106:

> "Where the orders under the present Act have some relation to 'protection against espionage and against sabotage' our task is at an end."

In Korematsu v. U. S., supra, this Court said at page 218:

> "But exclusion from a threatened area, no less than curfew, has a definite and close relationship to the prevention of espionage and sabotage."

In the instant case, the exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color has no reasonable relation to any educational purpose suggested by respondents, for they have suggested no purpose. It is submitted that no purpose, within the competency of the government to effect can be advanced in this case.

D. Petitioners Sustain Injury as the Direct Result of the Action of Respondents in Excluding Minor Petitioners from Sousa Junior High School Solely Because of Race or Color.

The exclusion of minor petitioners from admission to Sousa Junior High School, solely because of race or color is a deprivation of petioners' constitutional rights to acquire useful knowledge, to choose a particular public school, and to enjoy public educational opportunities without government enforced limitations or restrictions based solely on race or color. That injury continues and is not removed or even lessened by reason of the fact that minor petitioners "do now attend a junior high school in said District", allocated by respondents for the instruction of Negro children. Beyond question the deprivation of a constitutional right is injurious per se. See Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277 (1866), where this Court observed that "liberty" includes "freedom from outrage on feelings as well as restraints on the person."

All of the injury shown by petitioners under Point II of this brief, in reference to a Bill of Attainder supports the contentions here made. Any deprivation of a freedom of choice solely on the basis of race or color is violative of petitioners' civil rights and thus injurious. To be compelled to attend school because of the compulsory school law, D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 201, 207, and then to be compelled to accept segregation on the basis of race or color and to have one's feelings outraged is injurious per se. The deprivation of a civil right is an injury. Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475, 485 (1903).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

II.

THE ACTS OF CONGRESS WHICH PROVIDE EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES FOR PUPILS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA DO NOT COMPEL THEIR SEGREGATION SOLELY ON THE BASIS OF RACE OR COLOR.

A. The Language of the Acts of Congress Which Provide Educational Opportunities for Pupils in the District of Columbia Does Not Compel Segregation of Negroes from Whites.

These Acts are:

(a) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Section 6, as amended by Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 (now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 1110, was R.S.D.C. Section 281), which provides:

> Education of colored children. "It shall be the duty of the Board of Education to provide suitable and convenient houses or rooms for holding schools for colored children, to employ and examine teachers therefor, and to appropriate a proportion of the school funds, to be determined upon number of white and colored children, between the ages of 6 and 17 years, to the payment of teachers' wages, to the building or renting of schoolrooms, and other necessary expenses pertaining to said schools, to exercise a general supervision over them, to establish proper discipline, and to endeavor to promote a thorough, equitable and practical education of colored children in the District of Columbia."

(b) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Section 6, as amended by Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 (now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 1111, was R.S.D.C. Section 282), which provides:

> Placement of children in schools. "Any white resident shall be privileged to place his or her child or ward at any one of the schools provided for the education of white children in the District of Columbia he or she may think proper to select, with the consent of the Board of Education; and any colored resident shall have the same rights with respect to colored schools."

(c) Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 (now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 1109, was R.S.D.C. Sction 283), which provides:

Board of Education may accept and apply donations for colored schools—Accounting. "The Board of Education is authorized to receive any donations or contributions that may be made for the benefit of the schools for colored children by persons disposed to aid in the elevation of the colored population in the District, and to apply the same in such manner as in their opinion shall be best calculated to effect the object of the donors; the Board of Education to account for all funds so received."

(d) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Section 6, as amended by Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 (now District of Columbia Code, 1940, Sections 31-1112, was R.S.D.C. Section 306), which provides:

"Proportionate amount of school moneys to be set apart for colored schools. It shall be the duty of the proper authorities of the District to set apart each year from the whole fund received from all sources by such authorities applicable to purposes of public education in the District of Columbia, such a proportionate part of all moneys received or expended for school or educational purposes, including the cost of sites, buildings, improvements, furniture and books, and all other expenditures on account of schools, as the colored children between the ages of 6 and 17 years bear to the whole number of children, white and colored, between the same ages, for the purpose of establishing and sustaining public schools for the education of colored children; and such proportion shall be ascertained by the last reported census of the population made prior to such apportionment, and shall be regulated at all times thereby."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(e) Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 320, Chapter 3446, Section 7, as amended by Act of June 4, 1924, 43 Stat. 370, Chapter 250, Section 3 (now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 115), which provides:

> Principals of schools—Duties. "Principals of normal, high and manual training schools shall each have entire control of his school, both executive and educational, subject only in authority to the superintendent of schools for the white schools and to the colored first assistant superintendent for the colored schools, to whom in each case he shall be directly responsible."

(f) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Section 6, as amended by Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 (now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 1113, was R.S.D.C. Section 310), which provides:

> Facilities for educating colored children to be provided. "It is the duty of the Board of Education to provide suitable rooms and teachers for such a number of schools in the District of Columbia, as, in its opinion, will best accommodate the colored children in the District of Columbia."

(g) Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Congress, 1st Session, as amended by Act of October 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 81st Congress, 1st Session, District of Columbia Code, Title 31, Sections 669-670, 671, which provides:

> Number of First Assistant Superintendents—Sphere of supervision—Duties. "There shall be two First Assistant Superintendents of Schools, one white First Assistant Superintendent for the white schools, who, under the direction of the Superintendent of Schools, shall have general supervision over the white schools; and one colored First Assistant Superintendent for the colored schools, who, under the direction of the Superintendent of Schools, shall have sole charge of all employees, classes and schools in which colored children are taught. The First Assistant Superintendents shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by the Superintendent of Schools."

Boards of examiners—Composition—Designation of members. "Boards of examiners for carrying out the provisions of the statutes with reference to examinations of teachers, shall consist of the Superintendent of Schools and not less than four nor more than six members of the supervisory or teaching staff of the white schools for the white schools and of the Superintendent of Schools and not less than four nor more than six members of the supervisory or teaching staff of the colored schools for the colored schools. The designations of members of the supervisory or teaching staff for membership on these boards shall be made annually by the Board of Education on the recommendation of the Superintendent of Schools."

Appointment of chief examiners—Compensation. "There shall be appointed by the Board of Education, on the recommendation of the Superintendent of Schools, a chief examiner for the Board of Examiners for white schools. An Associate Superintendent in the colored schools shall be designated by the Superintendent of Schools as chief examiner for the board of examiners for the colored schools. All members of the respective boards of examiners shall serve without additional compensation."

It is quite clear from an examination of the above Acts of Congress that they possess no language of a mandatory character. The language is capable of an interpretation that it is a recognition by the Congress of the fact that separate private schools existed in the District long before public schools were supported by Congress. Only precise and concrete language requiring segregation of the races could overcome the historical fact that this language was approved by the Congress that opposed every type of racial distinction by Government.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The history as well as the language of these various acts demonstrates an intention by the legislature at least to guarantee minimum opportunities to the colored children at a time when serious objections were made to any public education for them. Certainly there were those members of Congress who probably believed that for the newly freed Negro public education might best be secured by continuing separate schools for an adjustment period. All that this means is that the legislature sought to give the school officials a discretionary power. It seems doubtful that this Court today would conclude that such a delegation of power by Congress would be constitutional even if such an intent be found to exist. As Judge Edgerton, dissenting, said in Carr v. Corning, supra, at page 192:

> "When the Fifth Amendment was adopted, Negroes in the District of Columbia were slaves, not entitled to unsegregated schooling or to any schooling. Congress may have been right in thinking Negroes were not entitled to unsegregated schooling when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. But the question what schooling was good enough to meet their constitutional rights 160 or 80 years ago is different from the question what schooling meets their rights now."

Respondents can point to no law in the District of Columbia which would be violated by the admission of these minor petitioners to the Sousa Junior High School. In Ex Parte Endo, supra, this Court said at page 299-300:

> "We mention these constitutional provisions not to stir the constitutional issues which have been argued at the bar but to indicate the approach which we think should be made to an Act of Congress or an Order of the Chief Executive that touches the sensitive area of rights specifically guaranteed by the Constitution. This Court has quite consistently given a narrower scope for the operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appeared on its face to violate a specific prohibition of the Constitution. We have likewise favored that interpretation of legislation > which gives it the greater chance of surviving the test of constitutionality. Those analogies are suggestive here. We must assume that the Chief Executive and members of Congress, as well as the courts, are sensitive to and respectful of the liberties of the citizen. . . . We must assume, when asked to find implied powers in a grant of legislative or executive authority, that the law makers intended to place no greater restraint on the citizen than was clearly and unmistakably indicated by the language they used."

There can be no doubt that if Congress had intended such a result as compulsory segregation of the races in education it would have said so in plain and unmistakable language.

An inspection of the constitutions and laws [1] of the states where segregation by law is in vogue should serve to illuminate the proposition that where the law making body intended a compulsory segregated educational pattern it expressly and clearly said so. As early as 1875 the Constitution of Alabama contained the following phrase: "But separate schools shall be provided for the children of the citizens of African descent." Alabama Const. 1875, Article XII, Section 1. It now provides, in its Constitution of 1901, that "no child of either race shall be permitted to attend a school of the other race." Alabama Const. 1901, Article XIV, Section 256. In Arkansas a statute charges the school directors in each district with the duty to establish separate schools for white and colored persons. Acts 1931, No. 169, Sec. 97, P. 476; Popes Dig. Sec. 11535. Delaware provides, "and separate schools for white and colored children shall be maintained." Delaware Const. 1897, Article X, Section 2. The Florida Constitution of 1885 commands that "white and colored children shall not be taught in the same school." Florida Const. 1885, Art. XII, Sec. 12. As early as 1877 the Constitution of Georgia read, "but separate [1] For appropriate text of Statutes and Constitutions referred to herein, see Appendix A.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

schools shall be provided for white and colored races." Georgia Const. 1877, Art. VIII, Sec. I. There has to date been no change in this requirement. Kentucky's Constitution of 1890 says, "separate schools for white and colored children shall be maintained." Ky. Const. 1890, Sec. 187. That is the law of Kentucky today. Louisiana's Constitution of 1898 provides for "free public schools for the white and colored races separately established." La. Const. 1898, Art. 245. That "separate public schools shall be maintained for the education of white and colored children" is still the dictate of its present Constitution. La. Const. 1921, Art. 12, Sec. 1. The Mississippi Constitution of 1890 declares that "separate schools shall be maintained for children of the white and colored races." Miss. Const. 1890, Sec. 207. "Separate free public schools shall be established for the education of children of African descent." Mo. Const. 1875, Art. XI, Sec. 3. The Missouri Const. now provides "Separate schools shall be provided for white and colored children, except in cases otherwise provided for by law." Mo. Const. 1945, Laws, 1945 P. 50. North Carolina —"And the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate public schools." N. C. Const. 1876, Art. IX, Sec. 2. Oklahoma provides: "Separate schools for white and colored children with like accommodation shall be provided by the Legislature and impartially maintained." (Const. 1907, as amended Stat. 1931, 13676.) Constitution, Art. XIII, Sec. 3. The statutes of Oklahoma further provide: "The public schools of the State of Oklahoma shall be organized and maintained upon a complete plan of separation between the colored and white races, with impartial facilities for both races." (Laws 1949, P. 536, Art. 5, Sec. 1.) Statutes, Supplement 1949, Art. 5, Title 70, Sec. 5-1.

The 1895 Constitution of South Carolina states, "separate schools shall be provided for children of the white and colored races and no child shall ever be permitted to attend a school provided for children of the other race." S. C. Const. 1895, Art. XIM Sec. 7. Tennessee's Constitution of 1870 provides "No school . . . shall allow white and Negro children to be received as scholars together in the same school." Tenn. Const. 1870, Art. XI, Sec. 12. Texas' Constitution of 1876 puts it thusly—"Separate schools shall be provided for white and colored children." Texas Const. 1876, Art. VII, Sec. 7. Virginia's 1902 Constitution says, "white and colored children shall not be taught in the same school." Va. Const. 1902, Art. IX, Sec. 140. Similarly, West Virginia, as long ago as 1872, wrote into its Constitution that—"White and colored persons shall not be taught in the same school." W. Va. Const. 1872, Art. XIII, Sec. 8. The only exception to this use of mandatory language in the laws of the group of states where segregation is institutionalized is Maryland. In Maryland the language of the statutes is similar to the language used in the Acts of Congress, supra. Maryland laws provide: (a) "All white youths between the ages of six and twenty-one years shall be admitted into such public schools of the State . . ." An. Code Md. 1939, Art. 77, Sec. 111. (b) "it shall be the duty of the county board of education to establish one or more public schools in each election district for all colored youths between six and twenty-one years of age . . ." An. Code Md. 1939, Art. 77, Sec. 192. In other sections (193, 194, 195), provisions are made for administering "colored schools." Section 203 provides for colored industrial schools; Section 252, for a colored teacher normal school. The compelling language used by the other southern states is absent. We request this Court to take judicial notice of the fact that under these statutes the Board of School Commissions by a vote of 5 to 3 authorized the admission of a Negro student this term to the white Polytechnic Institute of Baltimore, Maryland, without a law suit or legislative action. Admittedly, they did this because no similar provisions were available for Negroes, but likewise

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

it is clear that they did not consider these Maryland laws any bar to their administrative action.

Thus, it appears that in the only one of these states where the laws are similar to those in the District of Columbia their language is not interpreted by school officials as compelling segregation.

Speaking of the separate schools of the District of Columbia in a speech in support of a Civil Rights Bill which became the Civil Rights Act of 1875, Senator Pratt of Indiana observed that Congress was continuing separate schools in the District of Columbia because both races were content with them; and at the same time he pointed out that where there were very few colored students, they would have to be intermingled.[2] There was, therefore, at least some congressional opinion among the contemporary legislators who were active in efforts of Congress to provide equality for the Negro during the period when some of these Acts of Congress were first being considered, that they did not compel segregation.

B. An Interpretation by This Court That These Acts of Congress Compel the Segregation of Pupils in the District of Columbia Solely on the Basis of Race or Color Alone Would Render Them Unconstitutional for They Would Then Be Met with the Prohibitions of Article I, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Limitations Set by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

1. Such an interpretation would make these Acts violative of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

That these Acts, if they are interpreted to compel segregation of pupils in the District of Columbia solely on the basis of race or color, would be unconstitutional under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment has already been shown in Point I of this brief, supra.

[2] From speech of Senator Pratt, 2 Cong. Rec. 3452, 43 Cong., 1st Sess. (1874) at 4081, 4082.

The question which the instant case raises, whether the Federal Government in providing educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia has power under the Constitution and laws of the United States to segregate pupils solely on the basis of race or color, has never been presented to this Court before. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit had this question presented to it in only one other case, Carr v. Corning, supra, and that court there decided that these Acts of Congress, supra, compelled segregation in the District of Columbia and that compulsory separation of races in public education was constitutional. The court below relied upon the holding in the Carr case in dismissing petitioners' complaint.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has had before it only three cases dealing with the question of race distinctions in the provisions for opportunities for public education in the District of Columbia. The first case was Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D. C. 50 (1910). In that case, petitioner, a resident of the District of Columbia of school age, questioned her classification as a Negro for purposes of assignment to a particular school. The court, in deciding that question, stated that compulsory segregation of the races was constitutional in the District of Columbia. Petitioner having conceded that point, and having based her case upon a lack of standards for the determination of race, and upon a failure to provide a hearing upon this determination, the issue before the court was whether or not proper standards had been set and a proper hearing provided for. There was no issue before the court as to whether or not the government possessed the power to make the classification. Therefore, that decision is of little value in determining the question posed in the instant case and was not relied upon by the Court of Appeals in the Carr case for this purpose.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit first faced the question of the power of the Federal Government to segregate Negroes from whites in providing opportunities for public education in the District of Columbia in Carr v. Corning, and Browne v. Magdeburger, supra.

The court consolidated for argument and decision these two cases. The Browne complaint did not present the question of the constitutionality of the separation of the races in public education; however, the Carr complaint did. The Court of Appeals held, at page 175:

> "It is urged that the separation of the races is itself, apart from equality or inequality of treatment, forbidden by the Constitution. The question thus posed is whether the Constitution lifted this problem out of the hands of all legislatures and settled it. We do not think it did."

The Court concluded on this point that the makers of the first ten Amendments in 1789 or of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1866 did not mean to prohibit the legislature from providing separate schools. The Court examined the chronology of statutes relating to the separate school system in the District of Columbia and concluded that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment intended to provide separate school facilities for the races in the District of Columbia.

Petitioners have already shown why they do not agree with the opinion of the court below that these Acts of Congress, supra, compel segregation. But, even if petitioners are wrong and, these Acts of Congress do compel segregation, these Acts are unconstitutional and the Carr case was wrongly decided. The majority failed to meet and deal with the fundamental question raised by Judge Edgerton's dissent. It is submitted that before any reliance can be placed upon the conclusion reached by the majority in the Carr case the following argument of Judge Edgerton at page 192 must first be answered—

> "Appellees say that Congress requires them to maintain segregation. The President's Committee concluded that congressional legislation assumes the fact of segregation but nowhere makes it mandatory. I think the question irrelevant since legislation cannot affect appellant's constitutional rights."

The Court of Appeals was so preoccupied in the Carr case with the history and background of the Fourteenth Amendment, and with the legal theories underlying the separate but equal doctrine, and was so convinced by the record in which the lower court had found evidence showing equality of facilities, that its opinion that the action of the School Board was constitutional is of doubtful value in the instant case. Here the sole question is as to the constitutional power of the school officials to deny minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color. Here there is no question of equality of facilities. This view is supported by the opinion of the Court of Appeals, especially where it is observed that Judge Clark concurred in the majority opinion although he considered the cases moot and to have been properly dismissed, since the factual basis for the actions was the double shift at Browne Junior High School at the time the actions were brought, and since the double shift had been eliminated prior to the action.

Therefore, whichever interpretation is placed upon these Acts of Congress, respondents are still limited in their power to deny minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color by the Constitution and laws of the United States, which limitations should be determined by this Court.

2. Such an interpretation would render these Acts Bills of Attainder.

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

United States provides that—"No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.[3]

The Board of Education of the District of Columbia took the position, which was confirmed in the Carr case, supra, and was relied upon by the Court in the case below, that the statutes enacted by Congress governing public schools in the District of Columbia compelled it to segregate Negroes from whites in the school system.

It is clear that, if respondents and the Court of Appeals in the Carr case are right in their interpretation then these statutes are Bills of Attainder, for they compel the exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely on account of their race or color, and they are in violation of Article 1, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, for:

a. They are legislative or congressional statutes.
b. They are directed at named or easily ascertainable persons—namely, Negroes.
c. They inflict punishment on these persons. This punishment is arbitrary.
d. They inflict punishment without a judicial trial.
e. They convict Negroes of the "crime" of being inferior by reason of birth, color and blood, or of being descendants of slaves.

[1] These Are Acts of Congress and These Petitioners Are Easily Ascertainable Members of a Group

It is obvious that these are Acts of Congress, and United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303, 315-316 (1946), held "that legislative acts, no matter what their form, that apply either to named individuals or to easily ascertainable members of a group in such a way as to inflict punishment on them without a judicial trial are bills of attainder prohibited by the Constitution." Negro children certainly constitute an easily ascertainable group, especially since, under the rule of Wall v. Oyster, supra, the Board is empowered to determine race for itself, and may force pupils and their parents to accept that determination. Just as in the Lovett case, supra, the present case involves punishment without judicial trial, and determined by no previous law or fixed rule. A judicial trial would at least provide safeguards against arbitrary action which is inherent—if not implicit—in an administrative condemnation such as the Board of Education's segregation rule. United States v. Lovett, supra. According to this Court in Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633, 646 (1948), only exceptional circumstances can excuse racial discrimination by law, and such distinctions must be justified by the agency practicing the discrimination. This has never been done with respect to segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia.

[3] For historical background of bills of attainder in America and in England see Notes, 46 Col. L. Rev. 849, Notes, 21 Tulane L. Rev. 278, 2 Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (5th Ed. 1891) 216, Adams, Constitutional History of England (1935) 228, Holdsworth, History of English Law (4th Ed. 1927) 381.

There can be no doubt that segregation in our public schools is aimed at Negroes. Cf. Railroad Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445, 452-453 (1873).

In Cummings v. Missouri, supra, at page 327, the Supreme Court declared: "The clauses in the Missouri constitution, which are the subject of consideration, do not, in terms define any crimes or declare that any punishment shall be inflicted, but they produce the same result upon the parties, against whom they are directed, as though the crimes were defined and the punishment was declared." This passage surely fits the position in which appellants are placed by appellees. What legislatures may not accomplish directly, they may not effect by indirection. Ex Parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, 380 (1866); United States v. Lovett, supra. Neither may they act so as to secure by implication that which would be invalid if expressly provided. Oyama v. California, supra.

It is the function of the courts to protect citizens against discriminatory acts such as those presented in this case. Where else can one turn in the face of the disgrace and ignominy heaped upon petitioners by respondents? To paraphrase this Court in United States v. Lovett, supra, what is involved here is a proscription by the Board of Education of more that 50,000 Negro children, prohibiting their ever attending a school simultaneously occupied by white children. Were this case held not to be justiciable, Board action, aimed at a large, readily recognizable class, which stigmatized their ancestry and seriously impaired their chance to earn a living, could never be challenged in any court. Our Constitution did not contemplate such a result.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

[2] These Acts of Congress Inflict Punishment on Petitioners

a. Segregation is Punishment

That segregation constitutes punishment is the conclusion reached by recognized authorities in the field of sociology, politics, psychology and law, from a consideration of the studies of segregation and its effects.

Gunnar Myrdal, who made a detailed and authoritative study of the entire problem posed by treatment of the Negro minority in the United States, pointed out that what was merely segregation forty years ago is becoming a caste system today. He continued: "The spiritual effects of segregation are accumulating with each new generation, continuously estranging the two groups." (1 Mydral, An American Dilemma, 645 (1944).

The process of development from segregation to caste system is described in Mac Iver, The More Perfect Union, 67-68 (1948)—

> "Now let us consider more clearly the manner in which the conditions that are confirmed or imposed by discrimination operate to sustain it. The discriminating group starts with an advantage. It has greater power, socially and politically, and usually it has a superior economic position. Thus it is enabled to discriminate. By discriminating it cuts the other group off from economic and social opportunities. The subordination of the lower group gives the upper group a new consciousness of its superiority. This psychological reinforcement of discrimination is in turn ratified by the factual evidences of inferiority that accompany the lack of opportunity, by the mean and miserable state of those who live and breed in poverty, who suffer constant frustration, who have no incentive to improve their lot, and who feel themselves to be outcasts of society. Thus discrimination evokes both attitudes and modes of life favorable to its perpetuation, not only in the upper group but to a considerable extent, in the lower group as well. A total upper caste complex, congenial to discrimination, a complex of attitudes, interests, modes of living, and habits of power is developed and institutionalized, having as its counterpart a lower caste complex of modes of living, habits of subservience, and corresponding attitudes."

The effects of segregation upon the group segregated have recently been summarized in a note in 56 Yale L.J. 1059, 1061-2 (1947):

"Every authority on psychology and sociology is agreed that the students subjected to discrimination and segregation are profoundly affected by this experience. . . . Experience with segregation of Negroes has shown that adjustments may take the form of acceptance, avoidance, direct hostility and aggression, and indirect or deflected hostility. In seeking self-expression and finding it blocked by the practices of a society accepting segregation, the child may express hatred or rage which in turn may result, in a distortion of normal social behavior by the creation of the defense mechanism of secrecy. The effects of a dual school system force a sense of limitations upon the child, and destroy incentives, produce a sense of inferiority, give rise to mechanisms of escape in fantasy, and discourage racial self-appreciation."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On the other side of the picture, "Jim Crow" laws, which govern important segments of everyday living, not only indoctrinate both white and colored races with the caste conception, but they solidify the segregation existing outside those laws and give it respectability and institutional fixity. (Myrdal, An American Dilemma, pp. 579-580). See also Berger, The Supreme Court and Group Discrimination Since 1937, 49 Col. L. Rev. 201, 204-205. As the Supreme Court in California has pointedly said, the way to eradicate racial tension is not "through the perpetuation by law of the prejudices that give rise to the tension." (Perez v. Lippold, 32 Calif. (2d) 711, 725, 198 P. (2d) 17, 25 (1948).) In fields which "Jim Crow" laws do not cover there has been "a slow trend toward a breakdown of segregation"; within the fields of their operation the laws "keep the pattern rigid." (1 Myrdal, An American Dilemma, p. 635).

Professional opinion is almost unanimous that segregation has detrimental psychological effects on those segregated. A questionnaire addressed to 849 representative social scientists was answered by 61% of those to whom it was sent (Deutscher & Chein, The Psychological Effect of Enforced Segregation: A Survey of Social Science Opinion, 26 Journal of Psychology, 259, 261, 262 (1948)). Of those replying, 90.4% believed that enforced segregation has "detrimental psychological effects" on those segregated if "equal facilities" are provided; 2.3% expressed the opposite opinion, and 7.4% did not answer the question or expressed no opinion (Id., 261, 266). Those who elaborated their position with comments (55% of those replying) stressed that segregation induced feelings of inferiority, insecurity, frustration, and persecution, and that it developed, on the one hand, submissiveness, martyrdom, withdrawal tendencies, and fantasy, and on the other hand, aggression (Id., 272, 277).

The resentment and hostility provoked by segregation find various means of psychological "accommodation," various forms of release (Prudhomme, The Problem of Suicide in the American Negro, 25 Psychoanalytic Review, 187, 200). Mediocrity is accepted as a standard because of the absence of adequate social rewards or acceptance (Dollard, (Caste and Color in a Southern Town, 424 (1937)). (McLean, Group Tension, 2 Journal of American Medical Women's Association, 479, 482). Energy and emotion which might be constructively used are lost in the process of adjustment to the "Jim Crow" concept of the Negro's characteristics and his inferior status in society (Cooper, The Frustrations of Being a Member of a Minority Group: What Does It Do To The Individual and to His Relationship with Other People?, 29 Mental Hygiene, 189, 190, 191 (1945)). Psychosomatic disease is induced by the tensions engendered by segregation and other forms of racial discrimination. (McLean, Psychodynamic Factors in Racial Relations, 244 The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science (March, 1946), 159, 161).

It is further submitted that any suggestion that no punishment is inflicted ignores the basic realities of the situation. The whole theory upon which a segregated school system is maintained is that the dominant class regards the subject group so far inferior as to require quarantining the latter during school hours, to avoid contamination or pollution of the children of the dominant group. Realization of this motive, when it first comes to a child of the segregated class, cannot help but cause mental anquish (i.e., constitutes injury) and repeated reminders of the implications of segregation keep one's awareness of the badge of inferiority fresh during the remainder of one's life.

According to the Brief Amicus Curiae of the Committee of Law Teachers against Segregation in Legal Education

[*] For a general discussion of the effects of the caste system, which segregation supports and exemplifies, on Negro personality and behavior, see Myrdal, An American Dilemma, vol. II, pp. 757, 767.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

before the Supreme Court of the United States in Sweatt v. Painter, supra, at p. 33, "The institution of segregation is designed to maintain the Negro race in a position of inferiority. It drastically retards his educational, economic and political development and prevents him from exercising his rightful powers as a citizen. It creates maladjustments and tensions which sap the vitality of our society."

In addition to the conclusions by the experts in the field that segregation is punishment, this Court has characterized similar results of State and Federal statutes as punishment. The rights protected by due process of law included life, liberty and property. Any statute directed at a named individual or an easily recognizable class, which seeks to punish by deprivation or suspension of any of these rights without a judicial trial is a bill of attainder. Cummings v. Missouri, supra. This Court, in the Cummings case, said at pages 321-322: "The theory upon which our political institutions rest is, that all men have certain inalienable rights—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that in the pursuit of happiness all avocations, all honors, all positions, are alike open to everyone, and that in the proctection of these rights all are equal before the law. Any deprivation or suspension of these rights for past conduct is punishment, and can be in no otherwise defined." The acquisition of knowledge is one of the protected rights. Meyer v. Nebraska, supra. The permanent prohibition against attendance in non-segregated schools is as much punishment as one which perpetually restrains one from serving the Government. United States v. Lovett, supra.

Any contention that no injury is inflicted should be considered not only from the point of view of the contentions advanced in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1950), and in Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816 (1950), but in the light of Oyama v. California, supra, at page 646—

> "There remains the question of whether discrimination between citizens on the basis of their racial descent, as revealed in this case, is justifiable. Here we start with the proposition that only the most exceptional circumstances can excuse discrimination on that basis in the face of the equal protection clause and a federal statute giving all citizens the right to own land . . ."

Adult petitioners are certainly subject to punishment if they attempt to enforce the right of their children to sit in school with white children, either by withholding [4] their children from attendance at a segregated colored school, or by an attempt to place them at a segregated white school. Petitioners and all other persons who are under the interdiction of the statutes as interpreted by the Board [5] are attained by reason of their birth, blood and pigmentation, and there is no way in which they can overcome the obstacles placed in their way by respondents.

b. This Punishment is Arbitrarily Imposed

We submit that it may properly be held that punishment is arbitrarily imposed where an act forbidden bears no relation to the object allegedly sought to be achieved. And it is certainly true in this case that discriminating against minor petitioners because of their birth, color and blood and the previous servitude of their grandparents or great-grandparents bears no relation whatsoever to their educability in a public school together with white children.

---

[4] For full text of compulsory attendance statute see Appendix B, D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 201, 207.

[5] "Without any doubt there is also in the white man's concept of Negro 'race' an irrational element which cannot be grasped in terms of either biological or cultural differences. It is like the concept 'unclean' in primitive religion. It is invoked by the metaphor 'blood' when describing ancestry. The ordinary man means something particular but beyond secular and rational understanding when he refers to 'blood'. The one who has got the smallest drop of 'Negro blood' is as one who is smitten by a hideous disease. It does not help if he is good and honest, educated and intelligent, a good worker, an excellent citizen and an agreeable fellow. Inside him are hidden some unknown and dangerous potentialities, something which will sooner or later crop up." 1 Mydral, 100.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

This argument is supported by the following quotation in Petition and Brief in Support of Petition for Writ of Certiorari in the Supreme Court of the United States in Sweatt v. Painter, supra:

> "Dr. Robert Redfield, Chairman of the Department of Anthropology at the University of Chicago, testified, as an expert, that there is no recognizable difference as to capacities between students of different races and that scientific studies had concluded that differences in intellectual capacity or ability to learn have not been shown to exist between Negroes and other students. He testified that as a result of his training and study in his specialized field for some twenty years, it was his opinion that given a similar learning situation with a similar degree of preparation, one student would do as well as the other, on the average, without regard to race or color."

In regard to the question of a relationship between the act punished and the objective of the punishment, the Supreme Court had this to say at pages 319-320 in Cummings v. Missouri, supra:

> ". . . There can be no connection between the fact that Mr. Cummings entered or left the State of Missouri to avoid enrollment of draft in the military service of the United States and his fitness to teach the doctrines or administer the sacraments of his church, nor can a fact of this kind or the expression of words of sympathy with some of the persons drawn into the Rebellion constitute any evidence of the unfitness of the attorney or counsellor to practice his profession, or of the professor to teach the ordinary branches of education, or of the want of business knowledge or business capacity in the manager of a corporation, or in any director or trustee. It is manifest upon the mere statement of many of the acts and of the professions and pursuits, that there is no such relation between them as to render a denial of the commission of the acts at all appropriate as a condition of allowing the exercise of the professions and pursuits. The oath could not, therefore, have been required as a means of ascertaining whether the parties were qualified or not for their respective callings or the trusts with which they were charged. It was required in order to reach the person, not the calling. It was exacted, not from any notion that the several acts designated indicated unfitness for the callings, but because it was thought that the several acts deserved punishment and that for many of them there was no way to inflict punishment except by depriving the parties, who had committed them, of some of the rights and privileges of the citizen.

"The disabilities created by the constitution of Missouri must be regarded as penalties—they constitute punishment. We do not agree with the counsel of Missouri that 'to punish one is to deprive him of life, liberty, or property, and that to take from him any thing less that these is no punishment at all.' The learned counsel does not use these terms—life, liberty, and property—as comprehending every right known to the law. He does not include under liberty freedom from outrage on the feelings as well as restraint on the person. He does not include under property those estates which one may acquire in professions, though they are often the source of the highest emoluments and honors. The deprivation of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed, may be punishment, the circumstances attending and the causes of the deprivation determining this fact. Disqualification from office may be punishment as in cases of conviction upon impeachment. Disqualification from the pursuits of a lawful avocation, or from positions of trust, or from the privilege of appearing in the courts, or acting as an executor, administrator, or guardian, may also, and often has been, imposed as punishment." (Italics supplied.)

As we have already stated, in the present case there is absolutely no relation between color and educability. Therefore, when the respondents maintain separate schools for colored and white children, they seek to insult and degrade the former, not to educate. And, since it is thus a crime to be colored, Negro children are being arbitrarily punished by being singled out and deprived of their rights and privileges—i.e., to be given the same education under the same conditions as any other child, whatever its color. Further, respondents clearly do not include in their definition of liberty freedom from outrage on the feelings, since they inflict such arbitrary punishment on more than half the children under their jurisdiction every day they operate. There is no requirement that there must have been a previous enjoyment of a right. A study of the entire passage shows clearly that the Court means by any right previously enjoyed, any right constitutionally possessed.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

We have already adverted to the fact that the lack of any relationship between the methods used and the end sought to be attained is sufficient to constitute arbitrary imposition of punishment. Mr. Justice Murphy, in a concurring opinion in Oyama v. California, supra, observed that no rational basis for legislation existed where laws discriminating against citizens were motivated by racial hatred and intolerance.

And in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541, 542 (1942), this Court used racial discrimination as a standard for striking down a State law providing for sterilization of certain offenders, in the following terms: "When the law lays an unequal hand on those who have committed intrinsically the same quality of offense and sterilizes one and not the other, it has made as invidious a discrimination as if it had selected a particular race or nationality for oppressive treatment."

Having shown that minor petitioners have, in fact, suffered injury and punishment by reason of their segregation, and that the segregation on account of race or color may properly be regarded as wholly arbitrarily imposed punishment, we proceed to examine the other elements of a bill of attainder.

[3] No Trial or Hearing Is Given Petitioners

In a bill of attainder punishment is inflicted without a judicial trial, Cummings v. Missouri, supra. In the case at bar, nothing can be clearer than that, if the Board of Education is right in its contention that these Congressional Acts bar any Negro child, at any time, from attending a public school designated for use of white children, solely on the basis of race or color, these minor petitioners have been found guilty of being Negroes and convicted of the offense of possessing some inherent defects which render them unfit to attend Sousa Junior High School without a judicial trial. There has never been a finding, either by the Board or by Congress, that all Negro children, or any particular individuals among them constituted any such menace to white pupils as would warrant isolating all Negroes in schools limited by law to their sole use. No reason for segregation has ever been announced. And there has certainly been no attempt to try these individual minor petitioners to determine whether there is any valid ground for depriving them of their right to associate free of a limitation based on their race or color alone in school activities with white children of their own age.

[4] These Petitioners Are Convicted on Past Acts of a Crime by These Acts of Congress

In Cummings v. State of Missouri, supra, page 323, this Court defined a bill of attainder as "a Legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial." The opinion then continued: "If the punishment be less than death, the act is termed a bill of pains and penalties. Within the meaning of the Constitution, bills of attainder include bills of pains and penalties." The remainder of the opinion is, we think, particularly appropriate in the present case: "In these cases, the legislative body, in addition to its legitimate functions, exercises the powers and office of judge; it assumes, in the language of the text-books, judicial magistracy; it pronounces upon the guilt of the party, without any of the forms or safeguards of trial; it determines the sufficiency of the proofs produced, whether comformable to the rules of evidence or otherwise; and it fixes the degree of punishment in accordance with its own notions of the enormity of the offense."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Certainly the portion of the opinion just quoted fits the present situation. If the Board, in acting for the legislature is compelled by statute to segregate Negroes and whites, it is acting under legislation which has convicted Negroes of the crime of being inferior by birth, blood, and color and dooms them to separation, without declaring a previous condition of birth, blood or color to be a crime; the guilt attaches to any child the Board sees fit to classify as a Negro (Wall v. Oyster, supra), without any trial; without any proof that an individual Negro child is in fact so far inferior by birth, blood and color to white children that he may not associate with them in school, it requires that the Negro be taught in a separate schoolhouse; and it fixes the sentence to cover the entire time the child is subject to the jurisdiction of the Board and affects his entire life and deprives him of liberty, property, job opportunity and happiness.

It is manifestly clear that this Court should not interpret these Acts of Congress as compelling racial segregation which would render them unconstitutional when it is possible to interpret them as not requiring segregation and thus render them constitutional. We must assume that Congress enacted these statutes with a constitutional intent. See, Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, 157, 158 (1943). This would necessarily mean that they do not compel segregation for if these statutes are interpreted as compelling segregation they would clearly fall within the ban of the constitutional provision against bills of attainder.

C. If These Acts of Congress Are Interpreted as Permitting the Segregation of Pupils in the District of Columbia Solely on the Basis of Race or Color, Then to the Extent That This Permissive Legislation Is Implemented by the Action of the Appellees in Denying Admission of Minor Petitioners to Sousa Junior High School, the Action of Respondents Is Unconstitutional.

The arguments submitted under points I and II of this brief are supportive of this proposition. Therefore, this Court should not interpret these Acts of Congress as even authorizing or permitting segregation since any implementation of such authority by respondents would lead to an unconstitutional result, namely, the denial of the admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color.

III.

THE DENIAL OF ADMISSION OF MINOR PETITIONERS TO SOUSA JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL SOLELY ON THE BASIS OF RACE OR COLOR DEPRIVES THEM OF THEIR CIVIL RIGHTS IN VIOLATION OF ARTICLE VI, CLAUSE 2 OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES AND OF TITLE 8, UNITED STATES CODE, SECTIONS 41 AND 43, AND IN VIOLATION OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS, CHAPTER I, ARTICLE I, SECTION 3, AND CHAPTER IX, ARTICLES 55, 56.

A. The Respondents' Refusal to Admit Minor Petitioners to Sousa Junior High School Solely Because of Race or Color Deprives Them of Their Civil Rights in Violation of Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, Commonly Referred to as the Civil Rights Act.

It is apparent to petitioners that the racially segregated schools of the District of Columbia administered under control of respondents are operated in violation of the Civil

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Rights Act, Sections 41 and 43 of Title 8, U. S. Code, which provide:

> Section 41: Equal rights under the law:
>
> All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other. R. S. Section 1977.
>
> Section 43. Civil action for deprivation of rights:
>
> Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress. R. S. Section 1979.

In Hurd v. Hodge, supra, this court, in prohibiting courts of the District of Columbia from enforcement of racial restrictive covenants said of Section 42 of Title 8 U. S. Code, a companion section of Section 41 which is relied upon here:

> All the petitioners in these cases, as found by the District Court, are citizens of the United States. We have no doubt, that for the purposes of this section, the District of Columbia is included within the phrase 'Every state and Territory.' Nor can there be doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to enact such legislation with reference to the District of Columbia . . ."

While it is true that petitioners do not rely upon Title 8, U. S. Code, Section 42, the section of the Civil Rights Act considered in Hurd v. Hodge, supra, but upon Sections 41 and 43, it is hardly possible to conceive that the Supreme Court would make any differentiation in the applicability of these sections to the District of Columbia. The genesis of Sections 41 and 42 are the same. Both sections were originally contained in section 1, chapter 31 of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 (14 Stat. 27). Although now placed in different sections of Title 8, U. S. Code, both sections—41 and 42—secure the rights of persons and citizens in "every State and Territory." Hence, just as under the interpretation of Section 42 in Hurd v. Hodge, supra, the term "every State and Territory" must be said to include the District of Columbia, as regards Section 41. Any other construction would lack uniformity and would be unreasonable and historically illogical.

Section 43 of Title 8, U. S. Code, is derived from the Act of April 20, 1871, Chapter 22, 17 Stat. 13. As presently entitled under the Code, this section provides for a "civil action for deprivation of rights," obviously, therefore, if Section 41 of the Civil Rights Act is applicable to the District of Columbia, the section of the Civil Rights Act recognizing the means by which civil rights are vindicated by actions at law or suits in equity is equally applicable to violations of civil rights occurring in the District of Columbia. We conclude, therefore, that both Sections 41 and 43 are within the constitutional power of Congress to enact, and that these sections are operative in the District of Columbia.

The remaining question is whether government enforced racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia is violative of the Civil Rights Act. Petitioners contend that racial segregation in the public schools as enforced by respondent under color of law, does violate these sections.

The Congress of the United States, acting pursuant to its powers in the District of Columbia, has provided for public education there. It has given to persons residing within the District the privilege of securing, at public expense, an elementary and high school education. This privilege, we contend, once given must be afforded to all without any racial distinction. The Civil Rights Act compels such a result.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Civil Rights Act does not specifically mention public education. In fact, there is no specification of the particular rights protected, but rather a broad statement concerning "full and equal benefits of all laws" and enjoyment of "rights, privileges or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws." However, when we view the sections presumably directed against discriminatory governmental action in the light of the provisions of the Act of March 1, 1875, Chapter 114, 18 Stat. 335, concerning racial discrimination by individuals within the United States, it becomes abundantly clear that the sections here under discussion were meant to cover all situations in which, through governmental action, persons are deprived of some right, privilege or immunity recognized under the Constitution and laws of the United States. And these sections were enacted to insure that all citizens, white and black, should be vested with the same rights and the same responsibilities as citizens. Racial distinctions were thereby prohibited.

The cases support this analysis. In United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 555 (1875), this observed:

> "No question arises under the Civil Rights Act of April 9, 1866 (14 Stat. 27), which is intended for the protection of citizens of the United States in the enjoyment of certain rights, without discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, . . ."

And, in Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318 (1879), the Supreme Court stated that:

> "The plain object of these (civil rights) statutes, as of the Constitution which authorized them, was to place the colored race, in respect of civil rights, upon a level with whites. They made the rights and responsibilities, civil and criminal, of the two races exactly the same."

Our national policy, as found in the Constitution, laws and treaties of the United States as well as in the applicable legal precedents, renders unlawful the actions of respondents in excluding minor petitioners from attendance at Sousa Junior High School solely because of race and color. In speaking of the Fourteenth Amendment and the Civil Rights Act of 1866, of which sections 41 and 43 are constituent parts, this court in Hurd v. Hodge, supra, at page 32, said:

> ". . . It is clear that in many significant respects the statute and the Amendment were expressions of the same general congressional policy. Indeed, as the legislative debates reveal, one of the primary purposes of many members of Congress in supporting the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment was to incorporate the guarantees of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 in the organic law of the land . . ."

In a series of State cases this Court has made clear some prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment against government enforced distinctions based solely on race or color. In the case of Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S 303, 306, 307 (1879), this Court condemned the systematic exclusion of colored persons from juries. Similarly the right to qualify as a voter in primary or general elections has been protected against denial because of race or color. Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649 (1944). This Court has held that the Constitution of the United States prohibits denial to a person, because of his race or ancestry, of the right to pursue his accustomed calling. Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410 (1948); Yick Wo v.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 (1886). States may not enforce agreements excluding Negroes from owning or occupying property in white neighborhoods. Shelly v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1 (1948). Nor may railroads segregate Negro passengers in dining cars. Henderson v. United States, supra. Nor may state Universities, when they admit Negroes make any racial distinctions in affording them educational opportunities. McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637.

These holdings are clearly indicative of the construction to be given to the relevant provisions of the Civil Rights Act in their application to the school officials of the District of Columbia. Moreover, the explicit language employed by Congress to effectuate its purposes leaves no doubt that exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color is prohibited by the Civil Rights Act. That statute by its terms, requires that all persons shall have the same rights "as is enjoyed by white citizens . . . to the full and equal benefit of all laws." That minor petitioners have been denied that right by virtue of the action of the respondents is clear. They have been denied admission to Sousa Junior High School solely by reason of race or color. It is no answer to petitioners to say that whites may also be denied admission to some Negro school because of race or color.

Speaking on this exact point in Shelley v. Kraemer, supra, at page 22, this court speaking through Chief Justice Vinson said:

> "Equal protection of the laws is not achieved through indiscriminate imposition of inequalities."

That these sections of the Civil Rights Act prohibit racial distinctions is too clear for argument. That these sections encompass the right or privilege of public education is free from any reasonable doubt, for at the very foundation of our democratic institutions, in the preservation of rights and the recognition of the duties of citizens, stands the public school as the logical agency for giving the people the attitudes and skills requisite for effective participation in a democracy. We strongly urge this Court to recognize that the Civil Rights Act prohibits government enforced racial segregation in public education in the District of Columbia.

B. Respondents' Refusal to Admit Minor Petitioners to Sousa Junior High School Solely Because of Race Deprives Them of Fundamental Freedoms in Violation of Chapter I, Articles 1(3), 2(2), Chapter IX, Articles 55(c) and 56 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Articles 1(3), 2(2), 55(c) and 56 of the United Nations Charter, 59 Stat. 1035, et seq., announce a policy against segregation and discrimination on the basis of race. The United States is a member of the United Nations and one of the signatory powers to the United Nations Charter.

Chapter I, Article 1(3) declares:

> "One of the purposes of the Organization is to achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; and . . ."

Chapter I, Article 2(2) engages that:

> "All members in order to ensure to all of them the rights and benefits resulting from membership, shall fulfill in good faith the obligation assumed by them in accordance with the present charter."

Furthermore, Chapter IX, Article 55(c) avows:

> "With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination > of peoples, the United Nations shall promote . . . universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

And Chapter IX, Article 56 breathes meaning into this vow by requiring that:

> "All members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the Organization for the achievement of the purpose set forth in Article 55."

The petitioners contend that these articles give to minor petitioners rights which the respondents have violated because: (1) the United Nations Charter is a treaty of the United States, (2) the Articles of the Charter here in issue are capable of judicial enforcement, and (3) properly constructed, they prohibit the segregation of races in free public education.

That the United Nations Charter is a treaty to which the United States is a signatory has not been seriously questioned. It was negotiated by the President, submitted by him to the Senate of the United States for ratification and was ratified by that body as a treaty of the United States. It is likewise the position of the petitioners that Articles 55 and 56—the provisions of the treaty before this Court—are capable of judicial interpretation and application without further legislative or executive action. As a treaty the Charter became "the supreme Law of the Land" and it thus becomes the duty of the courts, both state and federal, to give effect to its provisions. U. S. Constitution, Article 6, Clause 2.

The courts, however, in construing Article VI of the Constitution with reference to judicial enforcement of treaties, have divided treaties into two classes—self-executing and non-self-executing. Self-executing treaties are said to be those which are capable of judicial enforcement without further legislative or executive action and executory or non-self-executing treaties are those which require further political action before judicial enforcement. In Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 314 (1829), this Court, speaking through Chief Justice Marshall, pointed to the two classes of treaties and purported to set forth the basis upon which the distinction between them is to be made.

> "Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in the courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature, whenever it operates of itself, without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulations import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the legislature must execute the contract, before it can become a rule for the court."

Casual examination of this quotation probably suggests that the distinction between the classes of treaties is to be determined by a finding whether the treaty is in form and substance a contract. Viewed in proper perspective, and with particular reference to U. S. v Percheman, 7 Pet. 51 (1833), it must be concluded that the distinction is not made on such basis but is in fact determined by the subject matter of the treaty. If the subject matter of the treaty before the court is such that it is only capable of interpretation and application by the legislative or executive branches of the federal government, the treaty is executory or non-self-executory. Conversely, if the subject matter of the treaty before the Court is of such a character that it can be interpreted and applied by the judiciary the treaty is self-executing. Under the provision of Article VI all treaties become the "Law" of the Land. The fact that a particular treaty contemplates or requires future action does not make it any less the Law of the Land, (Bacardi Corp. v. Domanech, 311 U. S. 150 (1940)), nor is it any less the Law of the Land if Congress may, within its competence, implement any such treaty if it so desires.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Consequently, the doctrine of non-self-executing treaties in American Constitutional Law is but an aspect of the doctrine of "political questions"—"separation of powers." In other words, the sole distinction between self-executing and non-self-executing treaties has been used in American Constitutional Law only with reference to the agency of the Federal Government competent to execute that treaty. All other factors are irrelevant.

The subject matter of Articles 55 and 56 relates to human rights and fundamental freedoms. Their provisions—and particularly Article 56—impose upon the agencies of the United States Government the duty of taking "separate action" to enforce these human rights and fundamental freedoms without racial distinction as the "law of the land." In determining the agencies of the United States Government capable of carrying into effect these articles, it cannot be said that the subject matter is within the exclusive area of the political branches of the government. For these reasons, it is the view of the petitioners that Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter are laws of the United States, do not require further legislative action, and are enforceable by the judiciary.

The petitioners find support for their position in the concurring opinions in Oyama v. U. S., supra. In the Oyama case, supra, the major holding of the Court was that a section of the California Alien Land Law was unconstitutional in that it was a denial of the equal protection of the law. The four concurring Justices were of the opinion that the whole statute was unconstitutional. In one of the concurring opinions, Mr. Justice Murphy, with whom Mr. Justice Rutledge joined, outlined the discriminatory aspects of the statute, examined the embarrassing history, and stated at page 673:

> "Moreover, this nation has recently pledged itself, through the United Nations Charter, to promote respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language and religion. The Alien Land Law stands as a barrier to the fulfillment of that national pledge. Its inconsistency with the Charter which has been duly ratified and adopted by the United States, is but one more reason why the statute must be condemned.

"And so in origin, purpose, administration and effect the Alien Land Law does violence to the high ideals of the Constitution of the United States and the Charter of the United Nations . . ."

The language leaves no doubt that they considered that the human rights provisions of the Charter prohibited segregation on the grounds of race or color, and, further, that the Charter is binding upon the courts of the United States. Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Douglas concurred, and their opinion at pages 649-650, is also pertinent:

". . . we have recently pledged ourselves to cooperate with the United Nations to 'promote . . . universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.' (Citing Articles 55 and 56.) How can this nation be faithful to this international pledge if state laws which bar land ownership and occupancy by aliens on account of race are permitted to be enforced?"

In Namba v. McCourt, 185 Ore. 579, 204 P. (2d) 569 (1949), the court concluded that the United States had "become bound by Articles 55 and 56 of the United Nations Charter."

Moreover, it appears that in two instances, where lower courts were faced with the enforcement of other Articles of the Charter these courts have indicated that the Charter is a treaty having force and effect of law without legislative implementation. Thus, in Balfour, Guthrie and Company v. United States, 90 F. Supp. 831 (N.D. Cal. S.D. 1950),

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

the Court held "That the United Nations Organization could sue the United States under the "Suits in Admiralty Act." In Curran v. City of New York, 191 Misc. 229, 77 N.Y.S. (2d) 206 (1947), aff'd 275 App. Div. 784, 88 N.Y.S. (2d) 924 (1949), the Court held "That Articles 104 and 105 of the Charter were the supreme law of the land, and that by operation of these Articles the organization had the capacity to own land and was immune from taxation." These cases, though not involving Articles 55 and 56, are offered as additional support for petitioners' position.

Articles 55 and 56 properly construed would prohibit government enforced racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia. The Charter of the United Nations must be given a liberal construction in order to effectuate its objectives. The objective of Article 55 of the Charter is to secure to all persons within a particular society the basic freedoms and rights of that society. Basic in any democratic society is public education. The petitioners see no necessity to belabor this point, for whether public education be regarded as a right or a privilege, it has been recognized throughout the United States as a basic element of government and in our interpretation of Articles 55 and 56 it must be of necessity included within the terms "human rights and fundamental freedoms."

Even if, arguendo, the court should determine that the Charter of the United Nations must be implemented by further legislation to be specifically enforceable, it is clear that the ratification of the Charter by the Senate of the United States and the signing of the Charter by its officially appointed representatives constitute a declaration of the Public Policy of the United States. As the Honorable Manley O. Hudson stated in 44 Amer. Journal of Int. Law, 543 at 548, while contending that the Charter is not specifically enforceable: "The fact that the United States has obligated itself to cooperate may be taken into consideration in determining the national public policy . . ."

It is also a morally binding promise to the other signatories of the United Nations Charter. Certainly the word "pledge" in Article 56 implies an obligation and the reference to "separate" action as distinct from "joint" action indicates that the members are bound to act in accordance with the provisions of that section.

As a morally binding promise of the United States and the declared public policy of the United States the Charter provisions should serve as an aid in the interpretation of the Constitution and Statutes of the United States. Thus the California Supreme Court in Sei Fujii v. State, 38 Adv. Cal. Rep. 817, 242 P (2d) 617 (1952), while finding that Articles 55 and 56 of the United Nations Charter are not self executing, and therefore those treaty provisions do not ipso facto invalidate the alien land law of the State of California enacted in 1920, did find that the United Nations Charter represents "a moral commitment of the foremost importance." It seems fairly clear that the majority opinion of the Supreme Court of California, which held the California alien land law invalid under what it conceived to be a more modern and democratic concept of the equal protection clause of the Federal Constitution, was influenced by the "moral commitments" of the Charter. As the Court stated in 242 P (2d) at page 622:

> "The humane and enlightened objectives of the United Nations Charter are, of course, entitled to respectful consideration by the courts and Legislatures of every member nation, since that document expresses the universal desire of thinking men for peace and for equality of rights and opportunities. The Charter represents a moral committment of foremost importance, and we must not permit the spirit of our pledge to be compromised or disparaged in either our domestic or foreign affairs." (Italics supplied.)

This decision was in conformity with a previous decision in Perez v. Lippold, supra, which, in declaring the California miscegenation statutes unconstitutional, cited the Charter provisions as buttressing the conclusion reached.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It is of interest to note also that the Supreme Court of Ontario has already determined that the Charter provision of the United Nations serves to give content and meaning to the Statutes of Ontario. In the case of Re: Drummond Wren, (1945) Ont. R. 778, 4 D.L.R. 674, that court after referring to the Preamble of the Charter, struck down a restrictive covenant discriminating against "Jews or persons of objectionable nationality" as repugnant to the Charter. The Court ruled that under the Charter, Canada was pledged to promote "universal respect for and observance of fundamental freedoms for all without discrimination as to race, sex, language and religion."

It is significant that prior to the ratification of the Charter by Canada, a similar racial restrictive covenant was objected to on the grounds that it violated section 1 of the Ontario Racial Discrimination Act and the same Ontario Supreme Court held that though the covenant was discriminatory in its effect, it did not violate the Act. Re: McDougal and Waddell (1945), O.W.N. 272, 2 D.L.R. 244. In the Drummond Wren case, supra, Re: McDougal and Waddel, supra, was overruled because the court conceived that the provisions of the United Nations Charter against racial discrimination established the public policy found to be controlling and the Racial Discrimination Act constituted a legislative recognition of the public policy applied in the Drummond Wren case. In effect, the court held that the Racial Discrimination Act should be construed in the light of the Charter of the United Nations.

We therefore urge this Court to hold that "in origin, purpose, administration and effect" government enforced racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia "does violence to the high ideals of the Constitution of the United States and the Charter of the United Nations."

IV.

THE COURT BELOW ERRED IN NOT GRANTING PETITIONERS THE RELIEF PRAYED FOR AND IN GRANTING RESPONDENTS' MOTION TO DISMISS MINOR PETITIONERS' COMPLAINT ON THE GROUND THAT IT FAILED TO STATE A CLAIM ON WHICH RELIEF COULD BE GRANTED.

Reference to the pleadings in the instant case reveals that the respondents relied upon a Motion to Dismiss on the sole ground "that the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted."

Such a motion to dismiss, as was true of the old common law demurrer, now abolished in the District of Columbia, said in so many words that the allegations of the complaint with all legal inference conceded did not spell out a cause of action. All things alleged for the purposes of the pleadings must be accepted as being true. What then are the essential allegations of the complaint? Clearly and unequivocally the complaint alleges that the respondents with full power of allocation of minor petitioners in the public schools of the District of Columbia, failed to assign the minor petitioners to the Sousa Junior High School and actually refused them admission to said Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color. The Motion to Dismiss concedes the accuracy of this statement. The complaint alleges further that the respondents are construing and applying Acts of Congress so as to require them to deny minor petitioners admission to and to exclude them from the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color. This allegation the Motion to Dismiss freely admits. The complaint alleges that every administrative requirement was met in seeking admission of minor petitioners to the Sousa Junior High School. The Motion to Dismiss agrees that this was done. The complaint alleges that the respondents are pursuing and have pursued the policy, practice, custom and usage of denying minor petitioners admission to and excluding them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School and from enjoyment of the educational opportunities afforded therein solely because of their race or color. The Motion to Dismiss concedes such action on the part of the respondents. The complaint seeks not only injunctive relief to correct these violations of the petitioners' constitutional and statutory rights, but, asks the court to render a declaratory judgment to the effect that statutes enacted by Congress regulating public education in the District of Columbia do not require exclusion of the minor petitioners from the Sousa Junior High School, and, that respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinctions with respect to them because of their race or color.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Facing the test to which the complaint was put by the motion to dismiss, the Court below, through Judge Walter M. Bastian, embraced the theory urged by respondents and signed an order dismissing the cause.

"ORDER

> "Upon consideration of the complaint, of the motion of the defendants to dismiss the above-entitled cause, of the memoranda of points and authorities in support of and in opposition to said motion and of the arguments of counsel for the plaintiffs and for the defendants, it is, by the Court, this 9th day of April, 1951,
>
> "ORDERED, that the above-entitled cause be, and it is hereby, finally dismissed.
>
> "(s) Walter M. Bastian, Judge."

This order is tantamount to a judicial pronouncement that an admitted statement of denial of civil rights by government officials, solely on the ground of race or color, presents no cause for relief. This order amounts to a direct statement that the defendants below correctly interpreted and put into effect statutes enacted by Congress as compelling racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and that said respondents lawfully pursued the policy, practice, custom, and usage of denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color; and that such interpretation, enforcement, and action on the part of said respondents did no violence to the constitutional and statutory rights of the petitioners. The very making of such statements carries its own refutation.

The Court below clearly erred in not requiring the respondents to answer the complaint. The Court also erred in not issuing a declaratory judgment to the effect that no congressional statute in the District of Columbia could be properly interpreted as requiring racial segregation, and to the effect further that said respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them solely because of their race or color. The Court erred in not restraining the action of the respondents in refusing to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color, without authority, and in violation of the constitutional and statutory rights of the petitioners.

CONCLUSION

The question whether the Federal Government has the power to compel the segregation of pupils on the basis of race or color alone in affording educational opportunities in the public schools in the District of Columbia is here presented to this Court for the first time. Here no question of equality of facilities is in issue. Here is raised the sole question whether under our democratic system and the protective covering of our Constitution, Congress or public school officials, either or both, have the power to bar Negroes from studying with whites in public schools in the District of Columbia because of their race or color alone.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

No reason or justification is offered by the respondents nor, in the opinion of the petitioners, can any be given, save the dubious one that the Acts of Congress compel it.

Our international relations, our concepts of liberty, our belief in democracy, cannot be reconciled with government imposed racial segregation in education in the District of Columbia. The history of our country, the loyalty of the Negro, the decisions of this Court, all require a condemnation of this un-American practice.

Governmental action has passed beyond the brink of constitutionality when it imposes disabilities upon the Negro people, loyal in war and in peace, native born citizens, limiting their liberty of choice of schools solely because of their race or color. This Court has approved of comparable federal action only when the fate of the Nation was at stake, and even then, it subjected the Government's action to a searching inquiry and laid down definite standards which the Government was required to meet. The actions of respondents in the instant case not only were not taken under such perilous circumstances, but did not meet even the minimum standards set for imposing racial distinctions under those conditions.

Wherefore it is respectfully submitted that the decree of the District Court should be reversed.

Respectfully submitted,

George E. C. Hayes
James M. Nabrit, Jr.
Counsel for Petitioners

Julian R. Dugas
George M. Johnson
Dorsey E. Lane
Harry B. Merican
Herbert O. Reid, Jr.
James A. Washington
Of Counsel

APPENDIX

Page

A.

Statutory and Constitutional Provisions in the States where segregation in education is institutionalized 1-7

B.

District of Columbia Compulsory Attendance Law 8

APPENDIX

A.

Statutory and Constitutional Provisions in the States Where Segregation in Education Is Institutionalized.

ALABAMA

". . . Separate schools shall be provided for white and colored children, and no child of either race shall be permitted to attend a school of the other race." Constitution. Article XIV, 1901.

ARKANSAS

"Duties and powers of school directors. . . . The board of school directors of each district in the State shall be charged with the following powers and perform the following duties:

"(c) Establish separate schools for white and colored persons." (Acts 1931, No. 169, Sec. 97, page 475; Pope's Digest, Sec. 11535.)

DELAWARE

"In addition to the income of the investments of the Public School Fund, the General Assembly shall make provision for the annual payment of not less than one hundred thousand dollars for the benefit of the free public schools which, with the income of the investments of the Public School Fund, shall be equitably apportioned among the school districts of the States as the General Assembly shall provide; and the money so apportioned shall be used exclusively for the payment of teachers' salaries and for furnishing free text books; provided, however, that in such apportionment, no distinction shall be made on account of race or color, and separate schools for white and colored children shall be maintained. All other expenses connected with the maintenance of free public schools, and all expenses connected with the erection or repair of free public school buildings shall be defrayed in such manner as shall be provided by law." Constitution. Article X, Sec. 2, 1897.

FLORIDA

"White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school, but impartial provision shall be made for both." Constitution. Article XII, Sec. 12, 1885.

GEORGIA

"There shall be a thorough system of common schools for the education of children in the elementary branches of an English education only, as nearly uniform as practicable, the expenses of which shall be provided for by taxation, or otherwise. The schools shall be free to all children of the State, but separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored races." Constitution. Article VIII, Sec. 1, Para. 1, 1877. (Language in italics was deleted in 1912.)

KENTUCKY

"In distributing the school fund no distinction shall be made on account of race or color, and separate schools for white and colored children shall be maintained." Constitution. Sec. 187, 1890.

LOUISIANA

". . . Separate free public schools shall be maintained for the education of white and colored children between the ages of six and eighteen years; provided, that kindergartens may be authorized for children between the ages of four and six years." Constitution. Article XII, Sec. 1, 1921.

MARYLAND

An. Code, 1924, Sec. 114; 1912, Sec. 63; 1904, Sec. 59; 1888, Sec. 54; 1872, Ch. 377; 1916, Ch. 506, Sec. 63.

"All white youths between the ages of six and twenty-one years shall be admitted into such public schools of the State, the studies of which they may be able to pursue; provided, that whenever there are grade schools, the principal and the county superintendent shall determine to which school pupils shall be admitted."

Flack's Anno. Code of Maryland (1952), Article 77, Ch. 9, Sec. 124.

An. Code, 1924, Sec. 200; 1912, Sec. 131; 1904, Sec. 124; 1888, Sec. 96; 1872, Ch. 377; 1904, Ch. 584; 1916, Ch. 506, Sec. 131; 1922, Ch. 382, Sec. 131; 1937, Ch. 552.

"It shall be the duty of the county board of education to establish one or more public schools in each election district

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

for all colored youths, between six and twenty years of age, to which admission shall be free, and which shall be kept open not less than one hundred and eighty (180) actual school days or nine months in each year; provided, that the colored population of any such district shall, in the judgment of the county board of education, warrant the establishment of such a school or schools."

Flack's Anno. Code of Maryland (1952), Article 77, Ch. 18, Sec. 207.

An. Code, 1924, Sec. 201; 1912, Sec. 132; 1904, Sec. 125; 1888, Sec. 97; 1870, Ch. 311; 1872, Ch. 377, Sub-Ch. 18, Sec. 2; 1874, Ch. 463; 1916, Ch. 506, Sec. 132.

"Each colored school shall be under the direction of a district board of school trustees, to be appointed by the county board of education subject to the provisions of Section 8 of this article, and schools for colored children shall be subject to all the provisions of this Article."

Flack's Anno. Code of Maryland (1952), Article 77, Ch. 18, Sec. 208.

An. Code, 124, Sec. 211; 1912, Sec. 142; 1904, Sec. 139; 1898, Ch. 273, Sec. 5; 1910, Ch. 210, Sec. 139 (p. 232); 1916, Ch. 506, Sec. 142.

"It shall be the duty of the county board of education in each county of the State, when in their judgment there is need thereof, to provide a suitable building or room, or rooms, connected with one of the colored schools of said county, for the establishment of a central colored industrial schools, and to provide for the maintenance of such central colored industrial school where instruction shall be given daily in domestic science and in such industrial arts as may be determined by the county board of education. One-half of the appropriation hereinafter provided shall be used for the maintenance of such industrial school."

Flack's Anno. Code of Maryland, Article 77, Ch. 20, Sec. 203.

An. Code, 1924, Sec. 212; 1912, Sec. 143; 1904, Sec. 140; 1898, Ch. 273, Sec. 6; 1910, Ch. 210, Sec. 140 (p. 232); 1916, Ch. 506, Sec. 143.

"Whenever any such colored industrial school is opened in any county the secretary of the county board of education shall report the fact to the state superintendent of schools, and he, or an assistant designated by him, shall visit said school and shall give, if in his judgment it is warranted, a certificate of approval of the conditions and the plan upon which said industrial school is conducted, to the secretary of the county board of education. The state superintendent of schools shall submit annually to the Comptroller of the treasury of the State on or before the last day of September, a complete list of such schools as are entitled to receive the special appropriation for industrial education."

Flack's Anno. Code of Maryland (1937), Article 77, Ch. 20, Sec. 204.

An. Code, 1924, Sec. 256; 1912, Sec. 193; 1908, Ch. 599.

"There shall be located in the city of Baltimore or elsewhere (if the board of education deem best) a state normal school for the instruction and practice of colored teachers in the science of education, the art of teaching and the mode of governing schools, to be known as State Normal School No. 3; the said school shall be under the control of the state board of education, who shall appoint the principal and necessary assistants; and the faculty shall consist of a principal and as many teachers as the board shall appoint. The sessions of the school shall be determined by the state board of education, who shall prescribe the curriculum of study, which however, shall include courses for the special preparation of instructors for teaching the elements of agriculture and mechanic arts, provide necessary quarters, supplies and apparatus, fix the qualifications for admission as students, the salary of the principal, assistant teachers and employees."

Flack's Anno. Code of Maryland, Article 77, Ch. 21, Sec. 252.

MISSISSIPPI

"Separate school shall be maintained for children of the white and colored races."

Constitution. Article VIII, Sec. 207, 1890.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

MISSOURI

"Separate free public schools shall be established for the education of children of African descent."

Constitution. Article XI, Sec. 3, 1875.

NORTH CAROLINA

"The General Assembly, at its first session under this Constitution, shall provide by taxation and otherwise for a general and uniform system of public schools, wherein tuition shall be free of charge to all the children of the State between the ages of six and twenty-one years. And the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate public schools; but there shall be no discrimination in favor of or to the prejudice of either race."

Constitution. Article IX, Sec. 2, 1868; Convention, 1875.

OKLAHOMA

"Separate schools for white and colored children with like accommodation shall be provided by the Legislature and impartially maintained. The term "colored children," as used in this section, shall be construed to mean children of African descent. The term "white children" shall include all other children." (Const. 1907, as amended Stat. 1931, 13676.)

Constitution. Article XIII, Sec. 3.

"The public schools of the State of Oklahoma shall be organized and maintained upon a complete plan of separation between the colored and white races, with impartial facilities for both races." (Laws 1949, p. 436, Art. 5, Sec. 1.)

Okla. Statutes Annot., Title 70, Article 5, Sec. 5-1.

"Any teacher in this state who shall wilfully and knowingly allow any child of the colored race to attend the school maintained for the white race or allow any white child to attend the school maintained for the colored race shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than ten dollars ($10.00) nor more than fifty dollars ($50.00), and his certificate shall be cancelled and he shall not have another issued to him for a term of one (1) year." (Laws 1949, p. 537, Art. 5, Sec. 4.)

Okla. Statutes Annot., Title 70, Article 5, Sec. 5-4.

"It shall be unlawful for any person, corporation or association of persons to maintain or operate any college, school or institution of this State where persons of both white and colored races are received as pupils for instruction, and any person or corporation who shall operate or maintain any such college, school or institution in violation hereof shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars ($100.00) nor more than five hundred dollars ($500.00), and each day such school, college or institution shall be open and maintained shall be deemed a separate offense. (Provided, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to programs of instruction leading to a particular degree given at State owned or operated colleges or institutions of higher education of this State established for and/or used by the white race, where such programs of instruction leading to a particular degree are not given at colleges or institutions of higher education of this State established for and/or used by the colored race; provided further, that said programs of instruction leading to a particular degree shall be given at such colleges or institutions of higher education upon a segregated basis. Segregated basis is defined in this Act as classroom instruction given in separate classrooms, or at separate times. The provisions of this section are subject to Section Four (4) hereof." (Laws 1949, p. 537, Art. 5, Sec. 5, as amended by Laws 1949, Ch. 15, p. 608, Sec. 1, H.B. No. 405, approved June 9, 1949.)

Okla. Statutes Annot., Title 70, Article 5, Sec. 5-5.

SOUTH CAROLINA

"Separate schools shall be provided for the children of the white and colored races, and no child of either race shall ever be permitted to attend a school provided for children of the other race."

Constitution. Article XI, Sec. 7, 1895.

TENNESSEE

"Knowledge, learning and virtue, being essential to the preservation of republican institutions, and the diffusion of the opportunities and advantages of education throughout the different portions of the state, being highly conducive to the promotion of this end, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, in all future periods of this government, to cherish literature and science. And the fund called the common school fund, and all the lands and proceeds thereof, dividends, stocks, and other property of every description whatever, heretofore by law appropriated by the General Assembly of this State for the use of common schools and all such as shall hereafter be appropriated, shall remain a perpetual fund, the principal of which shall never be diminished by legislative appropriations; and the interest thereof shall be inviolably appropriated to the support and encouragement of common schools through the State, and for the equal benefit of all the people thereof; and no law shall be made authorizing said fund or any part thereof to be diverted to any other use than the support and encouragement of common schools. The State taxes derived hereafter from polls shall be appropriated to educational purposes, in such manner as the General Assembly shall, from time to time, direct by law. No school established or aided under this section shall allow white and Negro children to be received as scholars together in the same school. The above provisions shall not prevent the Legislature from carrying into effect any laws that have been passed in favor of the colleges, universities, or academies, or from authorizing heirs or distributes to receive and enjoy excheated property under such laws as shall be passed from time to time."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Constitution. Article XI, Sec. 12, 1870.

TEXAS

"Separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored children, and impartial provision shall be made for both."

Constitution. Article VII, Sec. 7, 1876.

VIRGINIA

"White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school."

Constitution. Article IX, Sec. 140, 1902.

WEST VIRGINIA

"White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school."

Constitution. Article XII, Sec. 2, 1872.

APPENDIX

B.

District of Columbia Compulsory Attendance Law

"Section 1. Every parent, guardian, or other person residing permanently or temporarily in the District of Columbia who has custody or control of a child between the ages of seven and sixteen years shall cause said child to be regularly instructed in a public school or in a private or parochial school or instructed privately during the period of each year in which the public schools of the District of Columbia are in session: Provided, that instruction given in such private or parochial school or privately, is deemed equivalent by the Board of Education to the instruction given in the public schools."

"Section 7. The parent, guardian, or other person residing permanently or temporarily in the District of Columbia and having charge or control of any child between the ages of seven and sixteen years who is unlawfully absent from public or private school or private instruction shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction of failure to keep such child regularly in public or private school or to cause it to be regularly instructed in private, shall be punished by a fine of $10 or by commitment to jail for five days, or both, at the discretion of the court: Provided, that each two days such child remains away from school unlawfully shall constitute a separate offense: Provided, further, that upon conviction of the first offense, sentence may, upon payment of costs, be suspended and the defendant placed on probation."

43 Stat. 806, 807, Ch. 140, Art. I, Sec. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 201, 207).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

FILE COPY

DEC 9 1952

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1952

No. ~~413~~ 8 4

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, ET AL.,
Petitioners,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, ET AL.,
Respondents.

REPLY BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS

GEORGE E. C. HAYES
JAMES M. NABRIT, JR.
Counsel for Petitioners

JULIAN R. DUGAS
GEORGE M. JOHNSON
DORSEY E. LANE
HARRY B. MERICAN
HERBERT O. REID, JR.
JAMES A. WASHINGTON
Of Counsel

Printed by Law Reporter Printing Co., 518 5th St., Wash., D. C.

INDEX

Page

REPLY BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS 1

ANSWER TO RESPONDENTS' CONTENTION THAT:

I. The Complaint Filed Below States No Cause of Action Because, Inter Alia, It Fails to Set Forth Any Injuries to the Petitioners 1

II. (A). Acts of Congress Providing for Education of Children of the District of Columbia Require Such Education in a Dual School System and Have Been So Construed by This Court ... 5
(B). Construction of Locally Applicable Laws by the Highest Court of the District of Columbia Is Normally Accepted by This Court 5

III. The Dual School System in the District of Columbia Is Not Violative of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States 7

CONCLUSION 10

TABLE OF CITATIONS

Carr v. Corning, 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2) 14, 1950 6
Federal Communications System v. Columbia Broadcasting System, 311 U. S. 132 6
Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337 9
Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475 (1903) 4
Helvering v. Reynolds, 313 U. S. 428 6
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390 (1923) 4
Scott v. Sanford, 19 Howard 393 7
U. S. v. C. I. O., 335 U. S. 160, 120-121 6
U. S. v. Raynor, 302 U. S. 540 6

In The

Supreme Court of the United States

October Term, 1952

No. 413

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, Et Al.,
Petitioners,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, Et Al.,
Respondents.

REPLY BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS

In order to clarify the issues in this case and to indicate some minor corrections in the briefs and record and to disclose some apparent misconceptions on the part of respondents with respect to the legal theory underlying petitioners' cause of action, petitioners submit this reply brief.

This reply brief deals with certain of the points advanced by the respondents in their brief which will be identified by number and language as used by respondents.

I.

THE COMPLAINT FILED BELOW STATES NO CAUSE OF ACTION BECAUSE, INTER ALIA, IT FAILS TO SET FORTH ANY INJURIES TO THE PETITIONERS.

Here respondents rely upon the fact that minor petitioners do now attend a junior high school in said District of Columbia to support their assertion that the complaint fails to set forth any injury to the petitioners because (1) the compulsory law does not require petitioners to send their children to public schools and does not require them to go to any school; (2) the complaint fails to show by comparison that Sousa Junior High School has educational opportunities which are superior to educational opportunities in the high school which minor petitioners do now attend, and (3) the allegations of the petitioners are merely legal conclusions.

It is evident that respondents misconceive the gravamen of the complaint. For the purpose of determining whether the injury has been alleged it is only necessary to examine the allegations of the complaint with respect to factual matters in the light of the motion to dismiss. The motion to dismiss, like the old common law demurrer, admits all facts well pleaded. These facts are: that minor petitioners, Negroes, citizens and residents of the District of Columbia, accompanied by their parents, Negroes, citizens, taxpayers and residents of the District of Columbia, at the proper time for admission of students and possessing all qualifications for admission to a junior high school, applied to Sousa Junior High School for admission and enrollment and were denied admission and enrollment solely because of race or color. Admission to Sousa Junior High School was denied by respondent Eleanor P. McAuliffe, principal of Sousa Junior High School, solely upon the basis of race or color; and thereafter petitioners exhausted all of their administrative remedies up to and including the Board of Education, which Board still denied admission and enrollment into Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color. The petitioners are suffering irreparable injury by reason of this action of respondents and are threatened with irreparable injury in the future at the hands of respondents.

These facts clearly show an admission by the respondents that they denied petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School for no reason other than because of their race or color, and that this denial was injurious and threatened to injure the petitioners in the future. These are all the facts essential to establish a justiciable claim by the petitioners and to provide a basis for the relief requested of the Court by the petitioners. Not only did respondents admit all these facts in their motion to dismiss, but with respect to all these facts except injury, they enumerate them in their brief as a correct statement of the facts. On these admitted facts the only question before this Court is a question of law.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

That question of law is—Whether the respondents possess the power to segregate pupils in the District of Columbia for the purpose of public education solely on the basis of race or color. Or to express it in another way, whether the action of respondents in denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color violates rights secured to petitioners by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The court below dismissed the complaint, thus deciding this issue in the negative.

In the transmission of the record in this case, from the District Court to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, and in turn to this Court, a clause in paragraph sixteen of petitioners' original complaint was inadvertently omitted. This clause, italicized in the paragraph set out below, we submit for inclusion in the proceedings in this case.

> "16. A present actual case or controversy exists between plaintiffs and defendants. Plaintiffs, and other Negroes similarly situated, on whose behalf this suit is brought, are suffering irreparable injury, and are threatened with irreparable injury in the future by reason of the acts of defendants hereinbefore set forth. They have no plain, adequate or complete remedy to redress the wrongs or illegal acts hereinbefore set forth other than this action for an injunction. Any other remedy to which plaintiffs, and other Negroes similarly situated, could be remitted would be attended > by such uncertainties and delays as to deny substantial relief, would involve a multiplicity of suits, and would cause further irreparable injury, damage, vexation and inconvenience to plaintiffs and other Negroes similarly situated."

This clause as above set out was a part of the original complaint with respect to which the court below granted the motion to dismiss, and its inclusion here can in no wise prejudice the case of the respondents.

On the legal issue as to the power of respondents to take the action complained of, the mere deprivation of a civil right by government, has been held by this Court in numerous cases, to constitute injury. See: Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475 (1903). In addition, the respondents admitted the well pleaded operative factual allegation of injury contained in paragraph 16 which allegation was not a legal conclusion.

As to the assertion that these petitioners were not compelled by law to send their children to any school or to the public schools, it is sufficient to point out that having chosen to avail themselves of the educational opportunities afforded by the government in the public schools, as they had a right to do, Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390 (1923), petitioners were compelled by threat of criminal sanction to send their children to the school set apart by the respondents for Negroes alone.

As to respondents' contention that the failure of the petitioners to compare educational opportunities offered in the school they now attend with those afforded in Sousa Junior High School, it is apparent that respondents misconceive the legal theory underlying the complaint. Petitioners complain of a deprivation of the right to choose Sousa Junior High School without any limitation based solely on race or color, irrespective of the nature and availability of educational facilities elsewhere. Quite apart from that, petitioners' concession of equality of facilities is not a concession of equality of educational opportunities, for it is implicit in petitioners' complaint that the mere denial of admission on the basis of race or color is a denial per se of educational opportunities. The offering of education to minor petitioners in a segregated school is per se a limitation on the enjoyment of educational opportunities.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Thus, this case as presented to this Court on the complaint and the motion to dismiss, presents a record in which the factual basis is present for the relief sought and the only question remaining is whether the action of respondents herein complained of violates the Constitution and laws of the United States.

II.

A. ACTS OF CONGRESS PROVIDING FOR EDUCATION OF CHILDREN OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REQUIRE SUCH EDUCATION IN A DUAL SCHOOL SYSTEM AND HAVE BEEN SO CONSTRUED BY THIS COURT.

B. CONSTRUCTION OF LOCALLY APPLICABLE LAWS BY THE HIGHEST COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA IS NORMALLY ACCEPTED BY THIS COURT.

Under this heading the respondents attempt to demonstate that the congressional enactment of statutes relating to public education in the District of Columbia and the judicial interpretation thereof by the lower courts have accomplished a construction of these statutes which is binding upon this Court. It is the petitioners' position that the statutes in question do not authorize racial segregation nor do the re-enactments after an intervening judicial construction by a lower Federal court that the statutes do require racial segregation, bind this Court to accept this construction. At most, the re-enactment of congressional legislation and the judicial construction of that legislation by lower Federal courts are but aids to this Court in making its independent determination as to the proper construction to be given to the statutes. In Federal Communications System v. Columbia Broadcasting System, 311 U.S. 132, Mr. Justice Frankfurter states at page 138:

> "We are not, however, willing to rest decision on any doctrine concerning the implied enactment of judicial construction upon re-enactment of the statute. The persuasion that lies behind that doctrine is merely one factor in the total effort to give fair meaning to language."

It is certainly not arguable that the decision of Carr v. Corning, 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950), creates a well settled interpretation that these statutes compel segregation and are constitutional. As this Court said in United States v. Raynor, 302 U.S. 540 at 551:

> "The fact that Congress revised and codified the criminal laws after the Court of Appeals in the case of Krakowski, 161 Fed. 88, held that the act only prohibited possession of the distinctive paper, does not detract from the soundness of this conclusion. One decision construing an act does not approach the dignity of a well settled interpretation."

Where constitutional rights of individuals are concerned this Court has assumed the duty "in construing congressional enactments to take care to interpret them so as to avoid a danger of unconstitutionality" (United States v. C.I.O., 335 U.S. 106, 120-121) and certainly it is the position of the petitioners that to adopt the construction given these statutes by the Court of Appeals in Carr v. Corning, supra, would create a danger of unconstitutionality. The position of the respondents, with respect to the construction of these acts, therefore, is untenable. We agree with the language of this Court in this connection in Helvering v. Reynolds, 313 U.S. 428, at 431:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

"Respondents' position is not tenable . . . that rule is no more than an aid in statutory construction. While it is useful at times in resolving statutory ambiguities it does not mean that the prior construction has become so imbedded in the law that only Congress can effect a change."

III.

THE DUAL SCHOOL SYSTEM IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA IS NOT VIOLATIVE OF THE FIFTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

In this section the respondents, in an apparent misconception of the law applicable to the complaint of the petitioners, first argue that Congress has more power to legislate for the District of Columbia than the State Legislatures have for the States. Then they argue that whatever limitations exist upon the States in the Fourteenth Amendment, no greater limitations exist with respect to the Federal Government in regard to racial disabilities imposed upon Negroes. They argue, for example, that under the Fifth Amendment slavery was constitutional, and that since the Fourteenth Amendment has not prohibited the establishment of the "separate but equal" doctrine in the education cases in the States, that it is certainly not prohibited by the Fifth Amendment. This is a misconception of the fundamental nature of the Federal Government.

Equality, equal justice under law, liberty, freedom of speech and association, and freedom of religion are fundamental and basic principles underlying the foundation of our government. Our government is one of laws and not of men. In this system, race is irrelevant. The system of slavery, constitutionally recognized both in the Constitution and in Dred Scott v. Sanford (citation), 19 Howard 393, was abolished by the Thirteenth Amendment. Citizenship was conferred upon Negroes under Clause 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment and thus both the system of slavery and the lack of citizenship status of the Negro set forth in the Dred Scott decision were removed as sources of constitutional power for the imposition of racial distinctions by the Federal Government upon Negroes. Thus our Government was brought into harmony and accord with its fundamental and basic principles—equality for all citizens—and a constitution that is color-blind.

The Federal Government is one of express powers and implied power necessary to carry out the express powers. It is too clear for argument that, since the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, the Federal Government has no express power to make racial distinctions in affording educational opportunities to citizens in the District of Columbia. It is the petitioners' position that there is likewise no implied power to do so.

This Court has recognized such power in the Federal Government in only one series of cases—the Japanese War Cases—in which it was dealing with the all-embracing war power. There this Court found an implied power, necessary to deal with sabotage and espionage under threat of invasion in the midst of a world-wide conflict, to deal on the basis of ancestry with loyal citizens who were commingled with disloyal persons. Even there this Court laid down drastic limitations governing the exercise of this implied power. It is apparent that integrated education in the District of Columbia presents no such threat to our National security. And no implied power to deny minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color can be implied from the express power given Congress over the District of Columbia.

As an apparent justification for compulsory racial segregation in public education, respondents dwell at length upon quotations from Negroes who were urging the passage of a statute in 1906 designed to increase the power of the Negro superintendent of schools. The constitutional rights of petitioners are neither added to nor diminished by the irrelevant opinions of isolated individuals, Negro or white. This Court has said that the rights which petitioners assert here are individual rights. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337. It is of no importance in this case as to whether the "separate but equal" doctrine is constitutionally permissible under the Fourteenth Amendment, although we take the position that it is not; for even if we concede, which we do not, that equal protection of law may be constitutionally satisfied under a racial classification, by testing the quantum of treatment afforded Negroes under the substantially equal theory—it is juristically inconceivable that we can test liberty under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment by the quantum of liberty which is enjoyed. A deprivation of individual liberty under the due process clause must be tested by the reasonableness of the action of the government. The test is whether the action is arbitrary but never as to how much liberty is taken. Thus the opinions of individual persons as to whether segregation is good or bad is irrelevant and the test of the deprivation of liberty under the Fifth Amendment cannot be measured by the quantum test apparently used under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in civil rights cases.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Moreover, the decision as to the constitutionality of the respondents' action in denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color is strictly a legal question to be determined by this Court and legislative policy or action is not determinative.

CONCLUSION

Petitioners believe that the other points advanced by respondents have been fully covered in petitioners' brief on the merits, and for that reason are not touched upon here.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE E. C. HAYES
JAMES M. NABRIT, JR.
Counsel for Petitioners

JULIAN R. DUGAS
GEORGE M. JOHNSON
DORSEY E. LANE
HARRY B. MERICAN
HERBERT O. REID, JR.
JAMES A. WASHINGTON
Of Counsel

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

NOV 16 195
HAROLD B. WILLEY,

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1953

No. [redacted] 8 19 4

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, et al.,
Petitioners,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, et al.,
Respondents.

BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS ON REARGUMENT.

GEORGE E. C. HAYES,
JAMES M. NABRIT, JR.,
Counsel for Petitioners.

HOWARD JENKINS,
GEORGE M. JOHNSON,
DORSEY E. LANE,
HARRY B. MERICAN,
CHARLES QUICK,
HERBERT O. REID, JR.,
JAMES A. WASHINGTON,
Of Counsel.

PRESS OF BYRON S. ADAMS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

INDEX

Page

Opinion Below 1

Jurisdiction 1

Questions Presented 4

Treaty and Statutes Involved 5

Statement of the Case 7

Errors Relied Upon 11

Summary of Argument 12

Argument 13

I. The respondents are without power to exclude minor petitioners from admission to Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color or to refuse adult petitioners permission to enroll their children in Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color 13

(A) The action of respondents in excluding minor petitioners from admission to Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color and in refusing permission to adult petitioners to enroll their children in Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color violates the policy of the Federal Government 13

(B) There is no statutory authority for the action of respondents complained of here 23

(C) An interpretation by this Court that these Acts of Congress compel the segregation of pupils in the District of Columbia solely on the basis of race or color alone would render them unconstitutional (Answer to Question 3 of the Court) 46

(D) The Denial of admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color deprives them of their civil rights in violation of Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43 80

Page

(E) The Court below erred in not granting petitioners the relief prayed for and in granting respondents' motion to dismiss minor petitioners' complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted 85

(F) This Court should declare that the actions of respondents in requiring segregation in the public schools is unlawful. It should direct the District Court to enter a decree ordering that such segregation be discontinued forthwith and that petitioners be admitted to Sousa Junior High School without distinction as to race, as soon as necessary administrative adjustments can be made and in no event later than the beginning of the next school year. (Answer to questions 4 and 5 of the Court.) .. 88

Conclusion 97

TABLE OF CASES CITED

Avery v. Georgia, — U. S. —, 97 L. ed. (Advanced p. 798) 16
Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60 .....16, 60
Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. U. S., 298 U. S. 349 (1938) 32, 51
Barrows v. Jackson, — U. S. —, 97 L. ed. (Advanced p. 961) 16
Bob-Lo Excursion Co. v. Michigan, 333 U. S. 28 16
Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624 (1943) .. 58
Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen v. Howard, 343 U. S. 768 17
Browne, et al. v. Magdeburger, et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950) 10, 46
Callen v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540 (1888) 50
Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1 (1899) 49
Carr, et al. v. Corning, et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182, F. (2d) 14 (1950) 10, 32, 46
Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277 (1866) 66, 69, 75, 78
Den ex dem. Murray v. Hoboken Land Improvement Co., 18 How. 272, 276, 15 L. ed. 372 32
D. C. v. Thompson, 73 S. Ct. 1007 .....20, 93
Dunlap v. U. S., 173 U. S. 65, 75 31

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Page

Edward v. California, 314 U. S. 180, 184 15
Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283 (1944) ...18, 34, 35, 44, 51, 59
Ex Parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333 (1866) 69
Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284 (1927) .51, 55, 56, 57
Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475 (1903) 67
Gebhart v. Belton, 91 A. 2d 137, 149 91
Georgetown College v. Hughes, 130 F. (2d) 810 (1942) 54
Guinn v. U. S., 238 U. S. 347 15
Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 15, 17, 84
Hill v. Texas, 316 U. S. 400 16
Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100 (1943) 14, 15, 18, 35, 58
Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U. S. 398, 442-443 33
Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24 (1948) 17, 81
Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214 (1944) 15, 18, 59
Lane v. Wilson, 307 U. S. 268 15
Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch (U. S.) 137, 177, 2 L. ed. 60 31
Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581 31
McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637 (1950) 16, 84
Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390 (1923) 51, 52
Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U. S. 586 (1940) 58
Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. S. 416, 433 34
Missouri, ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 352 .. 89
Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373 16
Nixon v. Condon, 286 U. S. 73 16
Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633 (1948) 16, 68, 69, 77
Perez v. Lippold, 32 Cal. (2d) 711, 198 P. (2d) 17 (1948) 71
Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (1925) 51, 52
Pierre v. Louisiana, 306 U. S. 354 16
Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 532, 559 14
Railroad Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445 (1873) 18, 69
Railway Mail Association v. Corsi, 326 U. S. 88, 94 17
Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118 (1943) .. 79
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1 (1948) 16, 84, 96
Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 322 U. S. 631, 633 89
Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535 (1942) 77

Page

Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649 (1944) 15, 84
South v. Peters, 339 U. S. 276, 278 15
Steele v. Louisiana & Nashville R. R. Co., 323 U. S. 192 ..... 17, 35
St. Joseph Stock Yard Co. v. United States, et al., 298 U. S. 38, 51-52 32
Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303 (1879) 84
Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1950) 16, 73, 75
Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410 (1948) 84
Terry v. Adams, 73 S. Ct. 809, 97 L. ed. (Advanced p. 745) 15
United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542 (1876) 83
United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303 (1946) 68
United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Ass'n, 166 U. S. 290, 318 31
Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313 (1880) 83
Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D. C. 50 (1910) 46, 68, 78
Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25, 27, 69 S. Ct. 1359, 1361 33
Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 (1886) 15, 84
Zucht v. King, 260 U. S. 174 (1922) 59

AUTHORITIES CITED

Berger, The Supreme Court and Group Discrimination Since 1937, 49 Col. L. Rev. 201, 204-5 71
Cooper, The Frustrations of Being a Member of a Minority Group: What does it do to the Individual and to his Relationship with Other People? 29 Mental Hygiene, 189-91 (1945) 72
Deutscher & Chein, The Psychological Effect of Enforced Segregation: A Survey of Social Science Opinion, 26 Journal of Psychology, 259, 261-2 71
Dollard, Caste and Color in a Southern Town, 424 (1937) 72
Myrdal, An American Dilemma, 645 (1944) 70
MacIver, The More Perfect Union, 67-68 (1948) 70
McLean, Group Tension, 2 Journal of American Medical Women's Association, 479, 482 72
McLean, Psychodynamic Factors in Racial Relations, The Annals of the American Academy of Political Science (March, 1946) 159, 161 72
Prudhomme, The Problem of Suicide in the American Negro, 25 Phychoanalytic Review, 187, 200 72

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

NOTES

Page

56 Yale Law Journal, 1059 at pp. 1061-2 (1947) 70

MISCELLANEOUS

Brief of the Committee of Law Professors filed as Brief Amicus Curiae in Supreme Court of the United States in Sweatt v. Painter, et al., #44, October term 1949, Page 34 73

Petition and Brief in support of Petition for Writ of Certiorari in the Supreme Court of the United States, in Sweatt v. Painter, #44, October term, 1949 75

UNITED STATES STATUTES AND CONSTITUTION

Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43 .....4, 5, 9, 10, 11

Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1254(1), 2101(e) 4

Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Ch. 80, Sec. 6, as amended June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Ch. 3446, Sec. 2 (D.C. Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 1110, 1111, 1112, 1113) 6, 26, 27

Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Ch. 3446, Sec. 2 (D. C. Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 1109) 27, 28

Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Ch. 3446, Sec. 7, as amended by Act of June 4, 1924, 43 Stat. 370, Ch. 250, Art. 3 (D. C. Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sec. 115) 7

Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., as amended by Act of Oct. 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 81st Cong., 1st Sess. 7, 29

Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Ch. 140, Art. 1, Secs. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 201, 207) 7, 8

Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States 4, 9, 11

Article I, Section 8, Clause 17 49

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States 4, 9, 11

TREATY

Charter of the United Nations, Chapter 1, Article 1, Sec. 3, Article IX, Secs. 55, 56 .....4, 5, 9, 10, 11

Page

STATE STATUTES AND CONSTITUTIONS

Alabama, Constitution, Article XIV, 1901 36
Arkansas, Acts, 1931, #169, Section 97, p. 475; Pages Dig. Section 11535 36
Delaware, Constitution, Article X, Section 2, 1897 36
Florida, Constitution, Article XII, Section 12, 1885 .. 36
Georgia, Constitution, Article VIII, Section 1, Par. 1, 1877 36
Kentucky, Constitution, Section 187, 1890 36
Louisiana, Constitution, Articles XII, Section 1, 1921 .. 36
Maryland, Article 77, Chapter 9, Section 111; Chapters 18, Section 192, 193; Chapter 20, Section 203, 204; Chapter 21, Section 292 of Flack's Annotated Code of Maryland 36
Mississippi, Constitution, Article VIII, Section 207, 1890 36
Missouri, Constitution, Article XI, Section 3, 1875 37
North Carolina, Constitution, Article IX, Section 2, 1868, Convention 1875 37
Oklahoma, Constitution, Article XIII, Section 3, Oklahoma Statutes Annotated, Title 70; Article 5, Sections 5-1, 5-4, 5-5 37
South Carolina, Constitution, Article XI, Section 7, 1895 37
Tennessee, Constitution, Article XI, Section 12, 1870 .. 37
Texas, Constitution, Article VII, Section 7, 1876 37
Virginia, Constitution, Article IX, Section 140, 1902 .. 37
West Virginia, Constitution, Article XII, Section 8, 1872 37

APPENDIX

A.

Statutory and Constitutional Provisions in the States where segregation in education is institutionalized 99-105

B.

District of Columbia Compulsory Attendance Law ... 106

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1953

No. 8

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, et al.,
Petitioners,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, et al.,
Respondents.

BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS ON REARGUMENT.

OPINION BELOW.

The final decree of The United States District Court for the District of Columbia is unreported, but appears in the Record (R. p. 19).

JURISDICTION.

The final decree of the District Court was entered on April 9, 1951 (R. p. 19). The notice of appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit was given on April 10, 1951 (R. p. 20). Briefs were filed by petitioners and respondents in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Before argument, before submission of the case for judgment on the briefs, and before judgment petitioners filed a Petition for Writ of Certiorari in this Court, asking that this Court review the judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia before judgment by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. Certiorari was granted by order of this Court dated November 10, 1952. On December 10, 1952 this case was submitted to this Court on brief and argument, and on June 8, 1953 this Court handed down the following order:

> "8. Brown vs. Board of Education of Topeka, etc.
> 101. Briggs vs. Elliott.
> 191. Davis vs. County School Board, etc.
> 413. Bolling vs. Sharpe.
> 448. Gebhart vs. Belton.
>
> Each of these cases is ordered restored to the docket and is assigned for reargument on Monday, October 12, next. In their briefs and on oral argument counsel are requested to discuss particularly the following questions insofar as they are relevant to the respective cases:
>
> 1. What evidence is there that the Congress which submitted and the State legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated or did not contemplate, understood or did not understand, that it would abolish segregation in public schools?
>
> 2. If neither the Congress in submitting nor the States in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment understood that compliance with it would require the immediate abolition of segregation in public schools, was it nevertheless the understanding of the framers of the Amendment
>
> (a) that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under Section 5 of the Amendment, abolish such segregation, or

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(b) that it would be within the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing such segregation of its own force?

3. On the assumption that the answers to questions 2(a) and (b) do not dispose of the issue, is it within the judicial power, in construing the Amendment, to abolish segregation in public schools?

4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,

(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) if so what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

The Attorney General of the United States is invited to take part in the oral argument and to file an additional brief if he so desires."

Upon application duly had by the Attorney General of the United States and acquiesced in by the parties in interest the date for the oral argument was changed from October 12, 1953 to December 7, 1953.

A motion was made by the petitioners and granted by the Supreme Court of the United States to substitute parties so as to have the personnel of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia to conform with the names of its present members.

This is an appeal from a decree in a civil action denying an injunction and denying an application for a declaratory judgment that the action of respondents, under color of law, in refusing admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color was in violation of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment and Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, and also in violation of Title 8, United States Code, Section 43, and further was in violation of the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter 1, Article 1, Section 3, Chapter IX, Articles 55(G) and 56, and denying an application for a declaratory judgment that respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them because of their race or color in affording them educational opportunities and dismissing petitioners' complaint on the ground that it failed to state a cause of action on which relief could be granted. The jurisdiction of this Court to review by writ of certiorari before judgment in the United States Court of Appeals is conferred by Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1254(1) and 2101(e).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

1. Whether the Federal Government in providing educational opportunities for pupils of the District of Columbia has power under the Constitution and laws of the United States to segregate pupils solely on the basis of race or color.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2. (a) Whether Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia compel their segregation solely on the basis of race or color.

(b) If Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia, compel their segregation solely on the basis of race or color, whether these acts are unconstitutional.

(c) If Acts of Congress which provide educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia permit voluntary segregation solely on the basis of race or color, whether to the extent that this legislation is thus permissive its implementation by actions of respondents to compel segregation of pupils solely on the basis of race or color is unconstitutional.

3. Whether the action of respondents in refusing to admit minor appellants to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color violated petitioners' rights guaranteed them by the Constitution and Laws of the United States.

4. Whether the United States District Court for the District of Columbia erred in denying petitioners' application for an injunction and for a declaratory judgment and in granting respondents' motion to dismiss petitioners' complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted.

TREATY AND STATUTES INVOLVED.

Treaty:

Chapter I, Article 1(3), Article 2(2), Chapter IX, Articles 55(c) and 56 of the United Nations Charter, 59 Stat. 1035 et seq.

Statutes:

(A) Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43.

(B) An Act to provide for the public instruction of Youth in Primary Schools throughout the County of Washington, in the District of Columbia, without the Limits of the Cities of Washington and Georgetown, May 20, 1862, 12 Stat. 394, Chapter 77, Sec. 35.

(C) An Act providing for the Education of Colored Children in the Cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia, and for other Purposes. May 21, 1862, 12 Stat. 407, Chapter 83.

(D) An Act relating to Public Schools in the District of Columbia, July 23, 1866, 14 Stat. 216, Chapter 217, Sec. 1.

(E) An Act donating certain Lots in the City of Washington for Schools for Colored Children in the District of Columbia, July 28, 1866, 14 Stat. 343, Chapter 308.

(F) An Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Section 6, as amended by Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 [(now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 1110, was R. S. D. C. Section 281) (originally enacted June 25, 1864, 13 Stat. 187, 191, Chapter CLVI Section 7)].

(G) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Section 6, as amended by Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 [(now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 1111, was R. S. D. C. Section 282) (originally enacted June 25, 1864, 13 Stat. 187, 191, Chapter CLVI, Section 16)].

(H) Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 [(now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 1109, was R. S. D. C. Section 283), (originally enacted June 25, 1864, 13 Stat. 187, 191, Chapter CLVI, Section 17)].

(I) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Section 6, as amended by Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 [(now District of Columbia Code, 1940, Sections 31-1112, was R. S. D. C. Section 306) (In substance—the Act of June 25, 1864, 13 Stat. 187, 191 Chapter CLVI, Section 18)].

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(J) Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 320, Chapter 3446, Section 7, as amended by Act of July 21, 1945, 59 Stat. 500, Chapter 321, Title V (Section 21 effective July 1, 1945, now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 115).

(K) Act of June 11, 1878, 20 Stat. 107, Chapter 180, Section 6 as amended by Act of June 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 316, Chapter 3446, Section 2 [(now District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Section 1113, was R. S. D. C. Section 310) (originally enacted May 26, 1862, 12 Stat. 407, Chapter 83, Section 2)].

(L) Act of July 7, 1947, Public No. 163, 80th Congress, 1st Session, as amended by Act of October 6, 1949, Public No. 353, 81st Congress, 1st Session, District of Columbia Code, 1951 Ed., Title 31, Sections 669, 670, 671.

(M) Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Chapter 140, Art. 1, Secs. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31 Secs. 201, 207).

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

On the 11th day of September, 1950, and during the time when respondents were receiving students for enrollment and instruction in Sousa Junior High School, a public school in the District of Columbia attended solely by white children, all of the minor petitioners, Negroes between the ages of 7 and 16 years, citizens of the United States, residents of and domiciled in the District of Columbia, within the statutory age limits for eligibility to attend the public schools of the District of Columbia and subject to the compulsory school attendance law of the District of Columbia, accompanied by their parents, adult petitioners, presented themselves to respondent Eleanor P. McAuliffe, the principal of Sousa Junior High School, for enrollment and instruction therein. The adult petitioners are taxpayers and citizens of the District of Columbia, and are required by law to send their respective children, minor petitioners, to the specific public schools designated by the respondents, and are subject to criminal prosecution for failure so to do. Act of February 4, 1925, 43 Stat. 806, 807, Ch. 140, Art. I, Secs. 1 and 7 (D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 201, 207). Each minor petitioner was denied and excluded from enrollment and instruction at the Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color.

On the 27th day of October, 1950, minor petitioners, through their attorneys, appealed to respondent Lawson J. Cantrell, Associate Superintendent of Schools in charge of the vocational and junior high schools in the District of Columbia, Divisions 1-9 (now Division I), restricted to white pupils. Again each minor petitioner was denied and excluded from enrollment and instruction at the Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color.

On the 31st day of October, 1950, minor petitioners, through their attorneys, appealed to respondent Norman J. Nelson, First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Divisions 1-9, restricted to white pupils, and to respondent Hobart M. Corning, Superintendent of all the public schools in the District of Columbia, and each denied and excluded each minor petitioner from enrollment and instruction at Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color.

On the 1st day of November, 1950, the respondent Board of Education of the District of Columbia upheld the actions of the other respondents and itself denied and excluded minor petitioners from enrollment and instruction at Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color.

Having exhausted their administrative remedies, thereafter and on November 9, 1950, petitioners, on their own behalf and on behalf of others similarly situated, filed a complaint (R. p. 1) and brought a class suit in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, against the respondents, members of the School Board and officials of the public school system of the District of Columbia, in their respective official capacities. The action sought a declaratory judgment pursuant to Rule 57 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, stating that the respondents are without right in construing the statutes having to do with public education in the District of Columbia so as to require said respondents to exclude the minor petitioners from attendance at the Sousa Junior High School and in denying to the minor petitioners the right of attendance at the Sousa Junior High School in violation of their rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and by Article I, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting legislation in the nature of a Bill of Attainder, and by the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3, Article 2, Section 2, Chapter IX, Articles 55(c) and 55 and 56, and further stating that the said respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them because of their race or color.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The action further sought an interlocutory and a permanent injunction restraining respondents, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents, and employees from precluding the admission of minor petitioners and other Negro children similarly situated to the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color, upon the grounds that said refusal of admission as applied to minor petitioners or other Negroes similarly situated, in whose behalf they sue, denies them their privileges and immunities as citizens of the United States, and is in violation of their rights as enunciated under the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, Article I, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3, Article 2, Section 2, Chapter IX, Articles 55(c) and 56.

The action also sought an interlocutory and a permanent injunction requiring respondents, and each of them, their successors in office, and their agents and employees to admit the minor petitioners to attendance in the Sousa Junior High School in conformity with their rights as secured to them by the due process of law clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and Article I, Seciton 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3, Article 2, Section 2, Chapter IX, Articles 55(c) and 56.

Subsequently, the respondents, through their attorneys, filed a motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted (R. p. 18). The Honorable Walter M. Bastian, Judge in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, refused either to grant an injanction restraining respondents from denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color, or to issue a declaratory judgment that said denial was in violation of petitioners' rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States, or to issue a decree requiring respondents to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School free of any racial distinctions, and on April 9, 1951, granted the motion to dismiss (R. p. 19). The District Judge at the close of oral argument stated that he was bound by the holding of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Carr, et al. v. Corning, 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950), and Browne, et al. v. Magdeburger, et al., 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950).

An appeal was taken to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit (R. p. 20), and briefs were filed therein. This case has not been set down for oral argument, nor has it been submitted for judgment on the briefs, and no orders with respect thereto have been entered by that Court.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

ERRORS RELIED UPON.

The District Court erred:

1. In refusing to enter a declaratory judgment holding that the respondents are without right in excluding minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School under color of law upon the ground that these actions violate rights secured by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment and Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, and by Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and by the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3, Article 2, Section 2 and Chapter IX, Articles 55(c) and 56; and in refusing to hold that respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them because of their race or color.

2. In refusing to restrain respondents from denying admission of minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color, upon the ground that this action is in violation of their rights secured under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, and Article VI, Clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43, and the Charter of the United Nations, Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3, Article 2, Section 2, Chapter IX, Articles 55(c) and 56.

3. In refusing to issue a decree requiring respondents to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School in conformity with their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and in refusing to hold that Acts of Congress do not compel racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia, for they would then violate Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, and respondents were in error in applying and construing said statutes so as to require the exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color.

4. In granting respondents' motion to dismiss petitioner's complaint on the ground that it failed to state a claim on which relief could be granted.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

THE RESPONDENTS HAVE NO POWER OR AUTHORITY TO EXCLUDE MINOR PETITIONERS FROM ADMISSION TO SOUSA JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL SOLELY BECAUSE OF RACE OR COLOR OR TO REFUSE PERMISSION TO ADULT PETITIONERS TO ENROLL THEIR CHILDREN IN SOUSA JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL SOLELY BECAUSE OF RACE OR COLOR.

A.

The Action of the Respondents Violates the Policy of the Federal Government.

1. It volates National Federal Policy.

2. It violates Federal Policy in the District of Columbia.

B.

The Acts of Congress Which Provide Educational Opportunities for Pupils in the District of Columbia Do Not Compel Their Segregation Solely on the Basis of Race or Color.

C.

If These Acts of Congress Are Interpreted As Compelling Segregation of Minor Petitioners in the Public Schools of the District of Columbia Solely on the Basis of Race or Color Then These Acts Are Unconstitutional.

1. These Acts would then deprive petitioners of their rights protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

2. These Acts would then be bills of attainder in violation of Article 1, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

D.

The Action of Respondents Deprives Petitioners of Their Civil Rights in Violation of Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43.

E.

The Court Below Erred in Not Granting Petitioners the Relief Prayed for and in Granting Respondents' Motion to Dismiss Minor Petitioners' Complaint on the Ground That It Failed to State a Claim on Which Relief Could Be Granted.

F.

The Answers to Questions 4 and 5 Asked by the Court.

ARGUMENT.

THE RESPONDENTS ARE WITHOUT POWER TO EXCLUDE MINOR PETITIONERS FROM ADMISSION TO SOUSA JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL SOLELY BECAUSE OF RACE OR COLOR OR TO REFUSE ADULT PETITIONERS PERMISSION TO ENROLL THEIR CHILDREN IN SOUSA JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL SOLELY BECAUSE OF RACE OR COLOR.

A.

The Action of Respondents in Excluding Minor Petitioners From Admission to Sousa Junior High School Solely Because of Race or Color and in Refusing Permission to Adult Petitioners to Enroll Their Children in Sousa Junior High School Solely Because of Race or Color Violates the Policy of the Federal Government.

Here we are not dealing with the delicate question of State-Federal relations. In this case we are complaining of the action of school officials of the District of Columbia, the Capital of the United States. This is no local setting, this is also the capital of the free world. In this framework the question before the Court is not merely the technical question of the propriety or reasonableness or even lawfulness of the action of the respondents but it is the basic inquiry as to whether there is constitutionally embedded in the heart of our democracy the seeds of racism or whether, as said by Mr. Justice Harlan in his dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 532, 559. ". . . Our Constitution is color blind . . . " Certain it is that a determination by this Court that the Federal Government may segregate pupils in the public schools in the capital of the United States solely on the basis of race or color and that such action is within the spirit and purpose and meaning of our Constitution would not only be a complete reversal of the position of this Court, but would strip from our democratic system its fundamental and universal appeal to all races and creeds.

Our Federal policy as found in the Constitution, Laws and Treaties of the United States, the executive and administrative acts of the Executive branch of the Federal Government, as well as in the applicable legal precedents interdicts any such determination.

The Federal policy in this regard is revealed in the language of this Court in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81 (1943) where it said at p. 100:

> "Distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality."

Broadly stated, it is the policy of the Government of the United States that the exercise of rights enjoyed by citizens of the United States by virtue of their status as such may not be conditioned on the basis of race or color. This policy has been recognized and effectuated by the executive, the legislative and the judicial branches of the Federal Government. This policy has been given effect not only where the Federal Government is dealing directly with its citizens but also where state action is involved.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

1.

THE DECISIONS OF THIS COURT ARE INDICATIVE OF THIS FEDERAL POLICY.

This Court, in a long line of decisions, has developed the doctrine that Government may not condition the exercise of any right it affords solely on the basis of race or color.

In the evolution of this doctrine, this Court has come to view race as an irrational premise for governmental action. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356.

In Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100, Mr. Chief Justice Stone characterized racial distinctions as "odious to a free people." In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 216, Mr. Justice Black viewed such racial restrictions as "immediately suspect." Mr. Justice Jackson, concurring in Edward v. California, 314 U. S. 180, 184, referred to race and color as "constitutionally an irrelevance." Mr. Justice Douglas, dissenting in South v. Peters, 339 U. S. 276, 278, characterized discriminations based upon race, creed or color as "beyond the pale." Mr. Justice Burton, in Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, 824, while not reaching the constitutional question raised, described signs, partitions and curtains segregating Negroes in railroad dining cars as emphasizing "the artificiality of a difference in treatment which serves only to call attention to a racial classification of passengers holding identical tickets and using the same public dining facility."

a.

Where State Action Was Involved.

This thesis has pervaded a wide realm of judicial opinion.

Sweeping decisions have secured the right of Negroes to make effective use of the electoral process consistent with the requirements of the Fifteenth Amendment; Guinn v. United States, 238 U. S. 347; Lane v. Wilson, 307 U. S. 268; Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649; Terry v. Adams, 73 S. Ct. 809, 97 L. ed. (Advance p. 745).

This Court has defined the Fourteenth Amendment itself, as a broad prohibition against Government enforcement of differentiations and discriminations based upon race or color. Thus, this Court has held that state action restricting the right of Negroes to vote is a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nixon v. Condon, 286 U. S. 73.

Similarly, it has refused to sanction the systematic exclusion of Negroes from the petit or grand jury; Hill v. Texas, 316 U. S. 400; Pierre v. Louisiana, 306 U. S. 354; their representation on juries on a token or proportional basis; Cassell v. Texas, 339 U. S. 282; Shepherd v. Florida, 341 U. S. 50; or any method in the selection of juries found susceptible of racial discrimination in practice; Avery v. Georgia, ... U. S. ....., 97 L. ed. (Advance p. 798).

No state may sanction or enforce racial distinctions in the use, occupancy or ownership of real property; Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, even though applied equally to Negroes and white persons; Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1; Barrows v. Jackson, ... U. S. ....., 97 L. ed. (Advance p. 961); and see Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633.

At the graduate and professional school level, closest to this case, racial distinctions as applied have been struck down. McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637; see Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629.

State laws requiring racial segregation in interstate commerce have been declared an invalid invasion of commerce power reserved to the Congress. Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373. But where a state sought to enforce against an interstate carrier its local nondiscriminatory policy, its invasion of the commerce power was upheld. Bob-Lo Excursion Co. v. Michigan, 333 U. S. 28.

The only way in which the decision in the Morgan case can be reconciled with the decision in the Bob-Lo case is to say that there is a Federal policy against racial distinction and state action in implementation of that policy is permissible under the commerce clause, while state action

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

in derogation of that policy is a burden on interstate commerce and invalid.

Again, in passing on the contention of a labor union that the application of a state civil rights law prohibiting it from discriminating in membership in its organization on the basis of race was offensive to the Fourteenth Amendment, this Court held that the judicial determination sought "would be a distortion of policy manifested in that Amendment which was adopted to prevent state legislation designed to perpetuate discrimination on the basis of race or color." Railway Mail Ass'n v. Corsi, 326 U. S. 88, 94. This holding seems to indicate a national policy against discrimination on the basis of race and to render valid all state action in support of this policy.

b.

Where Federal Action Was Involved.

This Court has invalidated every restrictive action of the Federal Government which was based upon race or color alone when complained of by citizens of the United States with one exception, namely, in the Japanese cases.

It prohibited the racial distinctions complained of in Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, with respect to dining cars in use in interstate commerce.

It declared United States District Courts had no power in the District of Columbia to grant injunctions in aid of restrictive covenants based on race. Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24.

In Steele v. Louisville and Nashville R. R. Co., 323 U. S. 192, this Court, although not reaching the constitutional question raised, held that enforcement of a collective bargaining agreement discriminating against Negroes as to seniority rights would be enjoined. A more recent case went further. In Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Howard, 343 U. S. 768, the Court held that collective bargaining agents cannot use their position and power to destroy colored workers' jobs in order to give them to white workers. The Court thus invalidated attempts to disqualify colored workers for employment on the basis solely of their race or color.

This Court has upheld a departure from this policy in only one situation. The restrictions placed upon persons of Japanese origin on the West Coast during World War II were sustained in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, and in Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, as emergency war measures taken by the national government in a dire national peril of the gravest nature. The military decision was upheld as an implied power under the War Power where the Court decided that it should not interfere with measures considered necessary to the safety of the nation by those primarily responsible for its security. Yet, in upholding these orders, the Court made some of the most sweeping condemnations of governmental action based upon race and color ever announced by our judiciary. And while departure from accepted standards of governmental conduct was sustained in order to remove persons of Japanese origin from areas where sabotage and espionage might have worked havoc with the national war effort, once this removal was accomplished and individual loyalty determined, further restrictions based upon race or color could no longer be countenanced. Ex parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283.

As a matter of fact in Railroad Company v. Brown, 17 Wall. 44, where Congress had granted a charter to Railroad Company in which it prohibited separate street cars for Negroes in the District of Columbia, and enacted a statute to the same effect, this Court upheld the validity of these limitations. This case, the first case involving segregation to reach this Court after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, again is in line with our Federal policy against racial distinctions in the District of Columbia.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2.

The Acts of Congress Are Indicative of This Federal Policy.

